Gap Inc. continued to struggle despite its recent "skinny black pants" theme and the launch of "Project Red," a clothing line tied to a campaign against AIDS in Africa. Same-store sales fell 7% in October, steeper than the 2.7% drop analysts had expected.

Teen retailers Pacific Sunwear of California Inc. and Hot Topic Inc. each posted same-store sales declines of more than 7%, while sales at Abercrombie & Fitch Co. fell 3%.

It also was a bumpy month for women's clothiers. AnnTaylor Stores Corp. reported a 0.5% decline amid weakness at its lower-priced Loft chain. Chico's FAS Inc. posted a 4.1% decrease and said third-quarter earnings will fall short of analysts' expectations. Talbots Inc., which doesn't report monthly sales, said same-store sales for the third quarter rose 2.3%, but sales slowed in late October. The company didn't change its third-quarter profit outlook, but its shares fell more than 3%.

Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said same-store sales rose a healthy 7.7%. That figure excludes results from more than 400 stores Federated acquired last year from May Department Stores Co. Those stores, which were converted to Macy's in September and nearly doubled the size of the chain, "continued to lag," Federated said.

The former May stores are likely giving up customers to other chains as Federated takes them more upscale under the Macy's brand, said Stephen Hoch, a marketing professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. Midprice department stores, Kohl's and J.C. Penney among them, also continue to benefit from 78 store closings since the Federated-May merger, he said, adding: "That left a bunch of money on the table."

Retail Sales Show Mostly Rich Shop Till They Drop (USAT)

By Mindy Fetterman

DOJ_NMG_0090632

USA Today, November 3, 2006

In the retail world, the holidays are shaping up to be a case study in the haves and have-nots.

Which side a retailer falls on depends on its customers: Do they have money? Or are times tight?

If the customers are "upmarket," where their incomes are rising and their personal economy is good, retailers are doing well. Such as Saks and Nordstrom.

If customers are "downmarket," where the cost of gasoline is hurting and raises are few, they aren't doing as well. Such as Wal-Mart and Target.

On Thursday, that divide became clearer as retailers reported sales for October.

Wal-Mart said U.S. sales at stores open at least a year were basically flat compared with a year ago, while Target's same-store sales rose 3.9%. But Saks' same-store sales were up 9.2% and Nordstrom's 10.7%

"There's a huge split in the consumer base that's really creating a polarization in the market," says Sheila McCusker, editor of Information Resources' Times & Trends, which studies consumer shopping trends.

Higher gas prices have cut sharply into the spending power of lower-income Americans, while job and income growth have been enjoyed mainly by higher-income Americans.

"They're polar opposites in terms of how the economy is affecting them," says Frank Badillo, senior economist at Retail Forward, which studies retail trends.

Looking ahead to the holidays, the majority of shoppers surveyed by Retail Trends said they will spend about the same this year as last. But many more lower-income shoppers than affluent shoppers said they plan to spend much less.

Higher gas prices are fueling a trend that had already begun among all shoppers no matter their income: fewer trips but more spending per trip.

When gas prices hit an average of $2.75 a gallon in the spring, "Shoppers started consolidating trips, trying to do more in any given trip," says McCusker.

Information Resources found that the average number of trips taken fell 4.6% in the spring and 3.9% in the summer, when gasoline was at $2.95 a gallon.

The pain has been felt most by mass retailers such as Wal-Mart and Target. Wal-Mart acknowledges that customers are making fewer trips but says its sales per trip are rising.

The biggest beneficiary of higher gas prices have been drugstores, where hurried consumers can dash in and out quickly for a couple of items, McCusker says. The average number of trips to drugstores rose 1.9% in the summer.

"Supercenters are farther out," says McCusker. "… As consumers start weighing what to do, they've chosen (a closer) location."

Dow Slips Again On Retail, Productivity Data (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average flirted with the 12000 level again, but this time on the downside, as the market fell because of weak economic data.

Reports of surprisingly soft retail sales and productivity, coupled with a bigger increase in jobless claims than analysts anticipated, ratcheted up investors' worries that the current economic slowdown might be worse than expected. In recent months, many on Wall Street have been hoping for a gradual softening, which would shake out excess financial speculation but leave workers and consumers unscathed and keep corporate profits strong.

The part about strong profits has held up so far. Investors are increasingly worried about the rest of the formula.

"Sometimes you get what you want and you realize that maybe you didn't want it," said Michael Cuggino, president and portfolio manager for the Permanent Portfolio Family of Funds. He said he believes the economy "is stronger than a lot of people give it credit for," but he understands why this week's string of tepid data has worried some investors.

DOJ_NMG_0090633

At its low yesterday, the Dow was off more than 52 points, below the 12000 level that it closed above for the first time Oct. 19. The blue-chip average trimmed its losses but finished down for the fifth straight day, off 12.48 points, or 0.1%, at 12018.54, up 12.1% on the year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished down at 1367.34, off 0.47 point, but up 9.5% year to date. The Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 0.33 point to 2334.02, up 5.8% year to date.

Wal-Mart Stores, a Dow component, reported that U.S. same-store sales rose 0.5% in October, the slowest growth in nearly six years, and predicted November's sales would be the same as a year earlier. Rivals Costco Wholesale and Target reported disappointing same-store sales, in part blaming difficult comparisons with the year-earlier period, when their stores were bustling amid the Gulf Coast's recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

A decline in crude-oil prices eased the stock market's losses. Crude futures for December delivery slid 83 cents, or 1.4%, to a two-week low of $57.88 a barrel, off 5.2% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell, and bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.602%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.11 yen from 117.04. The euro rose to $1.2777, compared with $1.2755.

Fed Official Says Bad Data Helped Fuel Rate Cuts, Housing Speculation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

In an apparent and rare in-house critique, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas said that because of faulty inflation data, the Fed kept interest rates too low for too long earlier this decade, fueling speculative housing activity.

A number of critics have said the Fed under former chairman Alan Greenspan kept monetary policy too easy from 2003 to 2004. But Richard Fisher's remarks to the New York Association for Business Economics yesterday mark the first time some Fed watchers could recall a sitting Fed policy maker making such comments.

Mr. Fisher said from 2002 to early 2003, inflation, as measured by the price index of personal consumption expenditures (PCE) excluding food and energy, was running below 1%. That suggested that a serious shock to the economy could turn inflation to deflation, or generally falling prices. Deflation makes it much harder for the Fed to boost growth by engineering deeply negative real, that is inflation-adjusted, interest rates.

To reduce the risk of deflation, the Fed lowered its target for the Fed funds rate -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- to 1% in June 2003 and held it there until mid-2004. It has since raised it to 5.25%.

Mr. Fisher noted that subsequent revisions show PCE inflation was actually a half a percentage point higher than originally estimated. "In retrospect, the real Fed funds rate turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time and was held lower longer than it should have been," Mr. Fisher said.

"In this case, poor data led to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today...the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country. It is complicating the [Fed's] task of achieving...sustainable noninflationary growth."

Mr. Fisher, who took office in April last year, said in an interview that his speech wasn't meant to be a criticism of the decisions Mr. Greenspan and the FOMC made then. He said: "I wasn't at the table at the time -- it's easy to look at things with 20-20 hindsight. The point is we need to continue to improve our ability to develop and work with better data."

Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs, called Mr. Fisher's remarks "pretty striking," while noting it is Mr. Fisher's style to be opinionated. He added that while he agrees the Fed's policy from 2002 to 2004 fueled speculative housing-bubble activity, it was still reasonable "knowing what you knew at the time. You take out some insurance against a really bad, low-probability outcome, and after the fact you regret having paid the insurance premium."

Mr. Fisher said inflation, at about 2.5% now, is still higher than his "comfort zone," but it is possible it "has peaked and is finally heading lower."

DOJ_NMG_0090634

Fed governor Susan Bies echoed that sentiment in a speech to Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, saying, "inflation appears poised to decelerate in coming months... but the risks to that outlook seem tilted toward the upside."

The Rich Are Getting Much Richer, Much Faster Than Everyone Else (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Over the past quarter-century, and especially in the last 10 years, America's very rich have grown much richer. No one else fared as well.

In 2004, the richest 1 percent of households - 719,910 of them, with an average annual income of $326,720 - had 19.8 percent of the entire nation's pretax income. That's up from 17.8 percent a year earlier, according to a study by University of California-Berkeley economist Emmanuel Saez.

The study, titled "The Evolution of Top Incomes," also found that the richest one-tenth of 1 percent of Americans - 129,584 households in 2004 - reported income equal to 9.5 percent of national pretax income.

However, median, or midpoint, family income rose only 1.6 percent between 2001 and 2004, when adjusted for inflation, according to the Federal Reserve. Median family real net worth - a family's gross assets minus liabilities - rose only 1.5 percent during those four years.

Those are very sluggish income-growth rates compared with the four years between 1998 and 2001, when median family income grew by 9.5 percent and median family real net worth grew by 10.3 percent.

Experts disagree on the causes, but they're in near agreement that this trend threatens to erode a fundamental American belief about fairness.

"It's not the actual getting ahead in America that's so important - it's been Americans' deep belief that they have the opportunity to get ahead. And if you lose that, there's damage to our society," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who until last year was the director of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and before that was chief economist for President Bush.

In coming years, income inequality is sure to be a rallying cry in political debates over everything from raising the minimum wage to federal spending on education to overhauling the tax code.

Most theories on why the rich are getting richer focus on why everyone else isn't. Some explanations include the declining power of labor, the influx of illegal immigrants, the offshoring of jobs and global competition that holds down wage growth.

Education has widened income inequality, too. Americans with college degrees earn nearly twice as much as those without them.

But education hasn't been a ticket to income growth lately.

Between 2000 and 2005, workers with four-year college degrees saw their wages fall 3.1 percent, adjusted for inflation. Only two groups, who together make up just 3.4 percent of the workforce, saw inflation-adjusted wages rise. They were workers with doctoral degrees or specialty degrees, such as medicine or law, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The soaring pay enjoyed by top CEOs, athletes and entertainers also has added to the widening income divide.

"I'm thinking Tiger Woods causes some income inequality," said Holtz-Eakin. "All of that seems to be part of this, but it still leaves you with a sense of not knowing exactly what it is."

There's a simpler explanation. The very wealthy simply own more assets than the rest of us. That means they benefit more from the booming stock market, which is reaching record highs.

Since 1926, stocks have given investors an average annual return of about 10 percent (with large fluctuations, depending on the years). In 2004, the wealthiest 10 percent of Americans were almost three times more likely to own stock than the broad universe of U.S. families, according to the Federal Reserve.

The median value of stock holdings for the wealthiest 10 percent of Americans was $110,000 per household in 2004, according to Morgan Stanley, the banking giant. The value of stocks held by the other 90 percent of Americans averaged $8,350.

Those numbers lead some to question the fairness of Bush's 2003 tax cuts, which lowered the top rate at which capital gains and dividends are taxed. Individual income tax rates in the top four income brackets were also lowered to 25, 28, 33 and 35 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0090635

"We've had a 30-year trend of income inequality. What's new in the last five years is the degree to which tax policy has made that worse, rather than leaned against that trend," said Jason Furman, a senior fellow for the liberal Center for Budget and Policy Priorities and an economist at New York University.

If Democrats capture the House of Representatives on Tuesday, they won't immediately set about trying to reverse the Bush-era tax cuts. Rep. Charles Rangel of New York would head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and he's said he won't seek a rollback but will vigorously oppose extending the cuts beyond 2010, the year they're set to expire.

Some conservatives fear that Democrats will seek to redistribute wealth by revamping the tax code to address income inequality. They defend the status quo by pointing to tax data showing that the rich contribute the greatest share of taxes.

In 2003, the wealthiest 10 percent held 37.2 percent of national income, a 50.2 percent share of all federal tax liabilities and a 69.6 percent share of individual income tax liabilities, according to a Congressional Budget Office tax study.

"We've redistributed income about as much as we can," said James Glassman, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank in Washington.

Cheney Tries To Get GOP Base Energized (MN)

By Michael Jamison

Missoulian (Montana), November 3, 2006

KALISPELL - At a rally intended to get out the Republican vote, Vice President Dick Cheney touted the national GOP agenda, saying the re-election of Conrad Burns was critical to continuing the Bush administration's efforts in Washington, D.C., and abroad.

"I look forward to swearing him in for another term in the United States Senate come January," Cheney said.

Burns, a three-term senator from Montana, was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1988. This year, the incumbent is considered one of the most vulnerable GOP candidates, locked in a tight race with Democratic challenger Jon Tester.

The narrow margins indicated by repeated polls have brought political heavyweights to Montana, hoping to tip the scales in favor of Burns. This was Cheney's second visit to the Flathead Valley in three months, an effort, said Brock Lowrance, to "get out the message that it's important to come out and vote."

Lowrance is communication director for the Republican Party in Montana, and he predicted Cheney's visit would help Republicans "all the way down the ticket." In fact, most of the Flathead's GOP political hopefuls were on hand Wednesday, hoping the vice presidential visit would, in fact, float all boats.

"This is a way to rally the GOP base to the polls," Lowrance said of Cheney's visit. "There's a lot of support for our candidates in the Flathead, and at this point, it's a turnout game."

But getting the turnout is hard work, Burns said, noting that his party is contacting 11,000 Montana voters every day in this last push to Nov. 7.

"Don't go vote alone," Burns told the crowd, "take someone with you."

Cheney visited the Flathead again because it has proved strong Republican territory, Lowrance said, which is the same reason President Bush has planned a Burns campaign stop in Billings on Thursday.

Tester, likewise, is playing to his base in this last week of the election season, with stops scheduled in Bozeman, Missoula and Butte.

"All we're focused on for the next six days is turning out supporters on Election Day," Lowrance said.

And according to Cheney, it will be a very important Election Day. At shortly after 5 p.m., Cheney and wife Lynn walked into the Majestic Valley Arena north of Kalispell - a place better known for rodeo, monster trucks and amateur boxing - and was met by rowdy applause from more than 1,000 GOP stalwarts. His podium was flanked by hay bales, saddles and flags draped across straw.

"It's great to be with you," Cheney said, "back in Big Sky country."

Cheney called on the party activists to "do everything we can to make sure that we get that Republican ticket elected six days from now."

DOJ_NMG_0090636

At stake, he said, is control of Congress. Should power shift to the Democrats, Cheney warned, taxes will go up, security will go down and the economy will stagnate.

Cheney predicted Bush administration tax cuts would disappear under Democratic control, and warned that both the war in Iraq and the broader war on terror would be compromised should Republicans fail to retain power in the capital.

He praised Burns and Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Mont., saying the politicians were "superb public servants." The U.S. Senate, he said, is a "mixed bag" of personalities, but added that "one of the senators I like and respect the most is Conrad Burns."

Cheney called Burns a leader in agricultural issues, in energy and military security and public land use, saying the incumbent is known for "clear thinking and common sense."

That the praise was unequivocal came as no surprise, and campaigners said they had no concerns that widespread voter frustration with White House policy might make such high-profile endorsements a liability.

"The president and vice president are always welcome in Montana," Lowrance said. "It creates a real energy."

Some of that energy was seen protesting along U.S. Highway 93, as Democratic activists bundled against the cold and carried signs that condemned the "borrow-and-spend conservatives," asking "who's paying for these visits?"

But inside the arena, the crowd remained solidly Republican, loudly booing any mention of Democrats.

Cheney keyed hard on the need for continued military might around the world, noting that "to win this war, America needs the Patriot Act."

Burns, he said, "voted for the Patriot Act, and he's the only Senate candidate in Montana who wants to keep it. That alone is a great reason to vote for him next Tuesday."

Bush Blasts Dems As He Stumps For Burns (USAT)

USA Today, November 3, 2006

President Bush took his "Democrats are soft on terror and oppose conservative judges" campaign theme to Montana on Thursday, trying to rally support of endangered GOP Sen. Conrad Burns. Burns is locked in a tight battle against state Senate President Jon Tester.

Tester was campaigning with Gov. Brian Schweitzer and Sen. Max Baucus, both Democrats.

Bush chided Democrats who he said voted against legislation to detain and interrogate suspected terrorists, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program and the USA Patriot Act. He stressed that when voters cast their ballots, they will be deciding what kind of judges sit on federal courts.

Bush also predicted that Republicans will retain control of Congress, just as they retained control of the White House in 2004 when Democrats, he said, were measuring the West Wing for their furniture.

"The movers never got the call," Bush said. "The same thing is going to happen on Nov. 7. We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

Pentagon defends military voting system

The Defense Department defended a new military voting program that lets servicemembers request and submit ballots by fax or e-mail. Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, said the electronic registration and voting service is well-intentioned but could expose troops to identity theft or allow hackers to tamper with ballots.

The Defense Department said the system is as secure as possible and that risks are detailed for military members when they access the e-mail system. "We have taken every precaution to limit those risks," Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said.

Dems accuse GOP of intimidation in Md.

Maryland Democrats accused Republicans of launching a "conscious, premeditated" campaign of voter intimidation after a report described a handbook advising Republican poll watchers to challenge the credentials of any voters they suspect are fraudulent. The handbook urges poll watchers to warn election judges that they could face jail time if they fail to act.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., accused the GOP of "a conscious, premeditated plan of voter intimidation and voter suppression." State Republican Party Chairman John Kane denied any intimidation, saying the goal was to ensure that no fraud takes place.

DOJ_NMG_0090637

Houston mayor halts free flu shots at polls

Houston stopped offering free flu shots at early-voting sites after Republicans alleged it was a ploy by Mayor Bill White to lure more Democrats to the polls. The vaccinations, for people ages 50 and older, had been offered at early voting sites in predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods. Health officials said they were targeting medically underserved areas, not Democratic neighborhoods. "There was no political motive whatsoever" behind the shots, White said. Harris County Republican Chairman Jared Woodfill said he doubted that and said the offer violated a state law that bars accepting freebies in exchange for votes.

Ethanol gaffe encourages GOP in Minn.

Minnesota lieutenant governor candidate Judi Dutcher apologized and blamed a long, hard campaign for her response to a question this week about E85. "It's like you've asked me the college quiz bowl question," the Democrat had said. "What is E85?"

E85 is a blend of 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline. Demand for petroleum alternatives would be a boost for Minnesota farmers because corn is the top source of ethanol. Dutcher is the running mate of Mike Hatch, who is in a tight race against GOP Gov. Tim Pawlenty. Dutcher, appearing with Hatch, blamed "one of those times when your brain doesn't kick it into gear." Pawlenty, who promotes ethanol, questioned Dutcher's qualifications. Hatch's response: "He's not running against Judi Dutcher, he's running against me. I know a hell of a lot more about ethanol than Gov. Pawlenty."

Wash. school bus driver 'not a fan' of Bush

A Seattle school bus driver, fired after she reportedly made an obscene gesture at President Bush, has filed a union grievance in an attempt to get her job back. School District spokeswoman Sara Niegowski said the firing was not politically motivated: "The bus driver was terminated for making an obscene gesture in view of the students." The driver, whose name was not released, was driving middle school children back to school after a zoo visit June 16 when Bush and Republican Rep. Dave Reichert drove by in a motorcade. The driver gave the president the finger, according to Reichert and Issaquah School District Superintendent Janet Barry. "The congressman hadn't seen it, but the president turned to him and said, 'That one's not a fan,'" Reichert spokeswoman Kimberly Cadena said.

Bush Chides Democrats As Soft On Terror (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, November 3, 2006

President Bush, campaigning in a Republican stronghold for an endangered GOP senator, tried to rally his supporters Thursday by portraying Democrats as soft on terrorists and opposed to conservative judges.

Bush chided Democrats who voted against legislation to detain and interrogate suspected terrorists, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program and the U.S.A. Patriot Act.

"When it comes to listening to the terrorists, what's the Democrat's answer? Just say no,'" Bush said, urging the audience to play along.

"When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer?"

"Just say no!" the audience retorted.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on Nov. 7, what's your answer?" Bush asked.

"Just say no!" the crowd screamed.

Bush campaigned here for Sen. Conrad Burns, a vulnerable incumbent in a tough campaign battle against Democratic challenger Jon Tester, the president of the Montana Senate. Tester was holding rallies of his own on the other side of the state Thursday and Friday with fellow Democrats Gov. Brian Schweitzer and Sen. Max Baucus.

With polls showing the public opposed to the war in Iraq, Democrats have expressed increasing optimism in recent days that they will gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House. Democrats must pick up six seats to win the Senate, a taller challenge, and both parties made last-minute efforts to increase the number of competitive races.

Montana was Bush's first stop on his final push to Election Day that includes stops in Nevada, Missouri, Iowa, Colorado, Texas, Nebraska, Kansas, Arkansas and Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0090638

The rally had the flavor of Bush's 2004 re-election campaign. Speakers blared Bush's campaign theme song, "Only in America," and the president opened his remarks with a comment he used in 2004:"It's good to be in a part of the world where the cowboy hats outnumber the ties."

Bush, invigorated by the rally, gleefully predicted that Republicans will retain control of Congress, just as they retained control of the White House in 2004 when Democrats, he said, were measuring the West Wing.

"The movers never got the call," Bush said. "The same thing is going to happen on Nov. 7. We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

Bush also said veteran Republican senators like Burns are needed to help the Senate confirm judicial conservatives to the federal bench. When Montana voters cast their ballots, they're not only deciding who will represent them in Washington, they will be deciding what kind of judges sit on federal courts across the nation, Bush said.

"We believe that judges ought to strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," Bush said.

Bush Touts Republicans In Billings (BG)

Billings Gazette, November 3, 2006

The Gazette Staff In an animated political stump speech for Montana Republicans that covered taxes, judicial nominations and the war in Iraq, President Bush spoke for about 45 minutes to supporters at MetraPark Arena on Thursday morning.

With his shirtsleeves rolled up and no tie, Bush urged Montanans to vote for Sen. Conrad Burns and Rep. Denny Rehberg to make the country a safer and better place to live.

“I’m proud to be here in Big Sky Country with this fine U.S. senator, Conrad Burns,” Bush said. “You might call him a plain-speaking fellow. I’ve heard some say he’s a little rough on the English language. Where have I heard that before? Conrad, I’m keeping good company.”

After speaking for some time about the importance of judicial nominations, Bush said the two most important issues this election season are taxes and terrorism.

Voting Republican will ensure the country takes the right track on both counts, Bush said.

Democrats will raise taxes, while Republicans will cut them, he said.

“Conrad, Denny and I have a philosophy,” Bush said. “We believe you know how to spend your money better than the federal government does. The Democrats want to take more of your money because they think they can spend it better.”

Republicans are responsible for tax cuts that bolstered the U.S. economy and helped reduce Montana’s unemployment rate, he said. But, if Democrats take control of Congress, taxes will go up despite that party’s professed love for lowering them.

“They voted against every single tax cut,” Bush said. “Time and time again, every opportunity that they had a chance to show their love of tax cuts, they voted no. If that’s their idea of love, I’d had to see what hate looks like.”

Bush also said Democrats want to withdraw troops from Iraq too soon, leaving the United States vulnerable to terrorists. He said the military’s presence in Iraq does not encourage more terrorist groups to form and defended his decision to oust Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

“When you see a threat, you can no longer hope the oceans will protect us,” Bush said. “You can no longer hope for the best.”

“I saw a threat in Saddam Hussein. Members of both parties saw a threat in Saddam Hussein. The United Nations saw a threat in Saddam Hussein,” he said. “I made the right decision to take Saddam Hussein from power. Now, Iraq is the central front in the war on terror.”

Democrats don’t have any idea how to fix the situation in Iraq, but Republicans have a plan for victory, Bush said. That plan includes helping the Iraqi government become independent and self-sustaining.

The only way the United States can fail in Iraq is to leave before the job is done, he said.

“That’s exactly what Democrats want to do,” Bush said.

Bush ended his speech by comparing the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

During World War II, Japan was America’s enemy, but today the two countries are allies, said Bush, who recently met with the Japanese prime minister. The two leaders visited Graceland together earlier this year.

DOJ_NMG_0090639

"I found it interesting on the way down to Elvis's place, I was talking about keeping the peace with the prime minister of our former enemy," Bush said.

"The lesson of history is liberty has got the capacity to convert an enemy into an ally," he said. "Liberty has got the capacity to turn a region of despair into a region of hope."

Earlier in his speech, Bush talked about the importance of maintaining Republican control of Congress so that his judicial nominees can be confirmed to the federal court system.

"Your vote determines more than who represents you in the Senate," he said. "It will also determine what kind of judges sit on federal benches all across the U.S."

Bush credited Republicans for confirming John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court, appointments Democrats tried to block, he said.

"America is better off with John Roberts and Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court of the United States," he said.

Bush also said Montana could help lessen the country's dependence on foreign oil by producing alternative forms of energy.

The president was introduced by Burns, who said Bush is not afraid to stand by his beliefs.

"He's the man who doesn't take a poll before making a decision," Burns said.

"Even though he's from Texas, he understands Montana values and cares about the principles that make our two states great."

Rehberg introduced Burns.

Bush landed at Billings Logan International Airport aboard Air Force One a few minutes early Thursday morning at 10:59 a.m. He departed on the plane around 12:35 p.m.

Bush exited the plane a few minutes after it landed, waving, and shook hands with a group of people waiting on the tarmac. Black-clad snipers were on rooftops of buildings at the airport, and a Black Hawk helicopter flew in the area. Two gray C-17 military cargo planes were on the tarmac nearby.

Among the greeters were John Bennett of Cascade, a retired staff sergeant in the Montana National Guard who was injured by a sniper in Iraq and was in a wheelchair when he shook hands with the president; Peter Ankney of Colstrip, a first lieutenant on active duty in the U.S. Marine Corps; and Mark Polakoff of Red Lodge, who operates Absaroka Search Dogs and was scheduled to receive a volunteer award from the president. Polakoff was accompanied by his German shepherd, Winda.

Jack and Pat Rehberg, parents of Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Montana, were also there.

Bush then made the short road trip to MetraPark in a fast-moving motorcade that traveled on Airport Road accompanied by patrol cars from the Billings Police Department and Montana Highway Patrol. A small group of people gathered near the intersection of Airport Road and Main Street, where the motorcade passed at about 11:17 a.m. Bush could be seen waving to the small crowd from a black limousine.

The motorcade sped through the intersection again returning to the airport at about 12:20 p.m.

Ticket holders began lining up as early as 6 this morning to see Bush. The "Montana Victory Rally" is the start of a final campaign push before the national midterm election on Tuesday.

In the past three weeks, he has made campaign appearances on behalf of Republicans in tight races for seats in the U.S. Congress.

More than 5,000 tickets had been distributed for the president's short visit to Montana to bolster Montana Republicans, especially Burns, who is in a tight race with Democratic opponent Jon Tester, a state senator from Big Sandy. Burns is running for his fourth six-year term in the Senate.

By 8 a.m. Metra's lower parking lot was full. Volunteers were placing leaflets supporting Burns beneath windshield wipers.

A line of people that stretched from the MetraPark Arena doors, around the side of the building and to the MetraPark Pavilion began moving at about 8:10 a.m.

People were cheerful but cold. Some stomped their feet and brought blankets to fend off the cold. A group of children in snowsuits and mittens played on a strip of ice near the Metra doors.

DOJ_NMG_0090640

Alan Hooker, a rancher from Luther, was among the first in line. Hooker rose at 4 a.m. and got to Metra by about 6:15. There were already 15 people ahead of him, he said.

Hooker said his son's teacher at Luther School asked him to save 17 seats for the school's seventh- and eighth-graders. He planned to place sheets of notebook paper on the seats to reserve them.

"The cell phone is going to be our connection, hopefully," he said.

Cheryl Heins and her 14-year-old daughter, Holly, of Laurel, were in line by 6:30 a.m. Heins took both her daughters to see Bush in 2001, when they got to shake his hand. Today, they were hoping to hear the president talk about family values.

"This is the world's leader," Heins said. "He's nowhere else in the world today than in Billings."

Dorothy Krnabek, a Republican campaign volunteer, was stationed at the Metra will-call ticket booth.

"Every seat in Metra is a good seat when the president comes," Krnabek said.

Another Burns campaign volunteer, Wilma Moses, brought a mystery novel and the comics section of the newspaper to keep her busy while she waited to listen to the president.

Moses wore a red plaid jacket and a red hat with three elephant pins fixed to it. She said she puzzled over which of the pieces of jewelry to wear this morning before deciding to wear them all.

One of the pins belonged to her mother. It was made of silver and rhinestones and spelled the word "GOP." Moses said her grandfather was a socialist in North Dakota in the early 1900s.

"I've been working so hard to overcome," she said.

She wanted to hear Bush talk about Iraq.

"I hope that he will talk about winning the war and a plan to end it and have success there, something to give us all hope," Moses said. "I agree that we can't just leave. But I feel for the families."

Joining Bush and Burns this morning were Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Mont., and other Republicans.

Bush's itinerary through Saturday includes stops in Elko, Nev., this afternoon; Springfield and Joplin, Mo., on Friday; and Greeley, Colo., Saturday morning. On Tuesday, the president and first lady Laura Bush will vote in Crawford, Texas, where they have a ranch.

Tickets to today's event were free, but had to be obtained from the Billings Republican campaign office by 7 p.m. Wednesday. Only those with tickets were admitted.

Black Otter Trail and all parking areas for trails atop the Rims were closed to the public for the visit until 3 p.m. today, according to the Billings Police Department.

On his arrival at Billings Logan International Airport, Bush presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Mark Polakoff of Red Lodge, who trains rescue dogs for the Absaroka Search Dogs, a volunteer organization that has worked in Montana, Wyoming and Idaho searching for lost and missing persons.

Polakoff is also a member of the 1st Special Response Group, which responds internationally to search for lost or missing Americans. He has been a volunteer pre-hospital nurse with the Red Lodge Emergency Medical Services for 18 years and is an emergency room nurse at St. Vincent Healthcare.

Published on Thursday, November 02, 2006.

Last modified on 11/2/2006 at 6:08 pm

Copyright © The Billings Gazette, a division of Lee Enterprises.

What do you think? Tell us what you thought of this story.

Not very interesting (1)

Slightly interesting (2)

Somewhat interesting (3)

Quite interesting (4)

Extremely interesting (5)

Talk Back! Post your comments, opinion or feedback about this story.

Name:

Comments:

DOJ_NMG_0090641

Comment policy:

Billingsgazette.com encourages readers to engage in civil conversation with their neighbors. Comments that are submitted are not posted to the site immediately. They go into a queue to be moderated and may take several hours to be reviewed. We will never edit or alter your comments, but we do reserve the right to remove comments that violate our code of conduct. No comment may contain:

Potentially libelous statements; such as accusing somebody of a crime, defamation of character, or statements that can harm somebody's reputation.

Obscene, explicit, or racist language.

Personal attacks, insults, threats, harassment or inciting violence.

Commercial product promotions.

If you have any questions, please contact our moderator.

Click here to report offensive or inappropriate comments.

The comments below are from readers of billingsgazette.com and in no way represent the views of The Billings Gazette or Lee Enterprises.

Hugo wrote on November 02, 2006 9:36 AM

I can already smell the sulfur.

Welcome "W" wrote on November 02, 2006 9:37 AM

Welcome to Billings, glad we have the METRA, we have the world's spotlight today on our beautiful City with such a great Future!

I'm shocked! wrote on November 02, 2006 9:38 AM

I am surprised. This article has been posted for 15 minutes now and nobody has commented about how much they dislike our President. I, for one am very pleased with President Bush and have nothing against him coming here. To those who think he's wasting time: how much time/money has our own Govenor spent doing commercial ads with candidate John Tester and photo shoots showing his support. Shouldn't he be busy serving the people of Montana, or at least claiming everyone else's work as his own?

Amazed wrote on November 02, 2006 9:39 AM

Lemmings

CJJE wrote on November 02, 2006 9:53 AM

Who's picking up the tab?!! Should be the Burns supporters since this is a political move to increase votes!! It's rediculous that this is going to cost us this amount of money!! I would stand in line that long to greet our service men and women coming home, for they are the heros. Not this president.

Welcome President Bush wrote on November 02, 2006 10:45 AM

Whether we agree with the statutes of the president or not, the very presence of this honorable figure deserves respect. We can disagree respectfully if we are so inclined. Please Billings show your high standards of respect.

Just Me wrote on November 02, 2006 10:47 AM

IWOULDN'T WALK ACROSS THE STREET!!!

Thanks for Visiting "W" wrote on November 02, 2006 11:23 AM

Thanks for Visiting "W"

all of em.... wrote on November 02, 2006 11:24 AM

all politicians are crooks, especially the president.

HA! wrote on November 02, 2006 11:24 AM

You said it, Hugo!!

I feel lucky wrote on November 02, 2006 11:26 AM

Mrs Bush was the republican who visited our neighbirhood. Very nice lady and much better received than her husband. Didn't go cause I'm true Blue, but heard she was very nice. I don't think there is much hope for good ole Conrad and after the fires this summer there shouldn't be.

John wrote on November 02, 2006 11:28 AM

Way to go W!! I voted the straight Republican ticket this morning!!

celeste wrote on November 02, 2006 11:39 AM

wank wank!

Welcome President George W wrote on November 02, 2006 11:40 AM

Weclcome to the "big city' of Montana, Wyoming home of Cattle, Ag, Oil, tourism. Prospertiy and Purpose! Thanks for Visiting

V says wrote on November 02, 2006 11:43 AM

....."Vi Veri Veniversum Vivus Vici"..... Ladies and Gentlemen - Let's sing an old favorite melody I've brought up to date while. we await the apperition of His Maleviolence. Just follow the bouncing ball..... The skyline of New York ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town.... To heck with three thousand people, Time to bring three Towers down.... Let's have a war on terror, Let's go pop ol' Saddam's cork!.... To consolidate all the power, a Reichstag fire in New York. ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town,... The streets are full of asbestos from the buildings on the ground.... George is in Sarasota, A goat tale reading World Class Dork.... The Secret Service ain't worried 'cause the target was New York ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town.... Silverstein planted the charges, Dov's remote planes flew around... Cheney stopped the Air Force to get Halliburton their pork... We know your plan worked fantastic on the skyline of New York. ..... "Remember, Remember the Fifth of November"

bo wrote on November 02, 2006 11:44 AM

All this less than a week before the election? Grasping at straws?? You're doing a heck of a job, Burnsy!

To Hugo wrote on November 02, 2006 11:44 AM

It's because it coming from under your feet!!!

Not one in the sheep herd wrote on November 02, 2006 11:47 AM

Don't worry, I made sure to hold my hand up and tell him he was "number one" when his plane came in.

Hugo & Sulpher wrote on November 02, 2006 11:50 AM

Hugo Its probably coming out of your A$$.

me wrote on November 02, 2006 11:55 AM

okay i just have to ask this if bush arrived just arfter 11 today why are ppl writing about this at 9 if they wrote it at 9 he was still in the plane coming over here

Lori wrote on November 02, 2006 11:56 AM

Welcome W! We're hoping you can help boost Conrad over the top on Tuesday! Thanks for coming to MT!

Red,White and Blue wrote on November 02, 2006 11:58 AM

To I'm Shocked,Right On My Friend though One Of (Them)Did Say He Could Smell The Sulphur,More Than Likely That Guy On His Shoulder,Welcome Mr President To The Big Sky,God Bless And Semper-Fi

Spike wrote on November 02, 2006 11:59 AM

Are Amazed and Hugo dining with the Axis powers in North Korea tomorrow night? I think they would fit right in!

Richard Miller wrote on November 02, 2006 12:01 PM

For "I'm schocked": I don't mind having Air Force One land here. I just wish that they hadn't got the door opened and had to take off without depositing several tons of B.S. on the people of Billings. I for one do not care to have the biggest cut and run artist in my city. Nor, do I care for lies that he has given us since he got in office. A pox on the arrogant bastard!

i am picking up the tab wrote on November 02, 2006 12:03 PM

i am picking up the tab, mr. big oil and hally-burton.

Rancher2 wrote on November 02, 2006 12:14 PM

I respect the office of president but not the man in office or his policies. As a fourth generation Montanan I am tired of being represented by an unintelligent crook who is an embarrassment, Conman has got to go!

ndngrl wrote on November 02, 2006 12:16 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090643

He could be anywhere in the world but he is here in our beautiful state of Montana. I'm glad he came to support Burns. I love the President and the GOP. More power to them.

Boring wrote on November 02, 2006 12:20 PM

Bush said that the Democrats don't have a plan for Iraq. What is his plan? It changes frequently. He says we have to stay until we win the war. What will we win? How will we know when we have won? Who will pay for the damages? I watched the President's talk on TV and I have never seen more bored people in one place in my life. I laughed out loud when the commentator described an "excited" crowd and the video showed just the opposite.

Retired Firefighter wrote on November 02, 2006 12:34 PM

This President promised to restore "Honor and dignity" to the White House. I don't know what is honorable about bolstering a corrupt politician because they both share the same ideology and political party.

jon wrote on November 02, 2006 12:50 PM

I'm a church-going, gun-owning fiscal and mostly social conservative and I'm sick of the direction our country has taken. I pray that all of you will have a change of heart and vote Conrad Burns out of office. Americans used to be proud to stand on their own feet and now it's all about "What's in it for me?"

TRH wrote on November 02, 2006 12:52 PM

Mr. Bush may be a well meaning guy who cleans brush at his ranch and make good jokes about how he and burns "butcher the english language" but it is unbelievable how bad a situation he was created in Iraq and how much federal debt he has created in the process. I have two committed nephews in Iraq at the moment and I sure hope they don't become more needless victims of this flawed war. Boot Bush's cronies on Nov 2!

Proud to wrote on November 02, 2006 12:52 PM

be an American! It's a historic day, Montana loves President Bush!!

Huero wrote on November 02, 2006 12:53 PM

Thanks for visiting, Mr. President! I hope this puts Burns over the top. Governer Schweitzer is dangerous enough by himself. The last thing we need to do is give him another friend in Washington. I'd vote against Conrad if there was a sensible alternative, but JON TESTER IS NOT THE ANSWER!!!

Burns must go wrote on November 02, 2006 12:58 PM

I support President Bush and Rehberg, but not Conrad. Burns is corrupt and will lose next Tuesday. He brought defeat on himself by continually serving the selfish interests of his lobbyist friends, many of them Montana grown and still exploiting the office.

ohhhhhhhhh! From Pure breed Montana'n wrote on November 02, 2006 12:59 PM

Did you just see on Q2 that Tester sent a settement that said Bush was not here to see the normal peolpe in Montana. He better stop listen to Kerry. If Tester thinks he is normal He sure isn't from Montana. Hey! Cheney is so close to Missoula today maybe he could see if Tester whats to go hunting. It is hunting season.

Billy Bob wrote on November 02, 2006 1:11 PM

How silly can we be to buy patriotism from a guy who shirked his duty? Burns should lose to show Bush we're not idiots and cannot be lied to about how he got us into Iraq.

local wrote on November 02, 2006 1:14 PM

I was just stuck on Main street for near an hour. Thank you George Bush.

Show some respect... wrote on November 02, 2006 1:15 PM

To those of you dis-respecting the president with words... I say this.... If we all showed disrespect to those we dislike this world would be in even worse shape than it is now. Grow up and get a set!

NOMoreCONMAN wrote on November 02, 2006 1:22 PM

Do you think Bush and Conman talked about their secert Iqaq polciy today? I am sure they have big plans on how to win this war. It is a disgrace to have a sitting President stump for a crook. It is saying to every politican "go ahead eat the free Sushi" as long as you are in our party we will still support you. I am a Rep., but I will vote for Tester. Sometimes what is best for your party is not best for your country.

nh wrote on November 02, 2006 1:24 PM

To CJJE: It is funny you most likely don't say that when a Democratic President Bill Clinton comes and campaigns for his candidate. It is how it works. Quit complaining. All you protesters outside of the Metra get job! People like that are one of the many reasons why I rarely support a Democratic candidate.

ack wrote on November 02, 2006 1:27 PM

Some of you comment like you actually believe the President is going to read your remarks - In case you are sitting in Air Force One right now Mr. President and reading these comments, STOP THE MADNESS IN IRAQ!!!!

Republicans wrote on November 02, 2006 1:28 PM

Any group who thinks selling your vote to the highest bitter is okay deserves nothing better than Bush and Burns. I hope you get your wish. Then when the jeck gets indicted you'll be the laughing stock of the US, which you already are. Jon Stewart is having a field day with your stupid Senator.

Amazed wrote on November 02, 2006 1:36 PM

What's to respect about a man who is clearly incompetent? And what's to respect people who blindly follow him? It sickens me that people call themselves Americans and patriotic that will support a man who fights a war based on nothing that had to do with anything, rip apart the Constitution for his own benefit and then watch America's finest die day after day with no plan other than to jump and and down shouting "Terror!"

I don't care wrote on November 02, 2006 1:41 PM

Bush has done nothing to impress me. The sooner he is out of office the better of we will be. He started something his dad did'nt finish and it's just gotten worse he needs to go!!!!!!!

Tony wrote on November 02, 2006 1:42 PM

What a disgrace this guy is...people dying everyday for a war that he lied to go into and then he is here in my homestate campaigning for a corrupt politician...Just unbelievable

Thanks for Visiting President Bush #2 wrote on November 02, 2006 1:44 PM

Any dolphin can eat the spider around the tornado, but it takes a real mating ritual to barely play pinochle with an alleged grand piano.

Could Care Less wrote on November 02, 2006 1:52 PM

Don't let the door hit you on the !$$ on your way out.

blindman wrote on November 02, 2006 1:58 PM

If most of you were deaf instead of blind I could understand your blind allegiance to somebody who cares less wether or not you can pay your bills or put food on your table or if your sons and daughters die in a war for elitist interests, but you fools can see and hear and you still cheer on nero. You deserve neither freedom or security.

Stillonmt wrote on November 02, 2006 1:58 PM

Just more tired rhetoric from the President. He attacks strawmen rather than deal with issues head on. The last thing that is needed by our country is a Republican congress that just enables his lack of leadership.

TOO LATE FOR BURNS wrote on November 02, 2006 2:07 PM

Nice try Burns, your time is up! If you stil talk to Jack, let him know I could use some money as well! Or better yet, use that money to pay for the shameless attempt to save your campaign with Georgie's vist today! SEE YA BURNS!!!!

John wrote on November 02, 2006 2:10 PM

I would not even consider or have the desire to see President Bush. Does he even have a college education? I am sure his parents had him at least finish High School.He doesnt seem to be very bright. I understand Sen. Kerry's comments on who does end up fighting the wars in this country. It is mostly low income and people of color. Their hope is that it will open the doors to attend college, get GI loans for housing. I think they should make it mandatory that one child from every family enlist in the service during war time-even the rich kids.Even if their in one the most prestigous colleges in this country. The only thing I agree with president bush on -is the comment he made. That is that both him and Conrad Burns both can make some very stupid comments. I would never support Conrad Burns or President Bush!

cc#1 wrote on November 02, 2006 2:11 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090645

I didn't attend the rally, but I was fortunate enough to catch it live on KTVQ. It was awesome! Here was a mere mortal man speaking God's truths. I literally could see the Rod of Jesse alligning the President's back. God was smiling down on Billings, Montana, today! Thank you for sticking to your convictions, Mr. President George W. Bush! Thank you for taking the time to grace us with your presence, as well! God speed to you and yours. Peace.

CDN wrote on November 02, 2006 2:12 PM

Some of you need to stop and take a deep breath. The hate on this blog is incredible. It comes from a party that says those that are in the military because they are stupid, a party that will raise Taxes if they win, a party that gives aid and comfort daily to our enemies, a party that supports gun control and gay marriage, a party that is for open borders and against judges that not make laws, a party that will grow the size of government, a party that is against energy exploration and therefore for more foreign oil, a party that believes man is so powerful, he can change the weather. It is the party that defended Bill Clinton, and attacks those that believe in GOD. Gore, Pelosi, Reid, Hillorat, Kerry, Kennedy, bi-coastal liberals control it. Even when one of their former VP candidates supports the Presidents fight against those that want to kill us, this party tosses him out. But the one thing that is apparent, the Democrat Party was no ideas to campaign on, only hate. You should be so proud.

Go Ahead..Make his day. wrote on November 02, 2006 2:12 PM

FYI-Every country, everywhere is vunerable. We live in a country where borders are a joke and immigration has exceeded native born residency. By giving the American public a false sense of security-shame on him. I wonder how many more lives would have been sacrificed if good ol W would have been at the helm of Vietnam. Did it really make a difference to them that we left? Only to the ones who survived. Our foreign relations are so strained it will take years to repair. He talks about democrats raising taxes-but the republicans have managed to increase the unemployment rate, and have promoted our oil companies to the highest food chain. Metal, plastics, wood products have all doubled in cost since the start of this administration. Taxes, taxes, taxes, but what about the cost of everything from chapstick to bailer twine. Titles do not warrant respect. When you have lives in your hands and you conduct yourself in the narcissistic mode you normally operate in, with no thought of those you hurt, you get the respect you deserve. Did he mention U.S. Navy Petty Officer 2nd Class Charles "Chuck" Komppa- you know the one they took home in a casket last night? Shame, shame, shame. Must have been too busy petting the search dog for PR. Vote another one in with the same mentality. You get what you deserve. Sadly so does everyone else.

To Cheryl Heins wrote on November 02, 2006 2:13 PM

â€œThis is the worldâ€™s leader,â€ Heins said. â€œHeâ€™s nowhere else in the world today than in Billings.â€ George W. Bush is NOT the world's leader. People who believe things like you do are what cause Bush to think he is the leader of the whole world and all countries should do what he says. How sad you're teaching your children such false detrimental beliefs.

how many people actually showed up wrote on November 02, 2006 2:16 PM

they had 5,000 tickets...how many people actually showed up? thank you protestors for standing up against corruption and being the true American voice

Can W read? wrote on November 02, 2006 2:19 PM

Just wondering if W. even mentioned the soldier's casket being taken off the plane or his family shown in the gazette today.

...etc... wrote on November 02, 2006 2:32 PM

George is a great guy, i know we can all "arm chair" his job....but when it gets right down to it, he responded the way an American President should respond to terrorism. I really dont care if there are people being held without any rights.....the people working in the trade center on 9/11 had no choice....if we can make a few of them talk and get the "bad guys" so be it. I am tired of useless negotiations that the other side thinks are weak and cowardly. George has some "b_lls" and has all of the information so he can act accordingly. Keep up the good work and God Bless!

W is the World Leader wrote on November 02, 2006 2:36 PM

W is the World Leader its sure not any wimp from the UN, why is he the leader, not just all of our weapons and nukes, its our beliefs in freedom, we stand up for freedom, against genocide in Africa, against all violence, and against the fools who believe in global warming which is actually caused by Sun Spots! Read the bible every body. Rev. Smalam

jess a guy wrote on November 02, 2006 2:36 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090646

It was a fantastic production. Martina was better but this one cost one hell of a lot more. This was purely a photo and press opportunity. Sad that the leader of the #2 world power needs to do so much work on the elections but at the same time takes more vacation from his post than any other president in US history.

Borrow and Spend wrote on November 02, 2006 2:42 PM

Burns and Bush.....equally inarticulate, dishonest and truly not Conservatives. True Conservatives know a little about responsible spending. I am one of many Conservatives who are voting for Tester!

Los Cangrejos wrote on November 02, 2006 2:52 PM

I just don't understand the hate and vitriol being spewed here. Disagree all you like with Bush, but understand that he IS the president of the United States of America and is due respect if only for only that reason. You people disgust me as much as those who do not rise and doff their hats when the flag comes by in the parade. Dissent all you want, but please be respectful.

SjonesSR wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

He is a very good speaker in person. I was amazed at how much energy and charisma he had and how clearly he stated his message. Somehow we never see that on the news. It must be a sport for the media to find that one clip each night that makes our president look bad.

milkseat wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

For every vote Bush might have gotten Conrad today he lost Burns two-coming from all the people in 4th Ave and Main St. traffic jams!

Jim wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

We have a wonderful President and what an honor to have him in the Big Sky country. We are so fortunate to have him as President instead of John Kerry. John Kerry is a liberal, unpatriotic man.

was conrad sober wrote on November 02, 2006 2:55 PM

did connie stay away from the bottle today

A Real Patriot wrote on November 02, 2006 2:55 PM

Patriot - a person who regards himself or herself as a defender, esp. of individual rights, against presumed interference by the federal government.

Not my leader wrote on November 02, 2006 3:12 PM

Impeach!

SHIRT AND NO TIE wrote on November 02, 2006 3:19 PM

Dear Gazette Liberal Writer: So what if the President showed up in casual attire.....that is what Montana is all about! Try attending a function at Alberta Bair Theater or go listen to the Billings Symphony....a lot of Montanans wear blue jeans and cowboy boots. Mr. President, you fit right in Billings! We are proud of you and thank you for paying us a visit!

Tammy wrote on November 02, 2006 3:20 PM

Hey Hugo~~~You must've been at the wrong place this morning-Demo hell- I was inside the Metra-Cheering on our Wonderful President George W. and what a pleasure that was-All I could smell was the sweet scent of Republican victory--God Bless America and George W.....

DUMB AND DUMBER! wrote on November 02, 2006 3:23 PM

Corndog and the Presidunce! Hey, funny movies about two really dumb friends are outta style now. Didn't anyone tell the Repubies??? Bwaaaaaaaaaaaa! Ho ho hey hey, how many troops did you kill today, georgie? Last month only 101, and SEVEN HUNDRED WOUNDED! But tell us, Dumbya, just why the twins aren't in Eyerak? Are they AWOL, like YOU were?????? What a joke.

Desperate measures CONman Burns wrote on November 02, 2006 3:24 PM

CONman is like the bully kid on the block who's getting beat up (by a younger fresher Jon Tester in this case) - bring in your older brother. Bring in Bush, bring in Cheney, bring them ALL in - you still will lose ConMAN

TO CDN wrote on November 02, 2006 3:26 PM

Sounds like you might need to take a big breath. You sound very one sided and very hateful. Don't forget that the majority of us are probably in the middle. Not with you and not with the protesters. You sound hateful to me!

DOJ_NMG_0090647

Baffled wrote on November 02, 2006 3:29 PM

Number 2 world power?

Patriot wrote on November 02, 2006 3:34 PM

Burns and Bush. Get out, and stay out of our State!

Native Hunter wrote on November 02, 2006 3:36 PM

Just goes to show Conrad can't stand on his own two feet in Montana but has to "go Washington" by bringing in the worst president in US history. I wonder if Bush could point out Billings on a map? Funny Bush talked about taxes and Iraq. We've been in Iraq six years and it keeps getting worse and the Repubplicans have run up the national debt to insane levels.

Bigsky wrote on November 02, 2006 3:39 PM

The only gutsy thing Bush has EVER done is being in the same state as Cheney during hunting season.

NE Mt wrote on November 02, 2006 3:43 PM

My question that would be posed to the President and to Cheney as well.... How come they are so vehemently supporting Conrad Burns-someone that is being investigated in scandal after scandal. Is this the political version of the good ol' boys club? Get Burns in office no matter what... Because they might also have something to hide?

Poor Dems wrote on November 02, 2006 3:53 PM

We have President Bush and you Jon Carry!

a sad time for america wrote on November 02, 2006 4:12 PM

He makes me want to throw up.

WOW!! GO W wrote on November 02, 2006 4:25 PM

I'm a decomcrat voting for Republicans. They have the plans and ideas. It was nice to see our president in Billings.

what wrote on November 02, 2006 4:28 PM

Keep supporting Bush. He could care less if you loose a child in Iraq or have to work two or three jobs to make ends meet. What a bunch of suckers. Bush has you right where he wants you come election day.

poor rancher wrote on November 02, 2006 4:30 PM

Is that AF One I smell, or is it just the Laurel refinery?

Rygel wrote on November 02, 2006 4:34 PM

I love him.

former forest service wrote on November 02, 2006 4:36 PM

Remember Forest Service Firefighters.

Brian Casteel wrote on November 02, 2006 4:39 PM

I thought President Bush was awesome today. My overall opinion of him hasn't been very good, but he earned a great deal of respect from me today with the intensity and strength of his speech. It was an awesome experience that you cannot get by watching it on TV or hearing a speech on the radio.

To Retired Firefighter wrote on November 02, 2006 4:41 PM

It means doing what's right and what needs to be done without checking the polls first. Oh yeah, also means, keeping your pants up in the Oval Office.

The Borders are open to Canada.... wrote on November 02, 2006 4:41 PM

If you don't like our country and it's leaders do something.....it's your choice to stay here (majority rules in elections) or go. Don't let the door hit your butt on the way out!

Kennyg wrote on November 02, 2006 4:42 PM

What a waste of money. This country is trillions in debt, and in a war for big oil. So what does W do but come to Billings to preach to the people who voted to let him get us into this mess. Also why should the taxpayers pick up the overtime for the police and Sheriffs deputies, the Republicans should cover that too!

Evangelist Ted Haggard out of closet wrote on November 02, 2006 4:47 PM

I don't understand why you Republicans hate homosexuals so much. Another of yours just came out of the closet, Reverand Ted Haggard, leader of the National Association Of Evangelicals just admitted to a three year affair with a man. He's one of yours, you judgmental neocons. Why are you always saying your platform is about what you call family values and you hate homosexuals and say that democrats promote it, but you sure have had a lot of your own come out of the closet this year. maybe you should try to be less judgmental.

Please Tester supporters wrote on November 02, 2006 4:51 PM

I'm begging you. It's one thing to show your ignorance in supporting Tester - please, please try to spell properly, or at least put together a coherent sentence. And yes, I'm aware of a few typos in responses from Bush/Burns supporters, but it only takes a glance through here to see which side has more of those remotely intelligent enough to cast a knowledgeable vote.

Nutcracker wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Party loyalists are nuts best poured into a bowl and served before Christmas dinner. This is especially true of Republican loyalists this election cycle and the next. Bush's stupidity is killing your sons and daughters in an unnecessary and poorly executed war in Iraq and he is making you pay for it. If Clinton had done this, your panties would be in a wad so deeply embedded we could see your pant size every time you opened your mouth. Yet Republican loyalists rally around the Bush dressed up like Howdy Doody, or should I say Howdy Dude-y, because he claims he won't raise your taxes. This war is costing a fortune. Where is the money going to come from? You! Bush is borrowing all this money so he doesn't have to face the responsibility of being the bad guy who forces you to pay back his debts. It is called passing the buck. It pleases old Conrad no end to help Bush take your money and put your kids' lives in danger for no good reason. So although you may put a higher priority on your money than your children's lives, Conrad will cost you both. Tester will at least try to spare your kids.

Stillonmt wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Bush was ignoring the proper way to measure taxes. As V.V. Chari of the University of Minnesota explained at a conference for journalists on Oct. 17, The true burden of government is what it spends today and in the future." When a politician brags, I cut your taxes," that's not what really matters.... When a government spends money, it commands resources that are no longer available for use by the private sector. If it chooses to borrow the money rather than levying taxes to finance transfer payments and the purchase of goods and services, the government is only postponing the inevitable taxes, Chari said. HT to Brad DeLong.

Andy from Big Sandy wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Conrad Burns took dirty Abramhoff money. Bush has direct connections to Abramhoff. Simply follow the money. Burns & Bush are crooked peas in a pod. It is also very telling that Burns needs the star power of the President to get people to vote for him. That should say it all right there, time to take out the crooked trash, bye bye Burnsey. Ps, who paid for the Presidents trip, including massive security costs, to our great state? I suspect taxpayers, since Bush did issue one medal to the dog handler. Presidential duties right?

SBrown wrote on November 02, 2006 5:01 PM

To all of you riding George's a$$ for spending money to come support Burns, why aren't you voicing your opinion when your own Schweitzer takes time from his position to "waste" all the money on his stumps for Testor...Typical Democratic behavior...a lot of talk and no action...thank god Bush has the balls to stand up for what he believes in and follows through with actions to support his words...God Bless the GOP!!!

Gary wrote on November 02, 2006 5:03 PM

With two thirds of the country ready to throw Bush out with the wash water, at least he provides us Montanans with a few laughs if nothing else!

Ikin wrote on November 02, 2006 5:03 PM

To the one who said President Bush doesn't care if the troops die. Do You mean the stupid uneducated troops Mr Karry was talking about the other day? Batched joke or not it was pretty tasteless. Did he care about the troops he spit in the face of after Viet Nam. Go play in Lewistown with your little pal Jane Fonda and ask her how she feels about Troops oh I forgot Ted got rid of her. My father was a Viet Nam vet and an American Hero who was drafted by a democratic president. I think our President has the utmost respect for our troops and is genuinly saddened as am I when one of our troops die.

SBrown wrote on November 02, 2006 5:06 PM

kudos to "shirt and no tie"

NOPE! wrote on November 02, 2006 5:10 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090649

Nope! None there! No WMDs in there either! Gee, I can't seem to find any WMDs! aha,ah,aha,ha,ha,ha,ha,ha! That Dumbya Bush. What a funny guy! While slaughtering over SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND innocent Iraqis, he's crackin' jokes! What a cutup! What a retard! What an evil, evil little man! He truly IS a son of a bush! Remember, granddaddy Prescott Bush was one of the biggest financiers of the Hitler! Like granddaddy like retarded grandson! This moron is NOT welcome in Montana! And take the Missery moron with you!

GEORGE BUSH=TOUGH DUDE wrote on November 02, 2006 5:18 PM

While Bush is fighting terrorists the American Left is doing all it can to defeat Bush's efforts. The NEW YORK TIMES gave our enemies a heads up when they published America's top secrets telling terrorists how the U.S. was tracking their blood money (SWIFT). CNN airs enemy propaganda snuff films and TESTER plus the other LEFT-WING kooks want to abolish the Patriot Act and take away our tools to find and combat terrorists. THANK YOU GEORGE BUSH FOR YOUR TOUGHNESS DESPITE THE AMERICAN LEFT and their allies in the LIBERAL PRESS CORP going to war against YOU!

To CC #1 wrote on November 02, 2006 5:25 PM

What the heck is a Rod of Jesse? I ran it on the Internet and all I got back were a bunch of porn sites. Surely THAT wasn't what you saw aligning with the president's back?!?

I'm mad wrote on November 02, 2006 5:28 PM

Are you people for real? You're upset because you had to wait in traffic for a few minutes while the motorcade safely passed through Airport & Main? What did you expect to do - cruise by with the Presidential Limo and escort them? What idiots!

Democrat Here wrote on November 02, 2006 5:33 PM

And I have to say - after hearing the President's speech and hearing what Tester has been saying lately, I am going to be voting for Burns this time around. Tester is just not what this state needs and he is definitely not being honest with Montanans saying that he has never voted for taxe increases. I'm pretty upset with my own party because it is the extreme left that is driving us JFK democrats over the line to the Republicans because they represent us better.

silent bob wrote on November 02, 2006 5:39 PM

bush is not a Texan, he just plays one on T.V.

to Please Tester supporter wrote on November 02, 2006 5:43 PM

We're talking about the future of the FREE WORLD and you're worried about typos? Take off the blinders. Yes, I support Buch but Burms has to go.

dlm wrote on November 02, 2006 5:45 PM

what conrad burns said about the firefighters is truth. This comes from my experience fighting the yellowstone fires of 1988 and watching them fight the derby fires and lighting backfires 10 miles away from the fire. Furthermore he wasn't talking about all firefighters he was talking about federal firefighters.

billingsguy wrote on November 02, 2006 5:46 PM

Sure wish I could have personally thanked him for tying up traffic for so long. Oh yeah to personally thank him for spending around 7000 dollars for a 3 hour stop.

dumb and dumber wrote on November 02, 2006 5:52 PM

My nephew died in Iraq. I don't know what to say to his son when he gets older. This war is useless and immoral. Bush knew it and continues to lie. I will never forgive him.

RCM wrote on November 02, 2006 5:52 PM

I watched the President's speech on TV. Some of his statements were simply illogical. He said he does not believe we create more terrorists by fighting them? That's not what his own intelligence agencies are telling him in the National Intelligence Estimate he released to the public. Then he stated the fact that 9/11 happened when we didn't have troops in Iraq, as though if we had started the war earlier, 9/11 wouldn't have happened. Apparently we will need troops in every country on Earth that could possible harbor terrorists (including this one? Can you say police state?). Just how far are we supposed to let this contagious form of paranoia lead us?

disgusted with demos wrote on November 02, 2006 6:06 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090650

what an awesome time to see Mr Bush the President of the USA. I think I sense the same hatred after losing in 04. Get ready again and dammit get over it sooner.We won you lost. Get it in your head. The majority rules quit whining and go do something constructive with your lives. Go Bush Burns Denny And the Grand Old Party

Carlos Phears wrote on November 02, 2006 6:16 PM

More rhetoric and fearmonging!! Has been anybody ever become financially better off because their taxes were cut? What a contradiction to talk about liberty abroad while being destroyed at home!

Please Tester Supporters wrote on November 02, 2006 6:23 PM

Not worried about typos darlin', just somewhat annoyed by those too lazy or ignorant to make the effort to appear literate. I am pretty sure the FREE WORLD will be fine long after we're gone, too. Untwist your knickers

A real military veteran wrote on November 02, 2006 6:46 PM

I'm curious just how deep it would get in the Metra if you stacked all the corpses that are the result of GWB's war in there. I'm sure there's a special place in Hell for those who consider torture and murder the "moral" thing to do.

ExFed wrote on November 02, 2006 6:53 PM

Lori.....in case you haven't noticed....Burns is already way over the top...but ...never mind.

jill wrote on November 02, 2006 6:59 PM

So is Bush saying he's such a weak president that he can't veto any tax increase bill the new demo majority congress will try to pass?

cc#1 wrote on November 02, 2006 7:04 PM

To whomever posted on 11/2/06 @ 5:25 p.m., to "CC#1," if you read the bible, go to Isaiah 11:1,2. Also, you may Google, "The Rod of Jesse." I hope this helps. I'm sorry you got porn. Peace.

Thank You wrote on November 02, 2006 7:34 PM

Mr. President: Thank you for coming to Billings. It is a great honor for us to have you here. We hope that you will come visit us again.

I expected more protesters! wrote on November 02, 2006 7:35 PM

As many angry people who sound off on these message boards I thought I'd see lots more protesters out. Onlt 70 and most of them from out of town. I think it means many of you are double posting, or your chicken to go out in public with a sign. I also get a kick out of the posts from people of claim to be conservative voting for Tester. John Kerry stated what democrats think about our soldiers. I will not help send another democrat to join the ranks of John Kerry.

Native Son wrote on November 02, 2006 7:57 PM

I am pleased that the President of the United States was able to make it to the Magic City today. What an incredible experience for young, old & those in between to see our President speak. It doesn't change the fact that Conrad Burns is a LIAR. Conrad lied when he pledged to serve only two terms. Conrad has lied repeatedly about the Abramhoff affair. Heck, Conrad lied intially about the interaction with the firefighters at the Billings Airport. As a member of conservative fourth generation Montana family I am urging others out there to forego the route of FEAR and vote in a native Montanan, Jon Tester, to serve as OUR representative in D.C. If he doesn't perform we'll put him back on the farm, but it's time for a change from Conrad. As for President Bush he has managed to oversee 2,815 of our best & brightest KIA and 12,000+ wounded. All this half a world away, while EVERY SINGLE DAY illegal immigrants come across our border(s) by the hundreds. Why? President Bush has failed to secure and protect our borders and NOBODY can deny that.

Wow!!! wrote on November 02, 2006 8:07 PM

A Con backing a Con. Now that's a story the Republicans are use to.

Rick wrote on November 02, 2006 8:17 PM

Bush in all his glory. Why does he not take a few moments to pay respect to one of the troops Bush sent to his death, Petty Officer Komppa and attend the funeral?

Explain it to me again... wrote on November 02, 2006 8:23 PM

Why is it that so many want Burns out but these same characters don't really seem to want Tester in? This has turned into a referendum on Burns and not a nod toward Tester. A silly way to vote. Anger that is...I support Burns!

DOJ_NMG_0090651

Jane wrote on November 02, 2006 8:24 PM

Corruption loves company?

Bryon wrote on November 02, 2006 8:24 PM

I had to work today, so I couldn't go. However, after reading most of the posts on the several articles dealing with good 'ol Georgie and his little visit, it is plain to see he is up to his usual tactics. To try to associate terrorist with voting anything other than Republicans is just obsurd. Scare tactics and smoke screens are all he utilized today. Him showing up is just proof that Burns is on his way out. Of course Democrats have to raise taxes. Republicans spend all the money and just print more. We can't do that in our households so what makes this president or the rest of the Republicans think that they can just spend and not ever have to pay anything back? The money has to come from somewhere. The dollar isn't worth anything anymore. Thanks Georgie. You took a surplus created during the Clinton administration and totally wiped your hind end with that continue to waste more money. One thing is for sure when a Republican gets into office: We are going to fight somebody and the defecit will increase. Thanks Georgie.

johnnie bee rotten wrote on November 02, 2006 8:43 PM did luv ya w tour pays with pass me another scotch connie? and did the eat at tomain tommies eatery aka the milky way??? rehbergs old joint on poly drive

sam wrote on November 02, 2006 8:47 PM

It is simple. GOP means less taxes for all income levels. The dems mean more taxes for all income levels PERIOD.

Poncho wrote on November 02, 2006 9:00 PM

For all you uninformed Republicans, your President thinks it is funny to pass gas when he is in the company of White House staff or news reporters. He is just a laugh a minute. The smell never emited from Hugo as you people assert. It comes from the top-the Commander in Chief.

What a Great Story (Draft Dodger arrives in Air Force 1 wrote on November 02, 2006 9:05 PM

The sneakiest Draft Dodging Fool our country has ever seen, and mainly because the Far Right just ignores it and who W really is. Do any of you truly realize what a sneak this man was, and has not been held accountable for anything because your party just let's it go. Hello, is anyone home? How can any rational American endorse this clown and then the other Bozo by the name of The CON man. Your party is at the bitter depths of despair, and you backing this class of Morons shows your true character. You guys are Incredible and should be embarrassed to be in the same building as W. & Con Man at the same time. Disgusting time for your party and all the Morons that follow in your footsteps. Hopefully, someday the Right Wing will be a thing of the past.

Al V. wrote on November 02, 2006 9:13 PM

I ate lunch today at Pug Mahones. The place was packed during Bush's speech. Food was great. I bet the Metra wasn't. It looked like carefully choreographed camera work to me.

2 JUST ME wrote on November 02, 2006 9:20 PM

Well you would have had to walk across the street, because that is where the protesters were directed to go.

Click to enlarge

Click to enlarge

Transcript of Bush speech

Read the entire transcript of President's Bush's remarks at MetraPark Arena on Thursday, November 2, 2006.

President Bush at MetraPark

President Bush addressed large crowd at MetraPark Arena on behalf of Montana GOP candidates. November 2, 2006

President’s visit draws protesters

(169 today, 169 total)

Bush touts Republicans in Billings

(133 today, 133 total)

Gazette Opinion: Tester would bring welcome change in U.S. Senate

(70 today, 177 total)

Letter: CNN irresponsible to show soldiers being shot
(47 today, 74 total)
Burns, Tester tax positions put in perspective
(46 today, 46 total)
Stories that have received the most comments in the last 24 hours.
Football lights autistic boy's athletic fire
(62 ratings)
Letter: Which president is coming to Billings?
(71 ratings)
Letter: Why would anybody back Bush and Burns?
(138 ratings)
Letter: CNN irresponsible to show soldiers being shot
(416 ratings)
Gazette Opinion: Tester would bring welcome change in U.S. Senate
(823 ratings)
Stories that have received the most high ratings in the last 48 hours
Bush touts Republicans in Billings
President's visit draws protesters
Sailor's body taken to Columbus
GOP putting on its best face for presidential visit
'Brothers' in Iraq grieve over reservist
1,000s get tickets to see Bush as president begins 3-day blitz
Michigan executive new director of ABT
Lawyer seeks long-time justice's job
Crows returning in force, leave big mess downtown
Tickets available for wine class
Counselor to speak to support group
Women of the Moose host bazaar Saturday
Lockwood flu clinic is Tuesday
Angela's Piazza receives grant
Back to Top | Home | News | Sports | Entertainment | Features | Opinion | Public Notices | Classifieds | Privacy
Lee Enterprises Regional Newspapers | Butte | Helena | Missoula | Rapid City | Bismarck | Casper | The Prairie Star | Western Business

This Election, Modest Tour For President (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg
The New York Times, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont., Nov. 2 — If there is one thing the White House can usually count on when President Bush campaigns in small, Republican-leaning cities like this one, it is friendly wall-to-wall news coverage of his arrival. And his visit here on Thursday did make the front page of The Billings Gazette.

But news of his impending arrival took second billing in the paper. It ran below the fold and under a package of articles about the return of a local sailor's body from Iraq, accompanied by a photograph of the flag-draped coffin at Billings Logan International Airport.

Mr. Bush's visit certainly was the subject of local talk radio. But it was mixed with grim talk of newspaper endorsements for the Democratic candidate for Senate here, Jon Tester, leading a local conservative radio host to tell a dejected caller he doubted endorsements were any more influential than "visits of luminaries or stars or political mucky-mucks coming in from the national scene."

DOJ_NMG_0090653

During the last two elections, the fumes of Air Force One worked like political magic dust for the candidates lucky enough to score visits from Mr. Bush.

Candidates flew to Washington just to be seen arriving back home on his 747. Local newspapers doubled as welcome mats, and television reporters and radio hosts excitedly echoed his verbal jabs at Democrats long after he had left.

But 2006 is not 2004 or, for that matter, 2002, when Mr. Bush's last minute, 17-city tour won credit for helping his party buck history by gaining seats in a midterm election cycle in which it also held the presidency.

This time around, Mr. Bush is a less popular president and is on a more modest tour. He is visiting carefully chosen districts and states like this one, where he won handily in 2004 and where his aides believe he can provide pivotal help in the tight election battle between Senator Conrad Burns and Mr. Tester, whose lead over Mr. Burns has shrunk in recent weeks. Mr. Burns's seat is one of six that could determine which party controls the Senate.

Mr. Bush is more popular here than he is elsewhere in the country, with an approval rating of 45 percent, according to the Montana State University-Billings poll. But that is considerably lower than it was two years ago, and his visit showed the new political reality that confronts him wherever he goes this election season, even in usually solid patches of Bush Country like this one: With those low poll ratings and bad news out of Iraq inescapable, his visits are as likely to galvanize the other side as they are to buck up local Republicans.

That new dynamic, helped along by new technology, played out on the local political blog featured on the Gazette's Web edition. There were plenty of excited posts like this one, from "JJ," "I'm anxiously waiting to see the president of this beautiful country! I am a Republican and proud to be!!! I admire Bush and agree with what he stands for as a human being and our President!"

But there were angry rejoinders, such as this dispatch from "NOT my president": "Never, in the history of our 'compassionate' country, have I been as ashamed of a person as I am with the man who currently lives in the White House."

In a state where Mr. Bush beat Senator John Kerry by 20 percentage points two years ago, it was all too much for "SHOCKED," who wrote: "I am just shocked at the hatred that has been shown in these blogs toward our president. You should all be ashamed of yourselves for acting like children rather then rational grownups. What is happening to America??"

Similar scenes have played out across the country as Mr. Bush has begun stumping more vigorously for candidates. In the Republican stronghold of LaPlume, Pa., when Mr. Bush went to raise money for Representative Don Sherwood, an embattled Republican incumbent, a local radio host lamented news that students would protest the president, saying, "It's not cool to like President Bush these days."

In an article about Mr. Bush's planned visit on Friday to the conservative enclave of Le Mars, Iowa, The Des Moines Register quoted Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Christian Alliance, as saying the president's visit could be "a marginal plus" when local conservatives are so deflated.

But here in Billings it was a plus that Mr. Burns's campaign was eager to have, giving the president full coverage on local television.

Republican strategists say Mr. Bush is not going to have the same influence he had in 2002 — the first elections after the Sept. 11 attacks, when his approval ratings were exceptionally high — or in 2004, when he was a candidate with tens of millions of dollars of advertising promoting him. But party officials say he is still the name-brand Republican for base voters.

"Despite a challenging election cycle, he's a singular force," said Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

And aboard Air Force One, a senior White House official said Montana was one of two Senate contests where Mr. Bush's top strategists believe he can have the most impact. "In a smaller community," he said, "you get so much more buzz."

And buzz Mr. Bush did get. The two major local news stations broke into regular programming to show Air Force One landing, though neither Mr. Burns, nor the other candidate for whom Mr. Bush was stumping, Representative Denny Rehberg, went to meet the plane.

DOJ_NMG_0090654

"It's an amazing experience," said Jodi Hathaway, the correspondent on KULR, the local NBC affiliate. "It's just really amazing to see this very famous, famous piece of aircraft."

On KTVQ, the local CBS affiliate, the anchor Alex Tyson said in hushed tones as the camera focused on the aircraft, "Again we are awaiting the president of the United States to get off of Air Force One."

But Ms. Tyson added that the latest New York Times/CBS poll showed some of "the lowest ratings of Mr. Bush's presidency," and only "29 percent approve of his handling of Iraq, so it will be interesting to see what he says in his speech this hour with regard to the war."

Her viewers did not have to wait to find out, as KTVQ and KULR ran the speech live, in its entirety, over roughly 40 minutes, without interruption. Mr. Bush addressed Iraq head-on before 5,000 cheering supporters, saying: "The only way we can fail is if we leave before the job is done. And that's exactly what the Democrats want to do."

That charge, as well as his assertion that Democrats would raise taxes, led the local newscasts, with the anchor Emily Nantz relaying his statement that voters should make their choices based on two issues: "who will tax people less," she said, "and which party will keep Americans safe." That segment was soon followed, however, by a report on the few dozen protesters calling for an end to the war.

Matt McKenna, a spokesman for Mr. Tester, said Mr. Bush's visit would serve to "fire up" Democrats because local voters had a problem with "not just the president, but anybody who comes from out of state who tries to push us around and tell us how to vote."

But Mr. Burns's spokesman, Jason Klindt, said he was not worried about that. "How could the other side get more riled up?" Mr. Klindt said. "They already are."

He said Mr. Bush had provided a crucial spark for local Republicans.

Kristi Angel, managing editor of the Gazette, said the visit would get plenty more coverage in Friday's newspaper, and said it would have gotten better play on Thursday had it not been for the arrival of the body of the dead sailor, Petty Officer Second Class Chuck Komppa of the Navy.

"That is our first really local soldier that's been killed in combat," Ms. Angel said.

Bush Hits GOP Outposts, Dems Optimistic (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 3, 2006

President Bush, campaigner in chief for a party in peril, set out on a rescue mission for embattled candidates in the unlikeliest of places Thursday as Republicans struggled to minimize their losses in next week's elections.

Democrats expressed growing optimism that their long season out of power might soon end. Sen. Chuck Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senate campaign organization, claimed strong early voting in a long-shot race in Arizona and said it was "harbinger of a wave" that would benefit his party.

Five days before the election, Democratic strategists said none of their incumbents in either house of Congress was trailing — and Republicans did not disagree.

Republicans disputed Schumer's claim about Arizona, but even so, the GOP side of the political ledger was far less positive. Strategists already have written off the re-election prospects of incumbent Sens. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio, as well as six or more seats in GOP hands in the House. Dozens more Republican lawmakers — powerbrokers and backbenchers, conservatives and moderates — struggled to survive in a campaign shadowed by the war in Iraq and scandal at home.

"We've been through this before," Bush said in Billings, Mont., projecting confidence as he embarked on his save-the-majority tour. "We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

His itinerary showed it would be a struggle. The pre-election flight plan for Air Force One consisted of areas of the country where Republicans have unexpectedly run into trouble — House seats in Colorado, rural Nevada and Kansas, and gubernatorial races in Arkansas, Iowa and Nevada, as well as Sen. Conrad Burns' bid for a fourth term in Montana.

DOJ_NMG_0090655

Western Nebraska, too, was ticketed for a presidential visit, Bush's presence deemed needed to save a House seat that Democrats last held 50 years ago.

Democrats must pick up 15 seats to gain control of the House. Their magic number is six in the Senate.

Candidates everywhere were launching the final television appeals of a long and costly campaign. Actor Paul Newman starred in one, a solo performance in which he called on Connecticut voters to turn three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman out of office and install Democratic contender Ned Lamont. "It's tough times out there, and Connecticut needs someone who is young, fresh and spunky," the 81-year-old Newman said of Lamont, 52.

Democrats said they were winning because of the public's growing dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

Polls show more Americans — now a clear majority — see the war as a mistake and far fewer support how the president has handled the conflict.

Bush showed no signs of flinching as he spoke to a crowd in Billings.

"Imagine this: We're in the midst of a war on terror, and one of the most fundamental fights is in Iraq, and yet the Democrats have no plan for victory. They have no idea how to win. Harsh criticism is not a plan for victory."

Democrats were undeterred.

"The White House seems to be playing into our hands," Schumer, D-N.Y., told reporters as part of a bullish preview of the Democrats' prospects for Senate races.

"In an effort to strengthen their base, they keep reminding the public that there's not going to be any change in Iraq," he said, referring to Bush's statement on Wednesday that he wants Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to remain in office through the end of his term.

Despite the undeniable trouble they confronted, some Republicans said they had made gains in recent days in at least some races that had earlier looked lost.

Burns' race was one. Once far behind Democratic challenger Jon Tester in public and private polls, he appeared to have closed the gap in the campaign's closing days. Democrats said they were not worried, but Bush's visit, combined with a late infusion of cash by the GOP senatorial committee, suggested Republicans had not given up hope.

GOP strategists also said their prospects appeared relatively bright for a seat in Texas that former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay once held, and expressed hope they could yet win the battle to replace disgraced former GOP Rep. Mark Foley in Florida.

The Republican candidate in Texas, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, is running as a write-in contender after the party lost a court fight to replace DeLay's name on the ballot.

In Florida, Foley's name is on the ballot, even though he quit Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually inappropriate computer messages he had sent to teenage congressional pages. The replacement candidate is state Rep. Joe Negron, and under state law, votes cast for Foley will count for him.

The district is strongly Republican, and the GOP House campaign committee has spent more than $1.6 million in the past month trying to save the seat.

At the same time, House Democrats have expanded their advertising efforts into numerous races once thought safe for Republicans. Strategists in both parties said nearly 20 Republican-held seats could tip either way in a belt of states stretching from Connecticut through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana.

One of the most endangered is Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, accused of abusing his ex-mistress. According to one person familiar with the case, he agreed to pay her about $500,000 in a settlement last year that contained a powerful incentive for her to keep quiet until after Election Day. Cynthia Ore has received part of the money, and will lose some of the rest if she talks publicly about the issue before then, this source said.

Bush Cites Chief Justice In Vote Rally (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090656

Searching for new arguments to mobilize conservative voters, President Bush said Thursday that Chief Justice John Roberts would not be on the Supreme Court if Democrats controlled the Senate.

Bush told voters at rallies in the red states of Montana and Nevada that if Democrats take control of the Senate, they could affect what kind of judges sit on federal courts.

Roberts' earlier nominations to a lower federal appeals court were blocked by the Senate when it was under Democratic control, Bush said. The Senate approved Bush's nomination of Roberts to head the Supreme Court last year with 22 Democrats voting for him and 22 Democrats voting against him.

"I want you to hear this loud and clear: If the Democrats controlled the Senate, John Roberts would not be the Chief Justice today," Bush said at a rally in Billings, Mont., where incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is locked in a tough race with challenger John Tester.

Bush then flew to Nevada to boost congressional candidate Dean Heller, using the John Roberts argument again to whip up conservative voters. A recent poll showed the incumbent Republican senator, John Ensign, with a wide lead over his Democratic opponent, Jack Carter, son of former President Jimmy Carter.

"If you want good, sound, conservative judges who will not legislate from the bench, you send Republicans back to the United States Senate," Bush said.

Bush was on the first day of a final six-day campaign swing before Election Day. His schedule has him appearing only in states he won in the 2004 presidential race and away from swing states where he is a more polarizing figure who might hurt GOP candidates.

The 2nd District of Nevada where Bush stopped hasn't been won by a Democrat since its creation 25 years ago, and Bush's visit there was a sign of how much trouble Republicans face. Bush became the first sitting president to visit Elko since Herbert Hoover campaigned there in 1932 on the eve of his loss to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Bush appeared upbeat despite predictions that Democrats are poised to take control of at least one chamber of Congress in Tuesday's election. He said those forecasts are premature and smiled broadly as he appeared before cheering crowds, shaking all the hands he could reach and telling jokes. "It is nice to be in a part of the country where the cowboy hats outnumbered the ties," he said to loud cheers.

But he made one gaffe in Montana that may be a sign of the toll of frequent campaign trips. He spoke of the lives lost on Sept. 11, 2001, at the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and Lancaster, Pa. Lancaster is 165 miles east of where United Flight 93 crashed into a field in Shanksville, killing everyone on board.

On Final Campaign Swing, Bush Visits Deep Red Territory (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont., Nov. 2 -- President Bush warned Thursday that a Democratic Senate would block many of his judicial nominees and never allow justices such as John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. onto the Supreme Court, a message intended to win back his restive conservative base.

Bush flew here to help Sen. Conrad Burns stage a comeback after trailing Democratic challenger Jon Tester for months. Republicans in Washington had given up on Burns, but as his poll numbers began ticking back up, the White House saw an opportunity to reverse the odds, a move that if successful would make it difficult for Democrats to recapture the Senate.

The visit to Montana opened a six-day, 10-state final campaign swing for the president as he left Washington for the last time until Tuesday's elections. From here, he headed to Elko, Nev., and planned to campaign Friday in Missouri for Sen. James M. Talent, who is locked in the nation's tightest Senate race. Bush also plans to hit friendly areas in Iowa, Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, where he will vote before returning to the White House to watch returns Tuesday.

A Republican president normally would not need to come to a conservative bastion such as Montana this close to an election, nor to Nevada's 2nd District, which has never voted for a Democrat since it was created in 1982. But Bush is playing defense in red-state territory and sticking to states that voted for him two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0090657

Although Bush's approval ratings remain mired in the high 30s, the White House believes he can still make a difference in traditionally Republican districts and states by energizing core supporters who otherwise might not be enthusiastic about voting. Many conservatives have been alienated because of concerns over rising federal spending, illegal immigration, the Iraq war, the House page scandal and other issues.

In two rallies Thursday, Bush used his appointment of judges to remind such voters that it makes a difference who controls the Senate. "If the people of Montana want good judges, judges who will not legislate from the bench, judges like John Roberts and Sam Alito, you vote for Conrad Burns for the United States Senate," Bush told an exuberant crowd of several thousand supporters in MetraPark Arena here.

At both stops, Bush said Democrats would raise taxes, weaken the battle against terrorists and surrender in Iraq. "We will never run from thugs and assassins," he told a smaller crowd gathered on an airport tarmac in Elko. Noting that Democrats have not produced a consensus position on Iraq, Bush added: "Harsh criticism and second guessing is not a plan."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services and intelligence committees, called Bush "out of touch with Iraqi reality," citing an interview the president gave news services Wednesday in which he said he was "pleased with the progress we are making" and would keep Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld for two more years.

"The president ought to take off those rose-colored glasses," Levin said in a conference call with reporters Thursday. "The president is ignoring reality on the ground."

At his stops in Montana and Nevada, Bush avoided any discussion of scandals that have ensnared local candidates. Burns has endured criticism of his ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Rep. Jim Gibbons, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Nevada, was recently accused by a cocktail waitress of inappropriately touching her; he has said he grabbed her only to stop her from falling.

Even before that incident became public, Nevada Secretary of State Dean Heller, the GOP candidate to replace Gibbons in the House, had faced a tough road in a district where Republicans outnumber Democrats 3 to 2. This was the second time Bush has come to campaign with Heller in the past month.

Bush Speaks To Core Voters' Fears In Bid To Ignite Conservative Base By JOHN D. MCKINNON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- President Bush took a new tack against Democrats over their resistance to his judicial nominees as he sought to light a fire under his party's conservative Christian base before Tuesday's elections.

The twist in his stump speech came as polls suggested several endangered Republican Senate candidates -- including Sens. Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri -- were within striking distance, and that last-minute get-out-the-vote efforts among social conservatives could make a difference.

ELECTION 2006

Predict how the House and Senate votes will go in our Washington Wire reader contest1. Plus, take a closer look at issues and candidates2 in about 20 House races, review polls3 in close House contests and see complete coverage4.

As Mr. Bush began his final six-day swing of the 2006 campaign, he also continued to rely on the themes of terrorism and taxes to drive up voters' fears of a Democratic takeover in Congress. At a rally for Sen. Burns in Montana, for example, the president singled out Democratic opposition to the recent renewal of the Patriot Act and terrorist surveillance and interrogation programs.

Still, the president's schedule for the rest of the campaign reflected his diminished range, and Republicans' generally.

Through Election Day, the president was set to appear only in states that voted for him in 2004: Montana and Nevada, yesterday; Missouri and Iowa today; Colorado tomorrow; Nebraska and Kansas Sunday; and Arkansas, Florida and Texas Monday. He is avoiding most of the main battleground states where the House could be won or lost: Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and Connecticut. "The president is going to districts where we know that he can make a difference and where he knows that he can make a difference," spokesman Tony Fratto said.

DOJ_NMG_0090658

Republicans are looking for turnout among their base to be particularly important in a midterm election, where overall turnout tends to be low. A senior administration official added that "this is about Republican turnout, and these are all close races where he can turn up the vote." One risk for Mr. Bush and Vice President Cheney -- who have increasingly depicted a Democratic victory as a loss for U.S. interests, especially in the war on terrorism -- is that firing up their Republican base will motivate more Democrats and independents to turn out, too.

Several planned stops -- including in northwestern Iowa and the Florida Panhandle -- were largely to increase turnout in rural areas, without stirring opposition in urban ones. Traditionally strong support for Republicans among rural voters has softened, because of the unpopularity of the Iraq war and the spike in gasoline prices earlier in the year. These appearances also are intended to help gubernatorial candidates -- such as Iowa's Jim Nussle and Florida's Charlie Crist -- who might have been hurt by the diminished popularity of the party's leaders in Washington. On the campaign's final weekend, Mr. Bush also finds himself shoring up House candidates in districts like Nebraska's rural Third, which hasn't elected a Democrat in almost 50 years.

White House strategists contend that the administration hasn't been ignoring the moderate battleground areas back East, relying on other administration figures believed to be of more help there, such as first lady Laura Bush, whose campaign schedule this week has been even busier than her husband's.

Here, Mr. Bush is likely to keep sounding themes important to social conservatives, especially in appearances for Senate candidates such as Mr. Talent, who is regarded as one of the better hopes for Republicans in seven closely contested Senate races this year. Republicans also are worried that a variety of factors, including the Mark Foley scandal, could diminish Christian conservatives' support at the polls.

Mr. Bush got a raucous reception at yesterday's rally in Billings, as he has elsewhere in recent days. He told the crowd that confirmation of his judicial appointments is "one of the most important issues...in this election."

Republican-friendly States Get Bit Of Bush Before Vote (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- President Bush yesterday kicked off the last swing of his final political campaign, a five-day blitz in 10 states considered pivotal in Tuesday's congressional midterm elections.

Bent on whipping up the Republican base, the president, visiting only states he won in 2004, is putting his power into play -- showing he is neither abandoning close races nor giving up on embattled candidates.

"These are all races that are close," a senior administration official said aboard Air Force One. "This is about Republican turnout, and these are all close races where he can turn up the vote."

The president's first stop yesterday was Montana, where incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is in a statistical polling tie with Democrat Jon Tester. Mr. Burns has made a move in the past week, after trailing by as many as 10 points a couple of months ago.

Mr. Bush played up his Texas rancher status as he addressed a packed arena in a state that gave him 59 percent of the vote in 2004.

"It's good to be in a part of the world where the cowboy hats outnumber the ties," said the tieless Mr. Bush to laughter and applause. He used the same line hours later in Elko, Nev. In 2004, that state's rural voters strongly backed Mr. Bush, helping him carry Nevada by three percentage points.

"We don't need a lot of doublespeak in Washington. I think somebody who speaks plainly for the values of Montana is somebody you need to send back as your United States senator," he said in Billings.

The toss-up race is one of three, with Virginia and Missouri, that political strategists say Democrats must win to get the six seats they need to take control of the Senate.

At his two stops yesterday, the president hit conservative hot-button issues, such as tax cuts, the war on terror, judicial nominees and national security legislation Democrats opposed.

DOJ_NMG_0090659

"The Democrat attempt to filibuster the Patriot Act follows an approach that might sound familiar. They voted for it, right before they voted against it," Mr. Bush said in Billings, reprising a line from his 2004 run against Sen. John Kerry, who has been in the news again this week over a botched campaign-trail joke.

Although many pre-election polls show Democrats poised to take over the House and possibly the Senate, Mr. Bush insisted that those political pundits will be proved wrong.

"You might remember 2004. [Democrats] were already picking out their offices in the West Wing. Except things turned a little differently, and they didn't need the movers. ... When you turn out the vote, we're going to hold the House and hold the Senate, and America is going to be better off for it," he said to cheers in Elko.

In a last-ditch effort to hold Republican power in Congress, Mr. Bush will attend two rallies today in Missouri and one in Iowa. Tomorrow, he will attend two rallies in Colorado; Sunday, he will hit rallies in Nebraska and Kansas; on Monday, he finishes up his blitz with stops in Florida, Arkansas and Texas.

Today, the president stumps for candidates in Missouri, where Republican incumbent Sen. Jim Talent is tied in polls with his Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill.

Kerry's '72 Army Comments Mirror Latest (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP, November 3, 2006

During a Vietnam-era run for Congress three decades ago, John Kerry said he opposed a volunteer Army because it would be dominated by the underprivileged, be less accountable and be more prone to "the perpetuation of war crimes."

Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran who turned against the war, made the observations in answers to a 1972 candidate questionnaire from a Massachusetts peace group.

After Kerry caused a firestorm this week with what he termed a botched campaign joke that Republicans said insulted current soldiers, The Associated Press was alerted to the historical comments by a former law enforcement official who monitored 1970s anti-war activities

Kerry apologized Wednesday for the 2006 campaign trail gaffe that some took as suggesting U.S. soldiers fighting in Iraq were undereducated. He contended the remark was aimed at Bush, not the soldiers.

In 1972, as he ran for the House, he was less apologetic in his comments about the merits of a volunteer army. He declared in the questionnaire that he opposed the draft but considered a volunteer army "a greater anathema."

"I am convinced a volunteer army would be an army of the poor and the black and the brown," Kerry wrote. "We must not repeat the travesty of the inequities present during Vietnam. I also fear having a professional army that views the perpetuation of war crimes as simply 'doing its job.'

"Equally as important, a volunteer army with our present constitutional crisis takes accountability away from the president and put the people further from control over military activities," he wrote.

Kerry's spokesman, David Wade, said Wednesday the historical document needed to be viewed in the era in which it was written but that it nonetheless raised a "bedrock question in a time of war when sacrifice should be shared by all Americans."

"These are the words 34 years ago of a 28-year-old veteran home from a war gone wrong, wondering who in America will bear the cost of battle and shoulder the responsibility of military service," Wade said.

Kerry filled out the candidate questionnaire at the request of Massachusetts Political Action for Peace, an anti-war group that decades later turned over its historical documents to university researchers.

AP obtained the document from someone who gathered it from archives during Kerry's unsuccessful 2004 presidential campaign against President Bush. Republicans in that election relentlessly assailed Kerry's role in the anti-war movement decades earlier.

Kerry and Bush renewed their rivalry again this week, with the president accusing Kerry of offending troops. Kerry said he botched the text of a joke and didn't mean to insult troops.

On Wednesday, Kerry canceled campaign appearance on behalf of Democratic congressional candidates and issued an apology.

DOJ_NMG_0090660

Insulting Our Troops, And Our Intelligence (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

George Bush, Dick Cheney and Don Rumsfeld think you're stupid. Yes, they do.

They think they can take a mangled quip about President Bush and Iraq by John Kerry — a man who is not even running for office but who, unlike Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney, never ran away from combat service — and get you to vote against all Democrats in this election.

Every time you hear Mr. Bush or Mr. Cheney lash out against Mr. Kerry, I hope you will say to yourself, "They must think I'm stupid." Because they surely do.

They think that they can get you to overlook all of the Bush team's real and deadly insults to the U.S. military over the past six years by hyping and exaggerating Mr. Kerry's mangled gibe at the president.

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to the U.S. military than to send it into combat in Iraq without enough men — to launch an invasion of a foreign country not by the Powell Doctrine of overwhelming force, but by the Rumsfeld Doctrine of just enough troops to lose? What could be a bigger insult than that?

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in uniform than sending them off to war without the proper equipment, so that some soldiers in the field were left to buy their own body armor and to retrofit their own jeeps with scrap metal so that roadside bombs in Iraq would only maim them for life and not kill them? And what could be more injurious and insulting than Don Rumsfeld's response to criticism that he sent our troops off in haste and unprepared: Hey, you go to war with the army you've got — get over it.

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in uniform than to send them off to war in Iraq without any coherent postwar plan for political reconstruction there, so that the U.S. military has had to assume not only security responsibilities for all of Iraq but the political rebuilding as well? The Bush team has created a veritable library of military histories — from "Cobra II" to "Fiasco" to "State of Denial" — all of which contain the same damning conclusion offered by the very soldiers and officers who fought this war: This administration never had a plan for the morning after, and we've been making it up — and paying the price — ever since.

And what could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in Iraq than to send them off to war and then go out and finance the very people they're fighting against with our gluttonous consumption of oil? Sure, George Bush told us we're addicted to oil, but he has not done one single significant thing — demanded higher mileage standards from Detroit, imposed a gasoline tax or even used the bully pulpit of the White House to drive conservation — to end that addiction. So we continue to finance the U.S. military with our tax dollars, while we finance Iran, Syria, Wahhabi mosques and Al Qaeda madrassas with our energy purchases.

Everyone says that Karl Rove is a genius. Yeah, right. So are cigarette companies. They get you to buy cigarettes even though we know they cause cancer. That is the kind of genius Karl Rove is. He is not a man who has designed a strategy to reunite our country around an agenda of renewal for the 21st century — to bring out the best in us. His "genius" is taking some irrelevant aside by John Kerry and twisting it to bring out the worst in us, so you will ignore the mess that the Bush team has visited on this country.

And Karl Rove has succeeded at that in the past because he was sure that he could sell just enough Bush cigarettes, even though people knew they caused cancer. Please, please, for our country's health, prove him wrong this time.

Let Karl know that you're not stupid. Let him know that you know that the most patriotic thing to do in this election is to vote against an administration that has — through sheer incompetence — brought us to a point in Iraq that was not inevitable but is now unwinnable.

Let Karl know that you think this is a critical election, because you know as a citizen that if the Bush team can behave with the level of deadly incompetence it has exhibited in Iraq — and then get away with it by holding on to the House and the Senate — it means our country has become a banana republic. It means our democracy is in tatters because it is so gerrymandered, so polluted by money, and so divided by professional political hacks that we can no longer hold the ruling party to account.

It means we're as stupid as Karl thinks we are.

DOJ_NMG_0090661

I, for one, don't think we're that stupid. Next Tuesday we'll see.

Rep. Paying Ex-mistress About $500K (AP-Y)

By Michael Rubinkam

AP, November 3, 2006

A Republican congressman accused of abusing his ex-mistress agreed to pay her about $500,000 in a settlement last year that contained a powerful incentive for her to keep quiet until after Election Day, a person familiar with the terms of the deal told The Associated Press.

Rep. Don Sherwood is locked in a tight re-election race against a Democratic opponent who has seized on the four-term congressman's relationship with the woman. While Sherwood acknowledged the woman was his mistress, he denied abusing her and said that he had settled her $5.5 million lawsuit on confidential terms.

The settlement, reached in November 2005, called for Cynthia Ore to be paid in installments, according to a person who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deal is confidential. She has received less than half the money so far, and will not get the rest until after the Nov. 7 election, the person said Thursday.

A confidentiality clause requires Ore to forfeit some of the money if she talks publicly about the case, according to this person and two other people familiar with elements of the case.

It is common in settlements for payments to be made in installments and for the parties to be held to confidentiality.

Sherwood admitted no wrongdoing, a standard provision in such agreements, this person said.

Sherwood, a 65-year-old married father of three who is considered a family-values conservative, had one of the safest seats in Congress until Ore sued him in June 2005, alleging he physically abused her throughout their five-year affair.

Reached by telephone Wednesday, the congressman and successful car dealer said: "I can neither confirm nor deny because this was a private settlement. If I'd like to talk to you about it, I can't."

The Associated Press has been trying for months to find out the terms of the settlement.

According to a police report, Ore called 911 on her cell phone from the bathroom of Sherwood's Capitol Hill apartment in 2004 and reported that Sherwood had choked her while giving her a back rub. Sherwood admitted having an affair with the woman, but vehemently denied ever hurting her, and criminal charges were never filed. But Ore, now 30, sued for damages.

Sherwood's challenger, Chris Carney, has hammered the congressman over the affair in TV ads, calling Sherwood a hypocrite who brought "Washington values" to his rural northeastern Pennsylvania district.

Sherwood responded with his own ad, in which he looked directly into the camera and apologized for his conduct. Last month, his wife mailed a letter to voters that accused Carney of "needlessly cruel" campaign tactics.

Although GOP voters greatly outnumber Democrats in his conservative district, many people have said they would not vote for him again because of the affair.

Even before Ore settled, the congressman tried to keep a tight lid on the case. His lawyer asked a judge to prohibit disclosure of materials from the case, warning that Sherwood's opponents might try to use the information to harm him politically.

The lawyer, Bobby Burchfield, was especially adamant that any videotaped deposition of Sherwood not be released, saying the footage could be used against him in negative political ads.

Ore's attorney, Ning Ye of New York, declined to say where she is living now or how she can be reached.

Ethics Questions Haunting Races Of Democrats, Too (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 2 — First came a letter in June, in which federal prosecutors here revealed that they are investigating claims of "endemic hiring fraud" in agencies and departments that fall under the purview of Rod R. Blagojevich, the governor of Illinois.

Then, last month, one of Mr. Blagojevich's top fund-raisers was indicted on accusations that he sought millions in kickbacks from investment companies seeking the state's pension business.

DOJ_NMG_0090662

Any of it would be a governor's bad dream, but particularly so in the case of Mr. Blagojevich, a Democrat who faces a re-election vote on Tuesday in a state still bruised from the corruption that left its last governor bound for prison.

Yet Mr. Blagojevich appears headed toward victory, leading his Republican opponent by double digits in one poll, by The Chicago Tribune and WGN-Channel 9, that was released on Tuesday.

In what Democrats nationally have worked hard to portray as a "culture of corruption" in the Republican Party, more than a dozen Republicans in House races have wrestled with the taint of a Congressional page scandal; links to Jack Abramoff, the convicted lobbyist; and a smattering of individual woes from claims of financial shenanigans to sexual wrongdoing.

Still, there are Democrats like Mr. Blagojevich whose campaigns have also been marked by claims of ethical failings in widely varying degrees, from Representatives William J. Jefferson of Louisiana and Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia to Senator Robert Menendez of New Jersey. In another governor's race in the Midwest, that of James E. Doyle of Wisconsin, scandal has emerged as a serious issue.

But while the Democrats' problems have certainly made these races tighter than they might otherwise be, they have for the most part not carried the lethal sting of the Republicans' missteps, independent political scientists and election analysts say.

In broad terms, the analysts say, the Democratic effort nationally to paint a systematic and more deeply rooted corruption label on Republicans this year seems to be working, blunting individual controversies that might be devastating to the Democrats at some other moment. Some polls back up that point. Thirty-five percent of the voters surveyed for a New York Times/CBS News poll completed this week said the Republican Party had the most corrupt politicians, while 15 percent said the Democratic Party did.

"It's just not the year for Republicans to be lobbing corruption charges," said Thomas M. Holbrook, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee who studies elections. "It's a real uphill battle for them in that regard, and this is a pretty good year, then, even for Democrats who aren't terribly popular like Governor Doyle."

In some cases, like the Illinois and Wisconsin campaigns for governor, Democrats have managed to turn the tables on their accusers, raising ethical questions about the Republicans in the races while also denying any wrongdoing on their own parts and, along the way, leaving many voters throwing up their hands and concluding that both sides have problems.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Doyle was quick to point to the Washington connections of his opponent, Representative Mark Green, as he also described what he was hearing from constituents.

"People are really fed up with how Congress has behaved and how the president has behaved," Mr. Doyle said.

He added, "The Republicans, facing sort of a desperate situation, are trying to throw anything up."

Mr. Green seemed to acknowledge the forces beyond him and beyond any taint of scandal in Wisconsin.

"There is no huge advantage to my being a Republican who has served in Congress," Mr. Green said. "It's clearly not a wind at my back."

The authorities in Wisconsin have said they were looking into claims that workers under the Doyle administration made state decisions favorable to those who contributed to his campaign. This fall, in a move that drew a flood of attention in the political race, a federal judge sentenced a former state employee to prison on charges she directed a state contract to a company that donated thousands to Mr. Doyle.

Mr. Green said voters there were extremely focused on the "whole issue of corruption, ethics, about whether or not the state is moving in the right direction" under Mr. Doyle's administration, adding quickly, "Remember, someone in the Doyle administration is going to federal prison."

Mr. Doyle, finishing his first term as governor, has denied any wrongdoing and emphasized in the interview that he had never met the convicted state employee. The latest polls show Mr. Doyle and Mr. Green locked in a tight race that has grown increasingly nasty.

Mr. Doyle, who served as attorney general of Wisconsin for three terms, has raised questions about nearly $468,000 in out-of-state campaign contributions that Mr. Green moved from his federal campaign to his state campaign last year. The state elections board ordered Mr. Green not to use the money, saying transfers from political action committees not registered in the state were not legal. Mr. Green said he has set aside the money in question while he awaits an appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0090663

In Illinois, Mr. Blagojevich, who portrayed himself as a reformer when he won the governorship four years ago, campaigned this fall even as a federal investigation swirled on into accusations of rigged political hiring by state officials.

In a letter in June, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney, said the investigation "has now implicated multiple state agencies and departments" with help from "a number of credible witnesses."

Mr. Blagojevich has denied any wrongdoing, pointed to ethics reforms that he said his administration has put in place, and distanced himself from the indictment of his former fund-raiser.

"What you'll see is that a lot of these activities center around the Republicans — the continuation of a scheme that occurred long before I was governor," Mr. Blagojevich said on Thursday.

The previous governor, George Ryan, a Republican, was sentenced in September to six and a half years in federal prison for racketeering and fraud. Mr. Blagojevich has made certain to remind voters that his Republican opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, served as treasurer during Mr. Ryan's long tenure as a Republican leader in this state. "She was there, hand in hand with George Ryan, part of creating the mess that we've been fixing," Mr. Blagojevich said.

Ms. Topinka, meanwhile, described Mr. Blagojevich's situation as "scandal on top of scandal on top of scandal." Voters, she said, have noted that, and they care. Still, Ms. Topinka said, it is not an easy time to be a Republican candidate — here or elsewhere.

The Chicago Tribune/WGN-Channel 9 poll shows Mr. Blagojevich leading with 44 percent of those surveyed, compared with 29 percent for Ms. Topinka, 13 percent for a Green Party candidate, and 13 percent who were undecided.

"It's difficult to run after Ryan," Ms. Topinka said. "And it's difficult to run after the scandals in Washington."

The Tribune poll shows Ms. Topinka may be right. Those surveyed gave Mr. Blagojevich a slight edge when asked who would do a better job of cleaning up corruption and which candidate they found more honest.

Menendez Seeks To Bury Image Of A Shady Dealer (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

ATLANTIC CITY -- A balding labor chieftain explains why his hard-hats should vote for the plump candidate who stands here in a muddy construction site dressed in a white knit cotton shirt, a pinstriped suit, loafers and a perfectly knotted tie.

"Bobby Menendez is a fighter !" Billy Mullen bellows at his guys on this balmy autumnal day. "He's been in the gutter , he's rolled around down there his whole life . . ." The hard-hats do much appreciative thumping of hands and waving of fists.

Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, gives a pained smile suggestive of intestinal discomfort. He rarely answers to "Bobby." And there's a very good likelihood -- no, let's make it a certainty -- that he is not enamored of this particular compliment.

The notion that Menendez, 52, rolls in the gutter before lunch, that he is a political boss as expert in the manipulation of political IOUs and shivs as he is in the intricacies of trade policy, has trailed like a mutt after Menendez throughout his Senate campaign.

His opponent, Republican Tom Kean Jr., a semi-obscure state senator and the trust-fund scion of a multigenerational political powerhouse, cannot clear his throat without intoning that Menendez is "under federal investigation." There are, in Kean's telling, Menendez's questionable rental contract with a local not-for-profit, the pressure his advisers applied to get an ally hired at a local hospital, and so on and on.

Even if these charges prove true, it's not clear such behavior is illegal or disabling. In New Jersey the operating political philosophy is described as "pay to play," and the occasional indictment might be viewed as part of the life cycle of politics.

"We are a very, very nonjudgmental state," noted Clifford Zukin, a professor of public policy at Rutgers University. "Unless you are rich and can buy in from the outside, it takes a great deal of skill and toughness to rise up."

Still, the charges -- repeated in countless commercials -- take a cumulative effect. New Jersey has trended Democratic for years. But Menendez, who was appointed in January to fill the Senate seat vacated by Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D), stands a bare notch ahead of Kean in polls.

One public poll asked voters what jumps to their mind when they hear the candidates' names. Kean? He's the son of a former governor.

DOJ_NMG_0090664

As for Menendez? The greatest number of poll respondents -- 21 percent -- say the words that come to mind are "corruption/crooked."

Menendez sits in the back of a coffee shop at the Borgata casino after his Atlantic City labor rally and wags his head. It's Halloween, and a waitress dressed as a giant Hershey's Kiss has just served coffee.

"In the end of the day, have all the negative ads taken effect? It's hurt." Menendez favors a softly wounded tone. "I didn't expect this."

The word "complicated" hangs over Menendez's head like a thought balloon.

One on one, he's neatly coifed and studiously bland, a pug-nosed lawyer at ease with the arcana of trade policy and Iraq. He's the immigrant's son -- his parents grew up in Havana and fled the dictator Fulgencio Batista -- and a skilled infighter for a higher minimum wage and low-cost student loans, and a determined opponent of the war in Iraq.

On the stump, he's curiously diffident. He attended a Veterans Day breakfast in Cherry Hill, a hall thick with old vets speaking in the emphatic manner of the hard of hearing. Max Cleland, the former Georgia senator and Vietnam amputee, had flown to campaign for him. The old Georgia pol coached the candidate.

"Go ahead, Bobby," Cleland whispers. "Push my wheelchair out there."

Menendez tends to step on his own applause lines. One vet after another ambles up to shake Menendez's hand but the candidate's handshake is as fleeting as his attention.

You might not guess that politics has been Menendez's chosen -- and highly successful -- calling since he ran for school board at the age of 19. He grew up in a tenement in Union City, a working-class immigrant city that hangs like a vine to the cliffs of the Palisades overlooking the Hudson River. The city sits in Hudson County, which for more than a century has exemplified a style of politics known as Early Feudal.

As Rep. Rodney P. Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) recently explained to the Record of Hackensack: "You don't take prisoners in Hudson County, you shoot them."

Another piece of the county's political DNA was laid down by Frank Hague, mayor of Jersey City from 1917 to 1947. He had a desk constructed with a lap drawer so visitors might deposit charitable envelopes of cash. Hague's salary never exceeded $8,000; his net worth at the time of his death was $10 million.

Menendez' first job came with William V. Musto, the intermittently reformist mayor of Union City. Later Menendez, who wore a bulletproof vest during this time, testified that Musto took bribes. Musto was convicted, and then he was reelected the day after he was sentenced.

Menendez has put in place mayors of Jersey City and Union City -- and upended the same men. But he recoils at any notion he's a boss. "Tom Kean rises to the top of his county machine with no experience and it's 'leadership,' " Menendez says in that professorial manner. "But we pick a candidate here in Hudson County and it's bossism. That's very outdated."

It must be said, however, that Hudson County politics retain a high entertainment value. Robert Janiszewski, the former county executive of Hudson County was forced to go into the witness protection program in 2001 after it was revealed he had worn an FBI wire. Janiszewski was sentenced to 41 months but in prison he's resurfaced as a pen-pal adviser to Kean's campaign.

Menendez frowns.

" In that case , the history of Frank Hague lives. But that history is not reality for the rest of us."

First Lady Pitches For Roskam, McSweeney, Topinka (CHIT)

By Susan Kuczka And John Biemer

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

First Lady Laura Bush tried to fire up Republican voters Thursday at a rally for candidates in two of the nation's hardest-fought and most expensive congressional races.

Bush also pitched Judy Baar Topinka's run for governor at the Schaumburg rally.

DOJ_NMG_0090665

Bush and Topinka shared the stage with Peter Roskam, the west suburban 6th Congressional District Republican candidate, and David McSweeney, the northwest suburban 8th Congressional District GOP nominee. Bush said the two men are key to helping the administration fight the war on terrorism.

"We all know ... that the well being of young people in Illinois and across our country ultimately depends on our government's ability to protect them, by defeating terrorism and increasing liberty abroad," Bush said during a 13-minute address before about 1,000 supporters.

"In Congress, Dave McSweeney and Peter Roskam will be champions of the men and women of the United States military. They understand that this election is critical to the future of our country, and they know that America faces challenges too important to be reduced to just politics."

Roskam, a state senator from Wheaton, is facing Democrat Tammy Duckworth in the race to succeed retiring Republican Rep. Henry Hyde. McSweeney, a Barrington businessman, is challenging first-term Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean.

Bush also used her address to promote Topinka, who is challenging Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich.

"Judy Baar Topinka is dedicated to bringing jobs to the state of Illinois," she said. "And as Gov. Topinka, Judy will make sure everyone in Illinois benefits from our nation's growing economy."

Blagojevich, appearing at a pipefitters union-led rally in Mokena, began outlining priorities for a second term as governor. Appearing before several hundred union members, Blagojevich promised to spend $100 million on stem cell research over the next four years and to provide health care for all military veterans.

The governor has come under fire from some Republicans and conservative Democrats in the legislature for using budgetary maneuvers to provide state funding for embryonic stem cell research without specific legislative approval.

Blagojevich did not specifically say how much the veterans health care initiative would cost or how he would pay for the proposals he outlined.

Meanwhile, Democrats were preparing a series of rallies Monday featuring Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Dick Durbin to promote Duckworth, Bean, 10th Congressional District candidate Dan Seals and Todd Stroger, the candidate for Cook County Board president. Seals is challenging North Shore Republican Rep. Mark Kirk, and Stroger faces Republican rival Tony Peraica.

Obama will return to Chicago after three days series of campaign appearances for Senate and governor candidates in Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri and Iowa, home of the nation's first presidential caucus. Obama has said he is studying a 2008 presidential bid.

On Thursday, Duckworth countered Bush's appearance with a gathering in a Mt. Prospect home of about three dozen people who said they were switching their Republican allegiance to support her candidacy. Duckworth pledged to stand up for mainstream values and work in a bipartisan manner in Washington, though she warned that they wouldn't agree with her votes every time.

"If you're looking for someone who's going to be a straight party-line vote, I am not your candidate," Duckworth said.

She also promoted support from former Defense Secretary Bill Cohen, a Republican who served in President Bill Clinton's Cabinet. Cohen, in a statement, said Duckworth would be "a strong voice for our military personnel and veterans."

In Washington, federal election officials released a report showing congressional candidates nationally had spent nearly $966 million during the two-year campaign cycle, with the 6th and 8th District races among the those with the heaviest spending and most furious fundraising.

Among House races nationally through Oct. 18, the Federal Election Commission said McSweeney was the fourth-biggest money raiser at $4.2 million and the fourth-biggest spender at $3.8 million. He also was second among candidates who gave their own campaigns money at $2.2 million. Bean was 10th in money raised at $3.7 million and seventh in money spent at $3.6 million, the FEC said.

Duckworth ranked 18th in terms of money raised at $3.3 million and 17th for money spent at $2.8 million, the FEC said. Roskam was 29th in raising money at $2.9 million and ranked 32nd in money spent at $2.4 million.

Those figures don't include another $7 million being spent on the two races by the national party campaign committees.

Evangelicals' Faith In Republicans Wavers (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0090666

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

This week has been the busiest of John Giles's year. He is responsible for the distribution of 1.7m "voter guides" that will be offered to worshippers at churches across Alabama this Sunday, two days before the mid-term elections.

Mr Giles is careful to make sure his pamphlets do not violate laws that bar churches from making political endorsements. But by detailing candidates' views on issues such as abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research, the guides leave little room for doubt about how God-fearing Christians should cast their votes.

Before previous elections the guides were produced by the Alabama chapter of the Christian Coalition, the grassroots organisation credited with turning US evangelical Christians into a political force. This year, however, churchgoers will find a new name on hand-outs following Mr Giles's decision to create a breakaway organisation called Christian Action Alabama.

Three other state chapters – Georgia, Iowa and Ohio – have also left the coalition, reflecting growing divisions among evangelicals. They broke away in protest at what they perceive to be a shift by the Christian Coalition away from core issues, such as abortion and gay marriage, towards a broader agenda.

"There were various reasons why we left but the main one was this drift to the left," says Mr Giles, previously chairman of the Alabama chapter. "The direction they are taking is going to divide Christians. They are walking into a trap set by our opponents."

The Christian Coalition was set up in 1988 by Pat Robertson, the evangelical preacher, and turned into a political powerhouse by Ralph Reed, the Republican strategist. It reached its peak during Bill Clinton's presidency in the 1990s, when evangelical voters, who represent about a quarter of the US electorate, helped break the Democrats' 40-year stranglehold over the House of Representatives.

But the coalition's influence has waned over recent years following the departure of Mr Robertson and Mr Reed and the emergence of rival Christian conservative groups, such as Focus on the Family and the Family Research Council. Its annual budget has shrunk from $26m to about $1m (€787,000, £526,000).

In an attempt to revive its fortunes, the coalition is reaching out to moderate evangelicals and mainstream Christians by embracing a wider range of causes and softening its fire and brimstone rhetoric.

Joel Hunter, the charismatic pastor of a Florida megachurch, who was appointed coalition president in July, has vowed to "rebuild and rebrand" the coalition and make it less fixated on "below the belt" issues related to sexuality.

Mr Hunter is among a growing number of evangelical leaders willing to break out of traditional conservative territory to tackle issues more commonly associated with the left.

Last month he joined more than 20 other prominent evangelists to issue an appeal for President George W. Bush to push for UN intervention in Darfur, Sudan. Another group of church leaders, including Mr Hunter, has launched an advertising campaign on Christian radio stations calling for action against global warming.

"The armlock of the religious right over evangelicals is beginning to loosen," says Randall Balmer, professor of American religion at Columbia University.

Roberta Combs, chairwoman of the Christian Coalition, insists there has been no departure from conservative values and says not all Mr Hunter's personal views represent official policy.

But Ms Combs, who recruited Mr Hunter, supports his efforts to broaden the coalition's appeal. "Family values are about more than one or two issues," she says. "We must keep an open mind and an open heart."

Back in Alabama, Mr Giles fears a conspiracy is under way to lure evangelicals towards liberal causes with the aim of weakening the religious right. "We can all unite around a few core issues, such as abortion, pornography and gambling," he says. "But when you start talking about global warming, the minimum wage or the death penalty, the consensus breaks down."

Scott Keeter of the Pew Research Center says white evangelicals remain among the strongest sources of Republican support, representing more than a third of all people who identify with the party. But he warns that their enthusiasm has "significantly diminished" since the 2004 presidential election, when 78 per cent of white evangelicals voted for Mr Bush.

Many evangelicals believe their support has been taken for granted by the Republicans and complain that election promises, such as Mr Bush's pledge to push for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, have gone unfulfilled. A succession of Republican ethics scandals has deepened their disillusionment.

DOJ_NMG_0090667

The number of evangelicals with a favourable opinion of the Republican party fell from 74 per cent in 2004 to 54 per cent last July, according to the Pew Research Center.

But John Green, senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, warns against writing off evangelicals as an electoral force. “The religious right is not as well organised or as energised as in 2004,” he says. “But whatever their problems with the Republicans, they prefer them to the Democrats. The threat of Democrats taking control of Congress provides a strong motivation to vote.”

On The Religious Right, An Alliance Torn Asunder (WP)

By Alan Cooperman And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Both are Christian conservatives, and they were once stalwart allies, but Dick Armey and James Dobson are going after each other tooth and claw.

Armey, the former Texas congressman and House majority leader, argued in the Outlook section of this past Sunday's Washington Post that Republicans face an "electoral rout" because they stopped being the party of limited government, allowed spending to spin "out of control," and concentrated on such issues as flag burning, Terry Schiavo and same-sex marriage.

On the Web site of FreedomWorks, the organization he now heads, Armey pins much of the blame on Dobson, the founder and chairman of Focus on the Family, and other "self-appointed Christian leaders."

Calling them "thugs" and "bullies" in recent interviews, Armey says that "Dobson and his gang" have split the conservative Christian movement into two camps: those who want to "practice their faith independent of heavy-handed government" and "big government sympathizers who want to impose their version of 'righteousness' on others."

Dobson, in a commentary for the Web site of Fox News, responded this week that Armey is "a very bitter man" who is still smarting because "I supported my close friend and hunting buddy," Rep. Steve Largent (R-Okla.), over Armey for majority leader. Dobson denied that he supports big government and cited news media reports that Armey has been consulting for the American Civil Liberties Union.

Calling the accusations "a shocker" that "came straight out of the blue," Dobson concluded with this hypothesis about Armey: "He could be trying to reposition himself as an erstwhile Republican leader by discrediting the Religious Right, hoping to step into the vacuum after the upcoming election."

A Dobson ally, the Rev. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, said in an interview that evangelicals are irate over Armey's suggestion that issues such as same-sex marriage have distracted the Republicans. In 2004, he said, a referendum to ban same-sex marriage got more votes than President Bush did in Ohio.

"If it weren't for the marriage amendment in Ohio, John Kerry would be president. So shut up, Dick," Land said.Tilting Toward Windmills

There's a new star in this season's campaign commercials: windmills.

While tall, spindly wind turbines might not be popular among Cape Cod residents right now, politicians from Montana to New York are using them to show voters they're committed to a clean energy future. At least 17 political ads feature windmills this year, according to the advocacy group League of Conservation Voters, a phenomenon that the group's president, Gene Karpinski, said shows that his group's message has finally acquired political resonance.

"Nobody's ever said, 'We're coming to Congress to change environmental policy.' That's never happened before," Karpinski said. "This election is about change, and a big part of that change is about energy security."

Of course, doing a stand-up in front of a massive windmill carries risks, as well. Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) is shown with her hair flying about as she declares, "This windmill farm will make America less dependent on foreign oil." And Democratic Senate hopeful Jon Tester (Mont.) just looks small compared with the wind turbines standing behind him on an open plain. But Karpinski remains undaunted.

"Candidate after candidate after candidate, they're talking about it," he said.

Church Leader Resigns After Gay Sex Claim (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

DOJ_NMG_0090668

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

One of the nation's most influential conservative Christian leaders, the Rev. Ted Haggard, resigned yesterday as president of the National Association of Evangelicals and temporarily stepped aside as pastor of a Colorado mega-church after a self-described male escort accused him of paying for gay sex.

Haggard, an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage, vigorously denied the allegation. "Never had a gay relationship with anybody, and I'm steady with my wife. I'm faithful to my wife," he told a Colorado television station, KUSA.

But in a statement issued by New Life Church, his 14,000-member congregation in Colorado Springs, Haggard said he could "not continue to minister under the cloud created by the accusations," which were first made public on a Denver talk-radio station yesterday morning.

Although he has avoided endorsing political candidates, Haggard has been a staunch ally of the Bush administration. Some political observers said his resignation was more bad news for Republicans trying to rally their conservative Christian base to turn out for the midterm elections.

"This is one more factor that could increase the disillusionment of evangelicals with prominent leaders on the Christian right and with the political process as a whole, and some may conclude that perhaps their forebears were wise to be wary about politics," said William Martin, a professor of religion and public policy at Rice University and a biographer of the Rev. Billy Graham.

Conservative Christian leaders rallied around Haggard. "I've always admired Ted's Christian character and his ministry, and I find these accusations incredible, frankly," said the Rev. L. Roy Taylor, chairman of the National Association of Evangelicals, which has about 45,000 constituent churches across the country.

Taylor said that the NAE's executive committee will hold a teleconference today to decide how to proceed. He said he may serve temporarily as president of the organization, in addition to his regular duties as the stated clerk, or administrative leader, of the conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

"I'm a minister not a political scientist, so I couldn't predict" what political impact Haggard's resignation might have, Taylor said. "Evangelicals have a serious understanding of the power of sin and human evil, and realize that every person, whether Christian or not, struggles with the dark side," he added.

In his written statement, Haggard said he was "voluntarily stepping aside from leadership" of New Life Church so that its four-member board of overseers could conduct an investigation. An associate pastor, the Rev. Ross Parsley, will take over as the church's acting leader, and "in the interim, I will seek both spiritual advice and guidance," Haggard said.

Haggard declined further comment, but a close colleague at New Life Church said that although he is stepping down as pastor temporarily, his resignation as president of the NAE is permanent.

"Ted realizes this is a pretty consuming situation in terms of media, and in order to make sure the good work of the NAE goes forward without distraction, that is a decision he voluntarily made," the colleague said, speaking anonymously because the church was limiting its comments to the written statement.

Haggard's accuser identified himself as Mike Jones, 49. Jones said in radio and television interviews that he had a three-year sexual relationship with the pastor, who he said came to Denver and paid him for sex about once a month.

Jones told Peter Boyles, host of a talk-radio show on KHOW-AM station, that he has recorded voice-mail messages and a letter from Haggard, and that he witnessed the pastor using methamphetamine. But he did not immediately produce the alleged voice-mails or letter.

Jones indicated that he is going public with the accusations at least in part because Colorado has two questions related to same-sex marriage on Tuesday's ballot. One is Amendment 43, which would define marriage as between one man and one woman, and which Haggard has supported. The other is Referendum 1, which would give same-sex couples more legal rights and benefits.

"Being a gay man all my life . . . I felt it was my responsibility to my fellow brothers and sisters, that I had to take a stand, and I cannot sit back anymore and hear [what] to me is an anti-gay message," Jones said.

John Green, an expert on religion and politics at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life in Washington, said Haggard's resignation is likely to reverberate more loudly in Colorado than nationally.

DOJ_NMG_0090669

"Haggard is a very important political figure in Colorado, and there are tight races there as well as ballot questions that could be affected," he said, citing in particular the embattled reelection efforts of Reps. Marilyn Musgrave and Tom Tancredo, both Republicans. "I think there's less of an implication for what evangelicals might do nationwide, because outside of Colorado he's not directly involved in voter turnout efforts and is seen as more of a religious leader than a political one."

Green also noted that under Haggard's leadership, the NAE has sought to widen the evangelical agenda to include global warming, international human rights and poverty issues. Although non-evangelicals may view Haggard as a diehard conservative, within the evangelical movement he is seen as a moderate, Green said.

"If the allegations are proven true, it could discredit a prominent moderate figure in the evangelical community," he said.

Church Leader Resigns Amid Gay Sex Claim (CHIT/AP)

By Catherine Tsai

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. -- The president of the National Association of Evangelicals, an outspoken opponent of gay marriage, has given up his post while a church panel investigates allegations he paid a man for sex.

The Rev. Ted Haggard resigned as president of the 30 million-member association Thursday after being accused of paying the man for monthly trysts over the past three years.

Haggard, a married father of five, denied the allegations, but also stepped aside as head of his 14,000-member New Life Church pending an investigation.

"I am voluntarily stepping aside from leadership so that the overseer process can be allowed to proceed with integrity," he said in a statement. "I hope to be able to discuss this matter in more detail at a later date. In the interim, I will seek both spiritual advice and guidance."

Carolyn Haggard, spokeswoman for the New Life Church and the pastor's niece, said a four-member church panel will investigate the allegations. The board has the authority to discipline Haggard, including removing him from ministry work.

The acting senior pastor at New Life, Ross Parsley, told KKTV-TV of Colorado Springs that Haggard admitted that some of the accusations were true.

"I just know that there has been some admission of indiscretion, not admission to all of the material that has been discussed but there is an admission of some guilt," Parsley told the station.

He did not elaborate, and a telephone number for Parsley could not be found late Thursday.

The allegations come as voters in Colorado and seven other states get ready to decide Tuesday on amendments banning gay marriage. Besides the proposed ban on the Colorado ballot, a separate measure would establish the legality of domestic partnerships providing same-sex couples with many of the rights of married couples.

The allegations stunned church members.

"It's political, right before the elections," said Brian Boals, a New Life member for 17 years.

Church member E.J. Cox, 25, called the claims "ridiculous."

"People are always saying stuff about Pastor Ted," she said. "You just sort of blow it off. He's just like anyone else in the public eye."

The accusations were made by Mike Jones, 49, of Denver, who said he decided to go public because of the political fight over the amendments.

"I just want people to step back and take a look and say, 'Look, we're all sinners, we all have faults, but if two people want to get married, just let them, and let them have a happy life,'" said Jones, who added that he isn't working for any political group.

Jones, who said he is gay, said he was also upset when he discovered Haggard and the New Life Church had publicly opposed same-sex marriage.

"It made me angry that here's someone preaching about gay marriage and going behind the scenes having gay sex," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090670

Jones claimed Haggard paid him to have sex nearly every month over three years. He said he advertised himself as an escort on the Internet and was contacted by a man who called himself Art, who snorted methamphetamine before their sexual encounters to heighten his experience.

Jones said he later saw the man on television identified as Haggard and that the two last had sex in August.

He said he has voice mail messages from Haggard, as well as an envelope he said Haggard used to mail him cash. He declined to make the voice mails available to the AP, but KUSA-TV reported what it said were excerpts late Thursday that referred to methamphetamine.

"Hi Mike, this is Art," one call began, according to the station. "Hey, I was just calling to see if we could get any more. Either $100 or $200 supply."

A second message, left a few hours later, began: "Hi Mike, this is Art, I am here in Denver and sorry that I missed you. But as I said, if you want to go ahead and get the stuff, then that would be great. And I'll get it sometime next week or the week after or whenever."

Haggard, 50, was appointed president of the evangelicals association in March 2003. He has participated in conservative Christian leaders' conference calls with White House staffers and lobbied members of Congress last year on U.S. Supreme Court appointees after Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement.

After Massachusetts legalized gay marriage in 2004, Haggard and others began organizing state-by-state opposition. Last year, Haggard and officials from the nearby Christian ministry Focus on the Family announced plans to push Colorado's gay marriage ban for the 2006 ballot.

At the time, Haggard said that he believed marriage is a union between a man and woman rooted in centuries of tradition, and that research shows it's the best family unit for children.

Connecticut Seats May Be Key To Control (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 3, 2006

FAIRFIELD, Conn. — Three moderate House Republicans and a conservative Senate Democrat are downplaying party labels in the final days of the campaign here in hopes the state's independent voters will send them back to Washington.

Nearly half of Connecticut voters are unaffiliated, with 30% of registered voters Democrats and 20% Republican. Nationally, about one-third of people who have responded to Gallup Polls in 2006 identify themselves as independent.

Connecticut elected former Republican-turned-independent Lowell Weicker as governor in 1990. The man who ousted Weicker from the Senate two years before that, Joe Lieberman, now appears poised for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic ballot line to businessman Ned Lamont.

And come Tuesday, the state's independents could determine which political party controls the House of Representatives. That's because three of the seats Democrats could gain for a majority are here. They need 15.

“It's an independent state that's more subject to trends,” says University of Connecticut political scientist Kenneth Dautrich, “like the need for change.”

Rep. Christopher Shays, a 10-term Republican incumbent, is under no illusions. “This may be the last time I have to speak before the Rotary as a member of Congress,” he recently told the group here. A Zogby poll released Wednesday showed Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, a former Westport first selectwoman, ahead 51%-43.5%.

Now, wherever Shays goes, he brings along a 54-page booklet full of reasons to re-elect him. There's his seat on a key financial committee (page 1), the federal money he's brought home (p. 4), his 54% liberal rating from Congressional Quarterly (p. 40).

At the Rotary, Shays even mentioned his work for pet victims of Hurricane Katrina. “I'm not one-dimensional.”

In an interview at his waterfront Bridgeport home, Shays pinpointed his problem: “Iraq. And people don't like George Bush.

In a year when polls show that sentiment pervasive nationwide, it is significant that political luminaries from Laura Bush to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are flocking to the state. And the airwaves are blanketed with negative ads.

DOJ_NMG_0090671

"This is a flyover state in presidential years," says Farrell, who got 48% of the vote against Shays in 2004. "Connecticut voters now know what it's like to live in (battleground) Ohio or Pennsylvania."

"If the Democrats run the table in Connecticut, that would be a national message that the war in Iraq will have some national resonance," says Fairfield University political analyst John Orman.

Besides Shays, who represents one of the country's wealthiest congressional districts, two other moderate Republicans are in close races:

•Nancy Johnson, a 12-term incumbent who helped author the Medicare prescription-drug program, is opposed by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy.

•Rob Simmons is seeking a fourth term in the country's most Democratic district held by a Republican. He is in a rematch against former state legislator Joe Courtney, who got 46% of the vote in 2002.

"We call ourselves the spotted owl caucus," jokes Simmons of moderate Republicans. "We know we're endangered."

Shays is a member. He has won widespread support in this moderate district that stretches from the affluent New York City suburb of Greenwich, where the first President Bush grew up, to gritty industrial Bridgeport.

But attitudes may be shifting.

"I still think he's a good man," said Democrat Ted Shiffman, a Stamford lawyer and former Shays supporter. "But every few years, it's important to have a change in control so that one party doesn't become entrenched."

Farrell has depicted Shays as an enabler for Bush's unpopular Iraq policies and the priorities of the conservative-led Congress. During one of 11 debates, Farrell, 51, framed the choice: "With Chris, you get the status quo. With me, you get a new direction."

Shays, 61, disputes that. "I'm probably the biggest change agent in Washington" he says, because as a centrist, "I make things happen."

Steve Goodman, 35, an independent voter, agrees. "I like people who work with both parties," he said as he waited in Stamford for a commuter train. "I like the fact that he votes the issue."

For Stamford lawyer Jim Hughes, an undecided voter, the election is "a coin toss" between good candidates. Yet he gets "weak knees over the war" and an open-ended commitment in Iraq. "That might have something to do with" whom he chooses, he says.

Unlike some Republicans who try to avoid talking about the war, Shays has taken it head-on. "I know more than any other member of Congress about what's going on in Iraq," he says.

"I'm not afraid to lose this election over the war," says Shays, who has visited Iraq 14 times, more than any other lawmaker.

It is clear the conflict has taken a toll. His eyes turn watery when he speaks of Iraqis and U.S. military families who have lost loved ones. He uses words like "tormented" and "wrestle" when talking about how his warnings as far back as April 2004 of mistakes went unheeded. And he calls "offensive" Farrell's charge of an "election year conversion" when, after the anti-war candidate Lamont's primary trouncing of Lieberman, Shays called for a timeline to get out.

Yet as political pressure has mounted, Shays has had some self-inflicted problems. Last month, he said abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib's prison involved a "sex ring" and not torture. He later backtracked.

Two days earlier, he defended taking money from embattled House Speaker Dennis Hastert by saying of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a Farrell supporter, that, "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water and then have a press conference the next day. Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody." The reference was to the 1969 car crash in Chappaquiddick that left a woman dead.

"Those were out of character," Orman says, "but it showed how intense the race has gotten."

Campaign '06: In Final Days, Parties Dream Of Senate Upsets (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 3, 2006

Democrats and Republicans have each picked a state where they're hoping for a November Surprise and have begun pouring buzzer-beating money into Senate contests that have not been on anyone's toss-up list.

DOJ_NMG_0090672

For Democrats, the hope for an upset is Arizona, where incumbent Sen. Jon Kyl (R), has looked safe from the Democratic challenger, shopping mall developer Jim Pederson.

For Republicans, the long shot is Michigan, where the National Republican Senatorial Committee is throwing a $900,000 lifeline to Mike Bouchard, a sheriff challenging Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D).

In Arizona, Kyl would only lose in a national typhoon. But Democrats are acting confident and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, is touting an "expanding Senate playing field." Pederson, the Democrat, has mounted an attack focusing on Iraq and special interests. The conservative Kyl has focused on "Arizona accomplishments" and expertise on terrorism.

In Michigan, Stabenow has led handily in polls and fundraising. Bouchard, with the slogan "Results for a Change," began running the nationally financed ads yesterday, and reaches out to younger voters tonight by appearing with Kid Rock. Democrats say it's too late, and that Stabenow has used her cash advantage to build a lead and define Bouchard.

Republicans hope for an upset in Michigan because an anti-incumbent tide could benefit the GOP in a state where both U.S. Senators and the Governor are Democrats. That is one of the races that will help illuminate whether any wave this year is anti-incumbent, or just anti-Republican. The GOP is also making offensive moves in New Jersey, where Tom Kean Jr. is profiting from corruption charges against incumbent Robert Menendez, and Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is running on change against Democrat Ben Cardin, a 10-termer in the U.S. House.

In other Senate races, two struggling Republicans are both running ads acknowledging public frustration with Iraq. In Washington state, Republican Mike McGavick, former chief executive of an insurance giant, is using the tag line "Real. Change" to challenge freshman Sen. Maria Cantwell (D), who has supported the war. A new McGavick ad uses the President's former "stay the course" mantra as a slur against Cantwell and says: "President Bush doesn't understand our frustrations." In Minnesota, three-term Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) is gaining on prosecutor Amy Klobuchar (D) with an ad that tries to level with voters. "None of us like war. And we've made some mistakes in Iraq," the ad says. "Leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America." His close is one of the year's most memorable: "I'm Mark Kennedy. ... I approve this message even though I know it may not be what you want to hear."

Vitriol Fills The Air And Airwaves As Allen And Webb Battle On (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 2 -- Democratic Senate hopeful James Webb today tapped the star appeal of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama to stir the passions of his party's base, rallying with 700 supporters before heading to Northern Virginia for a similar event with actor Michael J. Fox.

Obama told a cheering crowd at Virginia Union University that Webb is someone who "has fought for this country, who has led this country," and he urged supporters to drag "those uncles and cousins who don't vote to the polls" on Tuesday to help elect Webb.

Webb's opponent, incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen, had a more low-key day, accepting the endorsement of the Minutemen, a national organization that fights illegal immigration, at a news conference in Roanoke. He then went to the Philip Morris cigarette plant just south of Richmond to privately shake hands for an hour during a shift change.

Allen plans to fly across the state this weekend, stopping in Hampton Roads, Winchester, Southside Virginia, Roanoke and Norfolk. He plans to spend Sunday in Northern Virginia. Aides declined to give details of the events or say who will be campaigning with the senator.

"I knew I had a target on my back," Allen told reporters at Philip Morris. "The national liberal Democrats have no love for me. I knew they'd be gunning for me."

Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and has been campaigning for candidates who support stem cell research, spoke to a crowd of about 1,000 at a ballroom in Clarendon. "A vote for Jim Webb is a vote for hope and a better quality of life for Americans," the actor said.

DOJ_NMG_0090673

The attention from Fox and Obama, who have been crossing the country to stump for candidates, marks the beginning of a statewide tour for Webb that will include stops with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, former governor Mark R. Warner and former U.S. senator Bob Kerrey of Nebraska. The five-day trip will end with former president Bill Clinton at an election-eve rally in Alexandria.

"If we prevail here -- and we are going to prevail," Webb told the enthusiastic crowd at Virginia Union, "we are going to bring a different kind of attitude to the United States government."

Both candidates expect a close race and have begun to prepare for the possibility of a recount. Allen's campaign team held an hours-long meeting Wednesday to plot legal strategy in the event that a recount is necessary. Allen is consulting former Virginia solicitor general William H. Hurd, who led the recount team for Republicans last year when Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) won by just 360 votes.

Webb aides said they also are preparing contingency plans for a recount, although they said they are confident they will not be needed. A drawn-out legal battle in Virginia could leave the state's residents in limbo and the balance of power in the Senate unclear.

"The last thing we need is another recount," said state Sen. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who lost to McDonnell. "Nov. 8 was like Groundhog Day for six . . . weeks. I've moved on. But it was very tough. We don't need that."

Allen started his day in Roanoke, where he focused on illegal immigration. He picked up the endorsement of Chris Simcox, founder and chairman of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, which is battling illegal immigration along the U.S. border with Mexico and elsewhere. Minutemen have been in Herndon videotaping day laborers and would-be employers after the Town Council there approved setting up a controversial center to host day laborers seeking work.

Later, Allen talked to reporters in front of the Philip Morris plant, where the company produces about 240 billion cigarettes a year. Allen condemned Webb and Democrats as having run "the most negative, smearing campaign that Virginia has ever seen."

Even as he said that, the National Republican Senatorial Committee began running an attack ad on his behalf, saying Webb has written books that stereotype women as promiscuous objects. "His novels? Some are graphic, even deviant," a female announcer says in the commercial.

Allen also began running an ad accusing Webb of wanting to give Social Security benefits to illegal immigrants.

Webb advisers condemned the ads, saying they are "full of lies." At the Obama rally, Webb again accused Allen of waging a "classic Karl Rove campaign, designed to divide people, to go after their emotions, to assassinate people's character. This has been an incredibly negative campaign."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee began airing a television commercial attacking Allen by citing negative comments from Virginia newspapers. "Allen is a mediocre senator. He is in lockstep with Bush. An administration parrot," the ad says.

At the Virginia Union rally, Obama called on Virginians to send President Bush and Republicans a clear message by voting Allen out of office. Of the voters across the country, he said, "When they start paying attention, the folks in power right now are in trouble."

Warner and Kaine also helped to whip up the crowd. Kaine called Webb "a spectacular, spectacular candidate." Warner mocked Allen, saying the "cakewalk" that pundits had predicted for the incumbent was turning into a victory for Webb.

"It's five days before, again in Virginia, we make history," Warner roared.

Staff writers Tim Craig and Bill Turque in Washington contributed to this report.

Webb Goes Big As Allen Stays Local (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

James H. Webb Jr. is sticking close to his Democratic friends and held rallies with political heavy hitters yesterday, while Republican Sen. George Allen is standing with local leaders at much smaller meet-and-greets as Virginia's U.S. Senate race enters its final days.

Mr. Webb, who holds a slight lead in most polls, joined Sen. Barack Obama and Virginia's top Democrats at an overflowing midday rally in Richmond before appearing at a sold-out fundraiser with actor Michael J. Fox and former presidential candidate

DOJ_NMG_0090674

Gen. Wesley Clark in Arlington last night. Mr. Webb will hold an Election Eve rally with former President Bill Clinton, his second appearance in Virginia this year.

Mr. Webb said the energy at the Clarendon Ballroom last night is "what carried us from a deficit of 33 points at one point to a lead" in the polls.

Mr. Allen, meanwhile, nabbed the endorsement of the border-enforcement group the Minutemen and today plans to attend small events with local leaders in Hampton Roads, including an appearance at the Chesapeake Fire Academy graduation.

"I shook hands with well over a thousand folks in there," Mr. Allen said yesterday after greeting the 2,500 workers at the Philip Morris cigarette-manufacturing plant in Richmond.

His advisers have not outlined their strategy for planning low-turnout events nor have they released a formal schedule for the campaign's final weekend, but Mr. Allen yesterday said he was glad to meet with tax-paying "working people."

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Govs. Mark Warner and L. Douglas Wilder revved up the more than 700 attendees at the Obama rally at Virginia Union University yesterday. They said Mr. Webb has priceless momentum heading into Tuesday's election.

The national names guarantee Mr. Webb good television coverage, but the current and former governors are key local boosters.

"This is like the Dream Team and 'American Idol' and all that all rolled up into one," Mr. Kaine said. "I can feel the energy all across this commonwealth."

Although Mr. Webb has been attached at the hip to Mr. Kaine, Mr. Warner and Mr. Wilder and has brought in the Democratic party's top fundraisers and cheerleaders in recent weeks, Mr. Allen has not announced plans to bring any Republican stars to Virginia for the final days of campaigning.

President Bush appeared at a Richmond fundraiser for Mr. Allen last month, and first lady Laura Bush also raised money for the Republican.

Mr. Allen has been on the campaign trail with respected Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and will be joined by members of the state's Republican congressional delegation in coming days.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee implored his supporters in a recent e-mail: "The President and I have relied upon George Allen over the last years to cast critical votes on legislation important to our efforts to move America forward."

Mr. Allen recently has brought in lesser-known Republican senators including Elizabeth Dole and Richard M. Burr of North Carolina, David Vitter of Louisiana and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona is the biggest name who could feasibly come to Virginia, but his staffers did not return calls asking whether he will.

Mr. McCain has starred in television ads and raised money for Mr. Allen.

The endorsement from the Minutemen political action committee will help Mr. Allen with his conservative base. Mr. Allen opposed the Senate's "comprehensive" immigration plan and favors strong border enforcement instead of a "path to citizenship" for illegals.

Mr. Allen is running ads saying that if Mr. Webb is elected, he would reward illegal aliens with amnesty.

Through Monday, both candidates will touch down in all the state's regions, but none of Mr. Allen's upcoming events are expected to generate the type of excitement seen by the screaming Obama fans yesterday.

Rally attendees shoved themselves at the Illinois Democrat to ask for autographs and screamed until they were hoarse when Mr. Webb alluded to Mr. Obama's presidential ambitions.

"He needs your help, he needs people to volunteer, he needs people to make phone calls, he needs people to do whatever it takes," Mr. Obama said, adding he is "absolutely confident" that work will lead to a Webb victory.

Mr. Allen would be wise to avoid another Bush visit, even though he is a major crowd draw.

Last fall, Republican gubernatorial candidate Jerry W. Kilgore was hurt by an election-eve rally with the president, whose popularity at the time was sinking but higher than it stands today.

In Arlington last night, a crowd of about 900 gathered at the sold-out event at the Clarendon Ballroom, while people outside sported anti-Bush-Cheney signs and sold stickers saying: "Bill Clinton lied about sex -- George Bush lies about everything."

Mr. Fox and Gen. Clark said they support the Vietnam War veteran because he's a "man of integrity."

"Senator Allen needs to hear from you, a vote for Jim Webb is a vote for the hope of a better quality of life for millions of Americans," said Mr. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and has become a national symbol for the debate over stem-cell research.

"We owe it to our families, we owe it to our neighbors, and we owe it to future generations," Mr. Fox said. "We are not unrealistic. We realize it may take years before the promise of stem-cell research is realized, but we need scientists and researchers to start now with the full support of the federal government."

Mr. Webb said he relies on scientists who say research could hold the key to breakthrough cures for Alzheimer's disease, spinal-cord injuries and Parkinson's.

In July, Mr. Allen supported Mr. Bush's veto of a bill allowing federal funding for embryonic-stem-cell research.

"I am for stem-cell research but not the kind that would destroy human embryos," Mr. Allen said yesterday.

Allen, Webb Turn Focus To Ground Game (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

RICHMOND -- In the final days before the U.S. Senate election in Virginia, both campaigns are focusing on a crucial ground game to get voters to the polls.

Sen. George Allen, a Republican, and former Navy Secretary James H. Webb Jr., a Democrat, are prepared for a long night Tuesday in case the result is too close to call.

Both men, who have spent months slinging political mud back and forth, will spend the remainder of the campaign trying to energize their supporters.

"Thunder's impressive, but it's lightning that does the work," Mr. Allen said yesterday, quoting Mark Twain. "Susan and I may be the thunder, the lightning is all our grass-roots supporters all over Virginia."

Mr. Webb said yesterday the folks on the ground are the reason he went from having no money and being more than 30 points behind in polls to leading Mr. Allen in the most recent polls.

"We're going to go 24 hours a day until Tuesday morning," Mr. Webb told supporters in Richmond yesterday.

Both campaigns would not outline their legal strategy if the victor's margin is razor-thin, if a recount is needed or if there are problems with voting machines, but each has lawyers in place just in case.

"We are ready for that scenario if it were to occur," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "We are covering all our bases."

"It's going to be a close election -- we want to win by enough so we don't have to worry about lawyers," Mr. Allen said. "We need less litigation in our country."

A recount certainly is possible, as Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are locked in a tight battle, and last fall, the attorney general's race in Virginia was decided by fewer than 400 votes following a long recount process and several court hearings.

Mr. Allen's campaign Web site (www.georgeallen.com) encourages Virginians to "Vote early, vote Allen," and asks for volunteers for the "72-hour get-out-the-vote team."

Mr. Webb's Web site (www.webbforsenate.com) asks voters to join "Jim's Brigade" and to request absentee ballots so they are free to help on Election Day. "We need YOU!" it states.

Virginians also will see a barrage of political ads on television through Tuesday -- ranging from attacks on character to upbeat, positive messages from each candidate asking humbly for their vote.

Both Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb will be aided by outside groups -- including conservative and liberal bloggers -- hoping to influence the election outcome.

The League of Conservation Voters is going door to door for Mr. Webb to educate voters on what they say is Mr. Allen's worst-in-the-Senate environmental record and is encouraging Virginians to vote absentee.

The National Rifle Association is telling its 100,000 Virginia members that it has strongly endorsed Mr. Allen with an "A-plus" rating, though Mr. Webb has been given an "A" rating by the gun rights group.

DOJ_NMG_0090676

State Republicans are putting their all into Mr. Allen's turnout operation, especially in Northern Virginia where the party has suffered in back-to-back elections.

"It is time for all conservatives in Virginia to mount up and win the ground game for Senator Allen," reads a post on the Allen-friendly "A-Team" blog (www.allens-a-team.com).

The blogger encouraged volunteers to drop literature and put up yard signs.

Mr. Webb has been getting advice from the last two statewide Democratic winners -- Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner.

"I think Jim Webb's got all the momentum, and I see nothing that's going to change that in the next few days," Mr. Warner said.

Yesterday, Webb volunteers handed out fliers asking for more help to make phone calls and talk to voters after they leave the polls on Election Day.

"We're doing it out of zeal for the candidate," said Hank Alden, a Henrico County resident and "sign captain" of the Webb volunteers.

As of Wednesday, there were nearly 4.6 million registered voters in Virginia.

Voters, who are not required to register by party, have been asking for more absentee ballots to vote early than in previous years.

State elections officials said more than 100,000 requests for absentee ballots were made as of last week.

In Virginia Race, Women May Be The Decider (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

FAIRFAX, Va., Nov. 1 — There is, unquestionably, a striking amount of testosterone in the Virginia Senate race between Senator George Allen, football-tossing Republican conservative, and Jim Webb, Democrat, Vietnam veteran and chronicler of the warrior tradition.

But the real struggle in this exceedingly tight contest, one of a handful that will determine control of the Senate, may be decided by how women vote.

In the final stretch before Election Day, both candidates have high-profile Virginia women campaigning on their behalf. Mary Matalin, the Republican strategist, is urging women to “talk to your girlfriends” on Mr. Allen’s behalf. Lynda Robb, the wife of former Senator Chuck Robb and a daughter of President Lyndon B. Johnson, is hailing Mr. Webb as “understanding the needs of Virginia’s families.”

The Allen and Webb campaigns have attacked each other throughout the fall over their commitment (or lack thereof) to women’s issues and concerns, and they are ending, to a large extent, with women’s voices. In one Webb commercial being broadcast this week, a woman named April Cain looks into the camera and declares, “I have two boys, one is 9 and one is 12.”

“George Allen hasn’t done anything to help my family,” Ms. Cain adds.

In a new commercial for Mr. Allen, put up by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the female announcer intones that Mr. Webb’s writings “routinely stereotype women as promiscuous objects.”

“Arrogantly and outrageously,” the voice continues, “Webb refuses to be ashamed of what he’s written.”

The battle for the female vote began in earnest earlier this fall, when the Allen campaign, struggling to regain control of the race after several missteps, took aim at Mr. Webb’s argument 30 years ago against women in combat and the admission of women to the Naval Academy.

For much of the fall, commercials have featured retired military women arguing for — and against — Mr. Webb, who has said that he has changed over the years and that he should be judged by his record of advancing women when he was secretary of the Navy during the Reagan administration.

Last week, when polls showed the race a dead heat, the Allen campaign introduced a new issue seemingly tailored for women: saying Mr. Webb’s novels included sexually explicit scenes and “chauvinistic attitudes.”

DOJ_NMG_0090677

Mr. Webb's allies noted that his novels, mostly about men at war, were, first of all, fiction, and, second, had been widely acclaimed by a spectrum of prominent people like Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a fellow Vietnam veteran.

Those attacks, some analysts say, help explain why some recent polls show Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen running close among women.

"We don't have a gender gap," said Harry L. Wilson, director of a new Roanoke College Poll, alluding to the Democrats' traditional advantage among women, although other polls have indicated the Democratic edge remains.

Equally striking is that Mr. Webb is neck and neck with Mr. Allen among men, which is unusual for a Democrat.

Mr. Webb's strategists acknowledge that he has room to increase his support among women, but say he will realize that potential in the final days.

"Sure, they did break through with this stuff that happened 30 years ago," said Kristian Denny Todd, Mr. Webb's press secretary. "But at the end of the day, a lot of these women have small children, they care about education, they care about the war.

"They'll say, this stuff happened 30 years ago. But he's with me on things I care about today."

That case is made, in part, by the commercial featuring Ms. Cain, who argues that while Mr. Allen has been in the Senate, health care costs have continued to rise, "college tuition is out of control" and Mr. Allen gave himself a raise. Another Webb ad asserted that Mr. Allen "voted against family and medical leave three times."

Steve Jarding, an adviser to the Webb campaign, said, "The dilemma for Allen is he's not a moderate on women's issues."

The Allen campaign has relied heavily on Susan Allen, the candidate's wife, to make its case to women. In an interview, Ms. Allen denounced the negative tone of the Senate campaign, but defended the Allen campaign's highlighting of Mr. Webb's novels.

"The fact is, my husband's life has been an open book in this campaign — all his speeches, votes, his record has been an open book for everyone to examine," she said.

The demographics in this race revolve around more than sex. The populous suburbs of Northern Virginia are becoming an increasing source of strength for Democrats; the strategic imperative for Mr. Webb is to exploit that advantage fully to offset any losses in less friendly areas.

The Senate campaign over the past four months has taken striking turns. Mr. Allen, long considered a potential 2008 contender for the White House, saw his lead melt away after making what was perceived as a demeaning racial reference to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent. This week, a scuffle broke out at an Allen campaign event after a liberal blogger aggressively tried to question Mr. Allen about his treatment of his first wife, Anne Waddell. Ms. Waddell issued a statement on the Allen campaign Web site this week saying that Mr. Allen "was, and is, a wonderful person," and that if she lived in Virginia she would vote for him.

The anger between the two campaigns over tactics and strategy is palpable.

Adding to it are stark differences between the two candidates on issues, beginning with the war in Iraq. Mr. Webb, a first-time candidate for elective office, said he entered the race largely because of the Bush administration's handling of Iraq, which he had sharply criticized even before the invasion; Mr. Allen has supported the president's policies.

Mr. Webb is closing out his campaign with a new, upbeat spot in which he declares, to the camera: "Those in power haven't served us. They've failed to protect our working people, they failed us on ethics and they're failing in Iraq. Bottom line: they're not fighting for you. I will."

Mr. Allen, in one of his closing commercials, declares, "I want to continue fighting for our shared values: lower taxes, a better education for our children, and a safer, stronger America."

At a campaign event in Fairfax on Wednesday, Mr. Allen, seeking his second term after serving as governor of Virginia, said his campaign was "going really well."

But the Webb campaign was claiming momentum, and independent analysts said the race remained too close to call.

Stem Cells A Wild Card In Missouri Senate Contest (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

DOJ_NMG_0090678

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

ST. LOUIS

Candidates for US Senate have all been dealt similar hands for this midterm election: a president with low job approval, rising voter uneasiness about the Iraq war, and flat wages. But here in Missouri, there's a wild card in the Senate contest - stem-cell research.

It's possible that a stem-cell ballot initiative here could affect voter turnout enough to tip one of the country's closest Senate races. Trouble is, no one can predict with confidence which candidate would benefit most: the Republican incumbent, who opposes a state constitutional amendment to permit the use of embryonic stem cells for medical research, or the Democratic challenger, who supports it.

About 51 percent of Missouri voters favor Amendment 2 while 35 percent are against it, a Research 2000 poll reported last weekend. Support for the amendment has fallen in recent months with more voters now saying they are undecided about it. The amendment would permit the use in Missouri of any federally allowed stem-cell research and treatments, including work involving human embryos.

But the advantage may in fact go to Sen. Jim Talent, running to serve a second term, because the stem-cell issue could bring to the polls the state's social conservatives who, while they are voting against Amendment 2, would also be likely to cast a vote for him.

The team behind challenger Claire McCaskill (D) "is banking on voter support for stem cell [research] to translate into support for her," says David Kimball, a political scientist at the University of Missouri here. "But it may actually energize conservative voters. If that issue were not on the ballot, they might not have as much reason to come out and vote."

An 11th-hour, TV-ad slugfest over the stem-cell measure may have served to stimulate voter interest. In an ad that debuted Oct. 21 during the first game of the World Series, actor Michael J. Fox touted Ms. McCaskill and attacked Senator Talent for failing to support the amendment. Talent supports stem-cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo, but has said he opposes the amendment because it would "make cloning human life at the earliest state a constitutional right." Conservative talk-show host Rush Limbaugh subsequently leapt on Mr. Fox, and a group opposing the initiative rebutted the Fox ad.

The video by Missourians Against Human Cloning features World Series hero-pitcher Jeff Suppan, former St. Louis Rams quarterback Kurt Warner, and James Caviezel, the actor who portrayed Jesus in Mel Gibson's movie, "The Passion of the Christ." Mr. Caviezel begins the ad speaking in Aramaic and concludes with the warning: "You know now. Don't do it," referring to voting for the amendment.

Such ads could resonate with Roman Catholic voters, who make up about 16 percent of Missouri's 5.8 million residents. Many priests in the state have taken a strong stance against the stem-cell measure, some even handing out antiamendment yard signs after Sunday Mass, according to a parishioner who saw it happening at his church.

"We're strong Catholics," he says, asking that his name not be used. "But we're not happy about the church's big push on this. They're going all out."

A CNN/Opinion Research poll on Monday showed the Senate race to be "a tossup," with Talent and McCaskill each garnering 49 percent support from likely voters.

The stakes are high. "This Missouri race could be the difference between keeping a [Republican] majority in the Senate and not keeping it," says Brooke Buchanan, a Republican National Committee spokeswoman. "We're prepared to do anything it takes to make sure Senator Talent continues to be the senator from Missouri."

The tight race has drawn the national parties and their fellow travelers, who have poured manpower and money into the state. The result: Missourians have been lashed by a maelstrom of conflicting, often negative ads on TV and in print. The Talent camp has slammed McCaskill with charges that she misused her post as state auditor. Groups supporting McCaskill are publicizing Talent's votes against raising the minimum wage - and berating him for taking $165,000 in annual pay as a senator.

Of course, many factors go into most voters' calculus about whom to vote for, and stem-cell research is just one. The Iraq war is the biggest concern here, reflected in President Bush's 37 percent popularity rating with Missourians. McCaskill's team has been bent on linking Mr. Bush and Talent, saying the senator doesn't represent "Missouri values" but is simply a rubber stamp for failed Bush policies, most notably Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0090679

That message resonates even among some Republicans.

"Jim's position is basically that, whatever Bush wants, he gets. His percentage of voting with the president is abnormally high, and it's hurt him," says a state Republican Party activist who asked not to be named because he is upset with Talent and might vote against him. "Talent will depend upon the get-out-the-vote machinery. We can get the people out all right, but can we get them to cast [their votes] the way we want [them] to?"

On a recent Sunday, Franklin and Tresa McCallie went door-to-door in Kirkwood - a conservative, upper-middle-class St. Louis suburb - to campaign for Democratic candidates. They say they found an unusual responsiveness.

"I'm a yellow-dog Democrat who was raised a conservative in Chattanooga, Tennessee," Mr. McCallie says in a pronounced drawl. "Kirkwood typically goes Republican. But the problem for Mr. Talent is that all the issues are running against him. You have people in Kirkwood who are not all wealthy or rich, and they're questioning the status quo."

The old calculus for winning in Missouri was to carry the big cities and suburbs in five counties, where about 52 percent of the voters live. But in recent elections, that equation was upended by turnout surges in the state's 109 rural counties. Rural Missouri, with its strong contingent of Christian conservatives, has gone strongly for Bush and Republicans.

But fewer rural conservatives may be with Talent this year, thanks to the Iraq war, analysts say. As a result, McCaskill is pursuing what some see as a risky strategy of spending the end of the campaign shuttling between St. Louis and rural towns like Kirksville and Sikeston - where she and Talent recently appeared in a parade, riding just floats apart - to try to make inroads into Republican territory.

Talent, meanwhile, has been stumping in rural sections of the state, shoring up his base in towns such as Mexico, Mo., and Rogersville. The big question is whether the stem-cell turnout will be enough to reelect Talent.

"Voters are predisposed to be upset with the governing party, and that's the Republicans," says Dr. Kimball. "All the big issues are running up against the powerful Republican turnout machine. So I just don't know what to expect, honestly. This is not a typical election."

Actor Tackles Emotional Political Role (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

CHEVY CHASE -- Michael J. Fox sits in a chair in a hotel room, in constant motion. Legs are crossed and uncrossed. Socks are repeatedly pulled up underneath trousers. His head moves side to side with reliable irregularity.

The movements would be arresting if not for the man behind them. He is focused. So determined to tell what he has to say.

Fox is bringing his Parkinson's disease, and a political message, to Maryland and other states where control of the U.S. Senate is in the balance: Virginia, Missouri, Ohio, Iowa and Wisconsin.

While politicians debate whether frozen embryos should be adopted, used for research or discarded, Fox wants to change people's minds.

Federal money for embryonic stem cell research can improve life for the sick and the disabled, he told a couple of hundred people backing Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin's bid for U.S. Senate Thursday. Fox said he will stump for candidates who support such funding and fight like crazy against those who don't.

"We are who are," Fox, 45, said in a Holiday Inn ballroom with Cardin by his side. "We have what we have. We want what we want, and we have a right to seek the representation that will get it for us."

The actor has become one of the most visible figures of the campaign season by thrusting himself into an emotional debate over emerging science and its moral implications.

Fox, the former star of the Back to the Future movies and the situation comedies Family Ties and Spin City, is commanding a bigger stage these days as an advocate for embryonic stem cell research, targeting states that could elect senators favorable to science.

DOJ_NMG_0090680

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the GOP's Senate nominee in Maryland, opposes embryonic stem cell research. He and Cardin are airing television ads on the subject. Fox is featured in Cardin's. In Steele's, his sister, Monica Turner, calls the Fox ad "deceptive, tasteless" and reveals that she has multiple sclerosis.

During an interview at the hotel before the Cardin event, Fox took the high road when asked about the Steele ad. He said he had not seen it in full.

"I don't want to get involved with any conflict with another patient," Fox said. "It just is what it is. I respect everyone's point of view. And I respect her right to express it. I really do. And more power to her. And I'm sure she's thought about it and prayed about it and done whatever process she has to do to reach the conclusion she's reached, and I fully respect that."

He had harsher words for a Steele campaign spokesman who, Fox said, called his ad in extremely poor taste.

"As far as the other goes -- the campaign itself calling my ad in extremely poor taste -- that leads you to conclusions about attitudes toward sick people and their symptomatology and their right to be involved in the process and their franchise to help shape government policy and the future of health and science in the country," he said. "That's strange to me. And certainly to millions of Americans."

Fox, whose Parkinson's foundation has raised about $70 million over the past five years, said he does not care about political labels. He said he would back, and has supported, members of both parties who favor embryonic stem cell research.

In Maryland Thursday, with Fox by his side, Cardin promised that if he is elected Tuesday, he will promote the research, which is opposed by some conservatives and anti-abortion candidates because it involves the destruction of a human embryo.

"I am going to be pushing that bill with all the energy I have," Cardin said to applause.

On NBC's Meet the Press, Steele said he views the destruction of an embryo as the taking of a life and that, in keeping with his anti- abortion views, can't condone it. He suggested adoption for the 400,000 or more embryos in fertility clinics across the country.

Fox said Thursday that adoption could be a fine use for some of the embryos but that tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of others would remain. And embryonic stem cells can do something their adult stem cell counterparts cannot, Fox said, because they're more flexible.

Adult stem cells, research on which Steele and Bush support, are "cranky cells," Fox said.

"They already are what they are, they don't want to be anything else," he said. "When you try to get them to be something else, they don't like doing it. And when you get them to be something else, they don't want to stay that way."

Embryonic stem cells, in contrast, can become various cells in the human body. That is how the healing could start for the paralyzed, the Alzheimer's patient or the actor turned advocate who is trying to make Washington stand up and listen.

"To limit it to [adult stem cells] is like saying you can have a seat belt, but you can't have an air bag," Fox said. "We have the technology to have air bags. I'd like both. If that's OK."

Then he pauses, a wry smile spreading across his face. "Tasteless idea," he says.

Cardin Rallies Blacks In PG (WT)

By Jon Ward And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday tried to rally support among black Democrats in Prince George's County, while Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele campaigned with county Democratic leaders who broke ranks this week to endorse him.

Mr. Cardin appeared with Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and about 30 other lawmakers in Hyattsville, aiming to keep a diminishing lead in the polls.

Mr. Johnson noted that he supported Mr. Cardin's opponent in the primary -- Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"Unfortunately, as Democrats, we know we can only have one winner," Mr. Johnson said.

Mr. Mfume narrowly lost the nomination and trounced Mr. Cardin in Prince George's, with 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824.

DOJ_NMG_0090681

In his first public show of support for Mr. Cardin, Mr. Johnson said the 10-term congressman is "one fantastic individual that will represent us in the United States Senate."

"I am proud and a strong supporter of Ben Cardin for the United States Senate," Mr. Johnson said.

But the rally turned sour later. State Sen. Nathaniel Exum, Prince George's Democrat, berated Mr. Cardin for excluding him and other local delegates from speaking or being mentioned.

"You do the same [stuff] over and over again, just ignore us," Mr. Exum yelled at Mr. Cardin after the rally, which was held in Mr. Exum's district.

Mr. Cardin shrugged off the incident.

"I think he's upset that we didn't go over the names, but I'm not too concerned about it," Mr. Cardin said. "He's supporting us."

Today, Mr. Cardin will appear with Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, for the second time in this campaign, which has become one of the country's most closely watched races.

Mr. Cardin's rally was designed to respond to Mr. Steele's endorsement from prominent Prince George's Democrats earlier this week. Former County Executive Wayne K. Curry and all five black members of the County Council endorsed Mr. Steele, saying the Democratic Party has taken black voters for granted.

Mr. Cardin attacked Maryland Republicans, saying their plans to question voters whom they think committed fraud is an attempt at voter intimidation and suppression.

The Maryland Republican Party said the plans were copied from Democratic plans and are allowed under law. They also released a document from the 2004 presidential election in which Colorado Democrats were advised to make up claims of voter intimidation against minority voters if none could be found.

The election could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday. The county, which is more than 65 percent black, accounts for a large part the Democratic Party's overwhelming advantage in voter registration.

Mr. Steele yesterday received an endorsement from several religious leaders, including Harry Jackson a Democrat and bishop of the Hope Christian Church, a charismatic ministry in Lanham with about 2,000 members.

In Annapolis, Mr. Steele announced a 10-point election promise that included pledges to improve health care among minorities, introduce legislation to stop disparities in criminal-sentencing guidelines for blacks and to support increased aid to African and Caribbean countries.

Mr. Steele ended his day by campaigning with Mr. Curry in Greenbelt.

Mr. Cardin attended an afternoon rally in Bethesda with TV star Michael J. Fox to call for embryonic stem-cell research, then one in Baltimore with former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the 2004 Democratic vice-presidential nominee.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, also attended the Edwards rally, during the second day of his six-day, statewide bus tour.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican running for re-election, voted by absentee ballot in Glen Burnie, Md., and will today campaign at several stops, all in Baltimore County.

Mr. Ehrlich has cut Mr. O'Malley's double-digit lead to one point, according to poll released this week that was conducted for the Baltimore Sun. The poll, by Potomac Inc., showed Mr. O'Malley leading Mr. Ehrlich 47 percent to 46 percent with five percent undecided.

Steele Would Help Change Capital's Culture (BSUN)

By John Mccain

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

I strongly support Michael S. Steele's candidacy for one simple reason: We need to change Washington.

Congress doesn't need another career politician or political insider. We need someone who is a strong, independent voice for what is right, regardless of party politics. I know Michael Steele, and I know he will shake up Washington for all the right reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0090682

We see it almost every day: runaway spending, scandal, legislation written by and for special interests. Washington has become a culture unto itself where special interests reign supreme, where partisanship precedes statesmanship, and where the ambitions of politicians come before the interests of the people.

It doesn't need to be this way. You can change the way Washington works. But to do so, you must elect candidates such as Michael Steele who have the courage to do the right thing, regardless of their party.

By sending Michael Steele to the U.S. Senate, Marylanders not only would be electing a public servant who knows and cares about the issues concerning the entire Old Line State, but they also would be delivering a clear message that it is time for change.

This summer, I came to Baltimore to campaign for Michael Steele because he has the courage to do something simple: represent Maryland, not special interests.

In the four years he spent as your lieutenant governor, Michael Steele single-handedly broke the mold of his predecessors, using his position as a vehicle for change. He has visited schools, community centers, housing projects and businesses forgotten by others. He has done so not to score political points, but to find solutions to problems that directly affect Baltimore. As he has traveled to every corner of the state, his campaign echoes this solutions-driven policy throughout Maryland.

Michael Steele has successfully built bridges across racial, economic and partisan lines. He has worked to fix Maryland's pension system for teachers and to improve school systems that have given up on kids, and empowered small businesses throughout the state to foster access and opportunity for minority business owners - increasing minority business within the state by one-third. The Sun named Michael Steele one of the 2003 legislative session's "winners" for his efforts on both sides of the aisle.

It is time for someone fully committed to changing the way Washington operates. It is time for someone who is not afraid to criticize what's wrong - with either party. It is time for someone who knows that getting things done and creating positive change is more effective than a "go along to get along" attitude.

It is time for Michael Steele.

Little Seems Secure About Security Tapes (LVS)

By Jeff German

Las Vegas Sun, November 3, 2006

· For three days this week, the media were saturated with speculation from unnamed sources that just-discovered video surveillance tapes do not show Rep. Jim Gibbons and Chrissy Mazzeo inside a parking garage where she claims the Republican gubernatorial candidate assaulted her Oct. 13.

Metro Police stood silent on the speculation - orchestrated by the high-powered Gibbons camp - until 4:20 p.m. Tuesday, when they issued a surprising statement saying they had not yet concluded that Gibbons and Mazzeo weren't on the parking-garage video. Police hadn't even finished viewing the tapes.

By that time, however, a District Court judge who was appointed to the bench after lobbying by Gibbons campaign adviser Sig Rogich had granted a hurried request by the Gibbons camp to release the still-unauthenticated tapes. Gibbons understandably was trying to stop his slide in the polls a week before the election.

In the process, however, the rights of the alleged victim, a 32-year-old single mother and cocktail waitress, were lost in the shuffle. Evidence in the criminal case was being turned over to the potential defendant before any decision had been made on the filing of charges.

Yet as odd as that was, it is just one of many strange twists in the nearly three-week saga of how tapes that purportedly didn't exist ended up existing, after all.

From the beginning:

Mazzeo was under the impression the tapes existed when she called 911 three times between 10:23 p.m. and 11:14 p.m. on Oct. 13 to report that Gibbons had accosted her inside a Hughes Center parking garage. The structure was across from McCormick & Schmick's restaurant, where she, Gibbons, Rogich and three other women had been drinking earlier in the evening.

DOJ_NMG_0090683

"And all that stuff will be on tape if there is a camera there, which I'm assuming there is," she told a police dispatcher in her third 911 call.

Mazzeo told police that Gibbons grabbed her arms, threw her up against a wall in the parking garage and tried to coerce her into having sex. Gibbons said he merely was helping Mazzeo find her truck when she stumbled just before they entered the garage and he grabbed her arms to break her fall.

Officers who interviewed Mazzeo assured her that they would obtain videotapes of the incident. But when they contacted a Hughes Center security officer that night, identified in police reports only as "Aaron," they were told the cameras in the garage weren't recording.

The next day, after officers told Mazzeo there was no video after all, she decided to drop the case. She told them she didn't want to press charges against a powerful political figure such as Gibbons.

Police closed out the investigation without checking any further for recordings of the incident.

In the meantime, the media picked up on the story. The Gibbons camp hired attorney Don Campbell and private investigator David Groover to help the congressman with his defense, which included an Oct. 19 news conference in which Gibbons strongly denied the allegations.

Still missing were any videotapes that might possibly contain the truth. Despite repeated inquiries by the Sun for over a week, officials with Crescent Real Estate Equities, which owns and manages Hughes Center, refused to shed any light on the mystery.

Mazzeo hired attorney Richard Wright to represent her interests, and on Oct. 25 she held a news conference to stand by her story and level new allegations that the Gibbons camp had harassed and pressured her into dropping the charges. The Gibbons camp strongly denied those accusations, too.

But Mazzeo forged ahead. She said she would be willing to cooperate with police once more if the case was reopened.

Again, at this point, there were no tapes to support either side.

But not for long.

After hearing that Mazzeo was willing to press charges again, police decided to "tie up some loose ends" from the previous short-lived probe, Deputy Chief Greg McCurdy said Wednesday.

Although there was no formal investigation (Metro officially still was waiting for Mazzeo to come forward), McCurdy said, detectives paid a visit to Hughes Center security offices in an attempt to find a last name for Aaron, the security officer who told police the night of the Oct. 13 incident that there were no recordings. They anticipated that they would have to interview him again once the probe started up again, McCurdy said.

During that visit, detectives learned much more than Aaron's last name. Robert Clavier, director of security for Hughes Center, showed up to say that videotapes indeed existed from Oct. 13.

"He said, 'We had the tapes and didn't know what to do because it was a closed case,' " McCurdy explained. "He said he had (them) locked up in his possession."

Detectives, McCurdy said, took possession of the tapes and took a voluntary statement from Hughes Center officials.

Sources said Hughes Center security officials viewed relevant portions of the tapes before turning them over to Metro and did not see Gibbons and Mazzeo on the recordings.

For a while, the tapes remained a secret at Metro. Indeed, at a press conference last Thursday, the day after police acquired the tapes, Sheriff Bill Young was asked several questions about possible tapes. Young did not disclose their existence.

The recordings stayed secret until Saturday, when Campbell said he learned about them from Kirk Lenhard, a lawyer then representing Crescent. It is unlikely that their conversation occurred by chance, for there are numerous connections between the Gibbons camp and the company that now says it had the tapes all along.

Lenhard is with the politically connected Jones Vargas firm, which has Republican National committeeman Joe Brown as one of its leading partners. Brown was with Gibbons at his Oct. 19 news conference denouncing Mazzeo's allegations.

Brown's firm held a fundraiser for Gibbons the day before the Oct. 13 incident, according to the candidate's latest campaign report. And on Oct. 17, Brown and Lenhard each gave $1,000 to Gibbons' campaign, the report shows.

In court papers filed this week, Campbell said Lenhard told him the tapes had been turned over to Metro Police.

DOJ_NMG_0090684

Soon, another of Campbell's clients, the Las Vegas Review-Journal, was onto a story about the newly discovered tapes - and coverage by that newspaper and other media contained Campbell's spin: The tapes absolve Gibbons of wrongdoing.

Nobody from Metro was willing to confirm that statement on record, but Gibbons and his team spent the next several days saying the candidate had been vindicated. That position stood until Metro issued its surprise disclaimer on Tuesday. They hadn't finished reviewing the tapes.

On Wednesday, police finished copying the videos and issued a news release saying they were providing copies to Campbell, Wright and the district attorney's office.

McCurdy said police now believe that Aaron, the Hughes Center security officer, did not knowingly mislead officers into believing there were no tapes on the night of the incident.

"He may have been given wrong information," McCurdy said.

McCurdy would not say what police have done in the last week to try to authenticate the tapes.

But he added: "At this time, I have no information that leads me to believe that there has been any alterations made to the tapes."

Security experts have told the Sun and Las Vegas television news organizations that the tapes are likely to be inconclusive.

If the tapes are to prove Gibbons' claims that he never entered the parking garage, thus destroying Mazzeo's account, authorities must find a way to verify the tapes as authentic and to demonstrate that the cameras unquestionably would have captured Mazzeo or Gibbons had they entered the garage.

That is a tall order, especially in the view of security experts who say the biggest hurdle to verifying the tapes is the 11 days between the night police said they were obtaining the tapes and the day Crescent handed them over to police.

In between, the tapes reportedly were locked up in the Crescent offices. The problem with that 11-day gap, security experts said, is that police cannot guarantee a "chain of custody," and that surveillance tapes can be fabricated fairly easily.

Campbell scheduled a news conference for 10 a.m. today to discuss the release of the tapes. Jeff German is the Sun's senior investigative reporter. He can be reached at 259-4067 or at german@lasvegassun.com. Sam Skolnik can be reached at 474-

Gibbons Asks Ethics Panel's Opinion On Cruise Gift By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Nevada gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Gibbons asked the House Ethics Committee for an opinion on whether he failed to report a Caribbean cruise that was paid for by a military contractor who is also a major donor to the congressman's campaign.

Mr. Gibbons sought the panel's advice after a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal raised questions about his close ties to Warren Trepp, said Mr. Gibbons's campaign manager, Robert Uithoven.

The Journal reported Wednesday that the Nevada Republican opened doors in Washington for Mr. Trepp's eTreppid Technologies LLC, a software maker that won millions of dollars in classified contracts from the Air Force, Special Operations Command and the Central Intelligence Agency. It reported that Mr. Gibbons, who served on the Intelligence and Armed Services committees, helped the Reno, Nev., company secure federal contracts and in some cases helped direct federal money to the contracts.

Mr. Trepp and companies linked to him contributed nearly $100,000 to Mr. Gibbons's campaign for governor, and Mr. Trepp hosted the congressman, his wife and others on a week-long Caribbean cruise in March 2005, flying the group home on a private jet.

A former eTreppid executive who is suing Mr. Trepp in federal court in Reno alleges that Mr. Gibbons also got unreported gifts of cash and casino chips from Mr. Trepp.

Messrs. Gibbons and Trepp deny unreported payments and said there was nothing improper about the Caribbean trip, Mr. Trepp's campaign contributions or Mr. Gibbons's efforts to arrange meetings in Washington for eTreppid. Mr. Gibbons insisted that eTreppid won business on its merits and that he had nothing to do with any classified contracts.

Also yesterday, U.S. District Judge Brian Sandoval, who has been hearing the case brought by the former eTreppid executive, recused himself from the case. The judge, a former Nevada attorney general, was appointed to the bench by President Bush last year.

Police Union Demands Mayor's Records (BSUN)

By Doug Donovan

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

The state police union demanded Thursday that Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley release his application to practice law to determine whether he properly disclosed a nearly 20-year-old drunken driving charge.

Maryland Fraternal Order of Police President John "Rodney" Bartlett Jr. said in a statement that O'Malley's refusal to release the document raises questions about the mayor's ethics and moral character.

"Mr. O'Malley refuses to release a copy of his bar application, leading to the inevitable conclusion that he failed to complete it honestly and properly," the statement said. "Although his arrest and acquittal 20 years ago on a driving under the influence charge may be irrelevant to his ability to serve as Governor, his ability to tell the truth completely and without qualification is extremely relevant."

The move by the Maryland Fraternal Order of Police was seen privately by the mayor's campaign as a political move by a union that supports O'Malley's Republican rival, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. Publicly, however, campaign aides declined to discuss the matter.

"We said all we're going to say about this a week ago when it first came out," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney.

In 1987, O'Malley was charged with driving or attempting to drive a vehicle while under the influence of alcohol. A law student at the time, O'Malley was acquitted of the charge.

Since news of the incident arose last week, the mayor has refused to release his application to become a lawyer, a form that requires the disclosure of all criminal proceedings [em dash] including traffic citations. O'Malley has said that he does not remember if he disclosed the charge.

Ehrlich's chief of staff, James C. "Chip" DiPaula Jr., and a spokesman, Henry Fawell, were copied on the e-mail release of the union's statement.

Ehrlich released his bar application last week, and it showed that he answered "no" to the questions about whether he had been a party to any criminal proceeding or whether there had been any "unfavorable incidents" in his life that would bear on his character or fitness to practice law.

Ehrlich has said O'Malley's charge should not play out in the election.

The governor has previously been quoted as saying he had his own brush with the law as a young man when he and a friend scalped tickets to Princeton University sporting events to make extra money during college. Ehrlich has said the matter was handled by Princeton University officials, not the police, as he said in an interview four years ago. So the matter did not warrant reporting on his application to the Maryland bar.

Parties Start Frantic Final Push For Voters (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 3, 2006

As dozens of critical races remain too close to call four days before Election Day, Democrats and Republicans are ramping up drives to get voters to the polls Tuesday.

The mix includes a flock of political celebrities, tens of thousands of volunteers and millions of dollars, door-knocks and phone calls, all underlaid by new techniques to pinpoint likely supporters in unlikely neighborhoods.

Republicans had a juggernaut turnout operation in 2004 and both sides say it has gotten better. There are indications, however, that the get-out-the-vote playing field is more level now. Among them:

•Both parties say they will spend more than $30 million.

•Democrats are catching up, albeit in piecemeal fashion, to the sophisticated “microtargeting” techniques that have enabled Republicans to find and motivate potential supporters across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0090686

•Ballot initiatives are spurring turnout drives on both sides. Conservatives are mobilizing voters against gay marriage and research using embryonic stem cells; liberals are mobilizing them to support the research and a minimum-wage increase.

•The Republican National Committee runs a centralized get-out-the-vote operation. Democrats are typically splintered but more efficient than usual, because 32 liberal interest groups are sharing information and coordinating their turnout drives in a coalition called America Votes.

There are more than 50 House and Senate races both parties view as competitive this year. Democrats say their turnout effort is equal to the Republican Party's in most of them. "I think they did have a better operation in 2004," New York Sen. Charles Schumer, head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, says of Republicans. "We learned that lesson."

Democrats, relying heavily on union muscle, used to have the edge in getting out the vote. "We've been very fortunate we've been able to match them and in some instances outdo them," says Michael DuHaime, political director of the Republican National Committee.

VIPs rallying voters this weekend include former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani and actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and is helping Democrats who support federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The usual powerhouses, among them the AFL-CIO and the National Rifle Association, will be out in force. Some of the most intense activity: e-mails flying across the Internet, a technique especially popular with business groups partial to Republicans.

The most coveted voters in congressional elections are people who typically vote only in presidential years. They are followed closely by swing voters who aren't loyal to one party or the other. Over the past six years, Republicans have become expert at finding them and anyone else with potential GOP leanings, even in states where voters don't register by party.

In a process called microtargeting, they collect as much information as possible about voters from public records, Census data and marketing research firms. That's used to create profiles including everything from voting history, job and marital status to where people live, what they drive, what they read and whether they fish.

The end product is a score indicating someone's likelihood of voting, of supporting one party or the other and of being interested in certain issues. Advocates then use that information to determine whom to contact and what kind of pitch to use.

"We no longer look at the world geographically," DuHaime says. "We believe there are voters everywhere that should be our voters." Before, he says, the party would skip a city or precinct where only 10% voted Republican — but now it will try to raise that 10% to 14%. "There's no area anywhere we ever write off."

Democrats are scurrying to make up for lost time. While they continue to press turnout in heavily Democratic cities and inner suburbs, they are using microtargeting to find voters in areas where only three or four in 10 people vote Democratic.

The application is spottier than the GOP's national reach and the voter descriptions less detailed. Even so, in the places Democrats most need it, some form of the technique is in use by someone.

America Votes is microtargeting in six states — Ohio, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Michigan, Colorado and Wisconsin — for its 32 member organizations. Emily's List, which helps female Democratic candidates, is microtargeting women in Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri and Washington, and in 18 House districts. Some unions are microtargeting their members to decide which doors to knock on. The two Democratic congressional campaign committees are microtargeting in most of their hot races. The Democratic National Committee is running pilot programs in six states.

"They are very hierarchical and we're not, and that's just the way it is. It's never going to change," Karin Johanson, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says of Republicans. "They're good. We're good, too."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The world's a stage

No plans for election eve?

Let's all join Al and Tipper Gore on Monday evening at the Kennedy Center Concert Hall "for an intimate conversation on the state of our environment, our global situation, our families and how we can all work together to make our future world a better place for everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0090687

Show time is 8 p.m. (tickets range from $60 to $100) for what will be a 90-minute chat titled: "Blueprint for Personal Action with Al and Tipper Gore."

72-hour campaign

Nobody laid the groundwork more for a successful midterm Election Day than Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. Placing the Democrats in the majority of Congress this month has been his No. 1 priority, and beyond that winning the White House in 2008.

So there's good reason for Mr. Dean to be concerned these final days of campaigning, given sensational predictions from pundits and pollsters alike of an easy Democratic sweep on Tuesday.

Mr. Dean had this warning yesterday, which he sent to Inside the Beltway via e-mail: "We must stay focused and ignore the polls or pundits who tell us we have the election locked up," he said. "This election is less than a week away, but there's plenty of time left for a Republican comeback.

"Most worrisome," he said: "the Republican Party's 'infamous 72-hour' operation," which he said will be "cranking up" starting this weekend to get out the Republican vote.

Tuesday fades

Everybody is waiting for Election Day, but the truth is that nearly a quarter of American voters will have cast ballots before Tuesday, either by absentee means or by visiting an early voting place.

"America is undergoing a revolution in voting. 'Election Day' is quickly becoming a thing of the past as we move towards a system of many mini-election days leading up to the main event," notes John C. Fortier in his new book, "Absentee and Early Voting: Trends, Promises, and Perils."

A research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, Mr. Fortier calls the rise in early voting "meteoric." He writes that absentee voting originated during the Civil War for soldiers away from home, but today more and more states, including California, are promoting its use.

The book states that just 25 years ago, about 5 percent of Americans voted before Election Day. That number grew to 15 percent by 2004.

Pint of Adams

We had to laugh at part of a letter sent by "The Spirit of George Washington," professional impersonator James Renwick Manship Sr., to a fellow Virginian christened with a pair of historical names.

"Dear Mason Adams," Mr. Manship writes. "As I said when I met you a week ago at the church pastored by George Mark Washington, you have a great name of two great patriots.

"I was thinking of 'my' promoter for commander in chief, and 'my' Vice President John Adams. But you mentioned Sam Adams, who due to the lager brewed in his name, is likely better known, and more sought for 'counsel' than John in these current times."

Sipping moxie

Calvin Coolidge's "civility and high ethical stature were a strong tonic" in his day, and today's leaders should "study his history and take a sip from his favorite drink, moxie."

So Cyndy Bittinger, executive director of the Calvin Coolidge Memorial Foundation in Plymouth, Vt., tells Inside the Beltway, after we had written about columnist Cal Thomas' efforts (he's related to Coolidge) to build the nation's 30th president a presidential library.

"Yes, up here in Vermont we think highly of Calvin Coolidge, a man from a farming community who made a difference in people's lives," Ms. Bittinger writes, adding that after World War I he "restored the nation to normalcy and peace."

She also cites Coolidge's "warm relationship" with the press. He met with reporters twice every week and, therefore, had no need for a press secretary.

Quote of the week

"Why are 30,000 U.S. troops tied down on that peninsula half a century after the Chinese left North Korea and 15 years after the Soviet Union expired? If the 60 million Koreans, North and South, were raptured up to heaven, how would America be imperiled?"

DOJ_NMG_0090688

— Patrick J. Buchanan, arguing this week against both conservatives and liberals who are calling for an expansion of the U.S. military to respond to hot spots around the world. Instead, the commentator says obsolete alliances should be dissolved where there are no vital American interests.

Campaigns Set For TV Finale (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The Republican and Democratic parties dumped tens of millions of dollars this week on dozens of congressional races, locking up broadcast time yesterday for a blizzard of new advertising that will saturate the airwaves over the final weekend of the midterm campaign season.

Candidates rushed out more than 600 new television ads ahead of network deadlines for the weekend, with many Republicans trying to shift attention from Iraq and President Bush to local issues such as the environment, taxes and immigration. This final thrust will boost spending on political and issue advertising past $2 billion in this campaign, or $400 million more than in the 2004 presidential campaign, according to Evan Tracey of the Campaign Media Analysis Group.

"Politics is probably the only business in the world where they spend the most money when they have the least number of available customers to pitch to," Tracey said.

Meanwhile, in Billings, Mont., President Bush kicked off a final six-day campaign swing through heavily Republican states in hopes of rallying disaffected supporters in time to save the endangered GOP majorities in Congress.

Bush opened his tour in this conservative state in a bid to rescue Sen. Conrad Burns, who has battled back from a big deficit against Democratic challenger Jon Tester, and then headed to Nevada, where the president appeared beside a House Republican candidate fighting to hold on to a once-safe seat.

Bush's itinerary and message underscored the depth of the Republican troubles this year -- particularly the president's low approval rating and the strong opposition to the Iraq war -- and the last-minute White House strategy for countering them. The 10 states the president plans to visit before Tuesday's elections all voted for Bush in 2004; he is staying away from battleground states such as Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Virginia, where many Republican candidates would rather not campaign with him at this late hour.

In the final ad rush, it has grown difficult to tell which candidates are Republicans and which are Democrats. Burns posted a new ad touting the record of Montana's Democratic senator, Max Baucus, and saying he has stood with Baucus while his opponent, Tester, would oppose him. Rep. Sue W. Kelly, one of several Upstate New York Republicans in trouble, boasts in her new ads of her record on clean air and water -- and her opposition to Bush's energy plan.

"I'm not always the most popular person with party leaders in Congress," she says.

Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.), one of three highly endangered Hoosier Republicans, treats his Democratic opponent, former congressman Baron Hill, as the incumbent, striking a popular Democratic theme when he charges that Hill voted for policies that send Indiana jobs to China.

Some Democrats are taking a similar tack. Idaho Democrat Larry Grant accuses his Republican opponent, state Rep. William T. Sali, of raising taxes, while Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) features fresh-faced Dakotans beaming, "Mostly we want to thank Stephanie Herseth for voting to strengthen national security."

But the candidates in the most jeopardy have come out swinging. Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who continues to trail his opponent badly in the polls, released an ad featuring a young Iraq war veteran who accuses Pennsylvania state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr. (D) of investing billions of the state's dollars in companies that support terrorists.

Democrat Francine Busby, in her third try for the San Diego area seat once held by imprisoned former GOP congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, lumped her opponent, Rep. Brian Bilbray (R), with Cunningham, convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, indicted former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and disgraced former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"We don't need another congressman in jail," the ad warns.

Campaign strategists rushed to book a final wave of TV ads before the weekend. A look at financial reports filed yesterday with the Federal Election Commission showed that, on Wednesday alone, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent $12.4 million on advertising in 36 districts; the National Republican Congressional Committee spent $5.9 million on commercials in 17 districts.

DOJ_NMG_0090689

The expenditures by the two committees are reflective of their overall strategies. Republicans are largely focusing their resources on the campaigns of incumbents facing surprisingly tough reelection races, in hopes of building a wall against a massive wave that could see Democrats pick up 25 or more House seats.

The Democrats must pick up at least 15 seats to win control of the House and six to win control of the Senate.

On Wednesday, the NRCC spent more than $2 million on ads for three endangered Republicans in the Philadelphia media market. The committee spent nearly $750,000 on behalf of Rep. David G. Reichert in Washington's 8th District and an additional $445,000 in Sodrel's Indiana district.

The DCCC, by contrast, is spending the bulk of its money on offensive opportunities. Its largest expenditure -- $1.3 million -- was made on behalf of Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, who is running against state Sen. Peter J. Roskam (R) for Illinois' open 6th Congressional District seat. The district is covered by the Chicago media market -- one of the most expensive in the country.

The Democratic committee plunked down $718,000 on behalf of former congressman Ken Lucas, who is trying to unseat Rep. Geoff Davis (R) in northern Kentucky's 4th District, and $673,000 in Arizona's 5th District, where Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) is trying to fend off a tougher-than-expected challenge from former Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell (D). Mitchell recently won the endorsement of the Arizona Republic newspaper, which had endorsed Hayworth in each of his past six runs for Congress but this time referred to him as a "bully."

Republican Party committees appear to have depleted much of their cash advantage, making it likely they will face tough decisions in the campaign's final days, according to the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan research group.

Between Oct. 19 and Nov. 1, national Republican committees reported spending $50 million to support House and Senate candidates, compared with $38 million spent by Democratic Party committees over the same 14 days.

Usually, the number of competitive districts goes down during a campaign's final weeks. This year, the number of competitive House seats went up. "As a result," the institute said, "the parties either have to give up on some races to concentrate their resources, or spread their resources more thinly than they had planned. This is a problem for both parties, but particularly for the Republicans, who are playing defense to save embattled incumbents."

With resources thinning, control of the Senate continues to teeter on the outcome of races in three states: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

Missouri continues to be the truest of tossups, with internal tracking polls for both parties showing the race between Sen. James M. Talent (R) and state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) within a percentage point or two. Democrats are feeling increasingly optimistic about Virginia as they believe former Navy secretary James Webb (D) is overtaking Sen. George Allen (R).

The biggest disagreement between the two sides comes in Tennessee, where Republicans spent the day touting a poll by Zogby International that showed former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker (R) opening a substantial lead over Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D), 53 percent to 43 percent. Later, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee released a poll of its own that showed Ford in the lead, 46 percent to 40 percent.

Nasty Ads Close Out A Mud-caked Campaign (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — It's a dangerous world.

To be a political candidate, that is.

Oklahoma Gov. Brad Henry is a lot like Adolf Hitler, an ad on the Internet warns. North Carolina Rep. Brad Miller wants to make America “one big fiesta for illegal aliens and homosexuals,” a radio spot featuring cheerful mariachi music claims. Indiana Rep. Chris Chocola opposes medical care for wounded vets, a TV ad suggests.

And Pennsylvania Senate candidate Bob Casey? Electing him apparently would risk nuclear annihilation.

DOJ_NMG_0090690

A record $2 billion is being spent on candidate and independent "issue" TV ads during this campaign, estimates Evan Tracey of TNSMI/Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm that tracks political ads. In the past 60 days, he says, an unprecedented 90% of the ads have been negative.

Some attack ads accurately criticize candidates for votes they've cast and positions they've taken, an analysis by the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check found, but many of the ads amount to what the report called "political mudslinging." Spots by both parties distort the truth or leave a misimpression in an effort to make a candidate seem unacceptable and his election foolhardy, even dangerous.

Political forces have combined this year in "a perfect recipe for attack advertising," says John Geer, a Vanderbilt University political scientist and author of In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns. "The parties are continuing to polarize, and the stakes are high because who controls Congress is in play."

What's more, neither side has much of a positive agenda to spotlight, he says, particularly on the issue foremost on many voters' minds: the war in Iraq.

Voters routinely decry negative ads and insist they ignore them.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month, seven in 10 said they believed "not much" or "nothing at all" of what they heard in political advertisements. By more than 2-to-1, they said most of the television advertisements they have seen this year have been negative.

Twenty-eight percent said most ads have been "very" or "extremely" negative, compared with just 4% who said most have been "very" or "extremely" positive.

The survey of 1,007 adults Oct. 6-8 had a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

The "toxicity" of the political environment may discourage some people from bothering to go to the polls, says Page Gardner of Women's Voices, Women Vote, a group that encourages political participation by single women.

Nevertheless, campaigns deploy negative ads because they work.

A Notre Dame study of advertising in the 2004 presidential campaign concluded that negative ads were much more likely than positive ones to weaken support for a candidate. Five percent of voters said their support for their favored candidate was weakened after viewing a positive ad for the opposition, while 14% said their support was weakened after seeing a negative ad targeting their side.

"They hated the negative ads, they saw positive ads as being more persuasive and influential, and yet that was not the effect," says Joan Phillips, a marketing professor who helped lead the study.

The non-partisan Fact Check analysis, released last Friday, concluded that the National Republican Congressional Committee had spent $41.9 million attacking Democratic opponents and $5 million supporting its own candidates. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent $18 million attacking Republican opponents and $3.1 million supporting its own candidates.

The proportion of negative ads was much higher than in 2004, when Federal Election Commission records show that the political parties spent about $6 on ads in favor of congressional candidates for every $5 spent opposing candidates.

Some negative ads, including tough ones, tap humor. Over the past few days, Republican gubernatorial candidates in Minnesota, Texas and Wisconsin began airing 60-second radio ads that mimic Anheuser-Busch's sarcastic "Real Men of Genius" spots for Bud Light.

In Texas, as a singer croons in the background, a mock-serious announcer "salutes" Democrat Chris Bell as "Mr. Way-Too-Liberal-For-Texas Guy."

In Wisconsin, a similar ad dubs Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle "Mr. Tax-Hiking-Politician Man."

The tone isn't likely to lift as the campaign heads into its final weekend, Tracey says, especially in competitive contests. He likens political advertising to a jury trial: "Opening arguments" in which a candidate introduces himself or herself — and, often, the spouse, kids and dog — followed by a period of attack and counterattack. Then there are "closing arguments."

A candidate who's safely ahead may turn to "a warm-and-fuzzy" appeal at the end, Tracey says. "But if you're losing, that's when you start to throw your haymaker."

DOJ_NMG_0090691

Recent Gains In Shaky Races Have Heartened GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Washington — President Bush was hosting lawmakers in the Oval Office last week when he asked House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, to size up GOP prospects in the midterm elections.

When Boehner acknowledged that he had already written off some Republican House seats, naming one in the South, Bush protested loudly and called in his chief political adviser. Karl Rove entered on cue with an armful of charts to prove the seat was still in play and the party could hold onto its House majority.

"Thanks for the information," Boehner responded.

The exchange illustrates the dual mood of Republicans in the final week before Election Day: While there is pervasive fear that the party will lose control of Congress, a cadre of die-hard optimists is refusing to wave the white flag.

They point, like parched travelers spying water in the desert, to a few recent developments that could help the GOP in the waning days of the campaign. They delight in this week's gaffe by Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., who made a joke that seemed to insult U.S. troops in Iraq. The GOP Senate candidate in Maryland is running a surprisingly strong campaign. Some of the party's most-endangered incumbents, such as Rep. Thomas Reynolds in New York and Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, are battling back in the polls. Some analysts are no longer writing off GOP chances of holding onto seats in Texas and Florida that were vacated when scandal-scarred Republicans Tom DeLay and Mark Foley quit the House.

Senior party officials, including Rove and Bush, insist that Republican fundraising and voter-mobilization advantages -- or some 11th-hour surprise -- will preserve their Senate majority and keep GOP losses below the 15 seats that would give Democrats control of the House.

"The Republicans are going to make a great goal-line stand," GOP pollster Whit Ayres said.

Many strategists in both parties dismiss such talk as a Pollyana-ish ploy to keep GOP voters from staying home on Election Day. That Republicans are fighting so hard in some of the country's most conservative regions is a measure of how tough a road they face. For every seat that comes within reach, strategists are identifying once-safe incumbents who suddenly are in trouble.

Amy Walter, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, says Republicans are like boatmen bailing water in a storm.

"You have a bucket, and your ship is filling up," Walter said. "But for every bucket you bail, another wave is coming in."

Even former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. -- who in a recent memo claims momentum has shifted to the GOP and predicts the party will keep control of the Senate -- gives Republicans a 50-50 chance of keeping a House majority.

In the Senate, Republicans have a clear, if uncertain, path to victory: To keep Democrats from winning the six seats they need to gain the majority, the GOP is pouring resources into three key races that are too close to call. Those are in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Elsewhere, Republicans are cheered by recent signs that their standing has improved in races that had been considered lost causes. In Montana, polls show Burns closing in on his Democratic opponent. The national GOP this week announced a new round of television ads for Burns, and Bush campaigned for him Thursday.

In Maryland, a Democratic-dominated state, some polls show that Republican Michael Steele has narrowed the gap in the Senate race. The Cook Political Report now calls it a tossup.

In the more difficult battle for the House, a senior GOP strategist says there is still a road to victory -- even if it runs steeply uphill and ends in a wafer-thin majority.

This strategist conceded that at least seven GOP-held seats were lost causes: open seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa and Ohio; and seats held by two incumbents in Indiana (Reps. Chris Chocola and John Hostettler) and one in Pennsylvania (Curt Weldon). But the strategist claimed the party could hold the line elsewhere, identifying 24 GOP seats and four Democratic-held seats for which polls indicate the races are too close to call.

"No one can predict how those seats go," said the strategist, who requested anonymity. "This is where race-by-race dynamics kick in."

DOJ_NMG_0090692

Even accepting those assumptions -- which many other Republicans regard as too optimistic -- the GOP would have to win three-quarters of those close races to retain its House majority. That might have been plausible in years when incumbents had an edge. But this year, with anti-Republican winds blowing at gale force, that may be a longshot.

Republicans are betting that the advantages traditionally enjoyed by GOP incumbents -- their fundraising edge, their record of bringing home federal money for local projects and the party's vaunted get-out-the-vote machinery -- remain formidable and will tilt close races their way.

Indeed, Reynolds' money advantage may have helped him bounce back from a steep drop in polls after the Foley sex scandal.

The lawmaker, from upstate New York, immediately bought television time for an ad in which he apologized for not responding more aggressively to early warnings that Foley had sent salacious e-mails to male congressional pages. Reynolds also was helped by a huge blizzard in his district that eclipsed the Foley scandal and gave him a chance to showcase his political clout by securing federal disaster aid for the community.

In many places, however, incumbency is as much a liability as it is an asset.

In the battle for open seats, the GOP endgame includes a determined effort to hold onto the Foley and DeLay districts. Many strategists regarded those seats as slam-dunks for Democrats, because the GOP was unable to Foley's and DeLay's names on ballots. But both districts are heavily Republican, and party officials are laboring to educate voters on how to cast ballots for the GOP's chosen replacement candidates.

In Texas, Republicans are running a write-in campaign for Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. The party is sending people door to door to explain how to cast a write-in ballot. The Cook Political Report, which long rated the race as likely to go Democratic, now calls it a tossup.

In Florida, Foley's name will be on the ballot, but any vote cast for him will count as a vote for GOP candidate Joe Negron. The GOP won a court ruling last week that allowed signs making that point to be posted in polling places.

On another front, Republicans hope to cut their losses by defeating at least one of the handful of House Democrats considered vulnerable. In Illinois, where Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean serves a GOP-dominated district, Republicans hope a third-party candidate will siphon away enough votes to give the GOP candidate an edge. In Georgia, Republicans are targeting two House Democrats whose hold on their seats has been weakened by redistricting.

Faded Contract Republican Rebels Of '94 Now Face Their Own Revolt Promises To Balance Budget And Shrink Government Lost Steam In Congress Assailing 'Influences Of Power' (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

FOUNTAIN HILLS, Ariz. -- Twelve years ago, J.D. Hayworth and 72 other Republicans rode into the U.S. House of Representatives on a wave that washed out Democrats after four decades in control, ushering in a "Republican Revolution" to cleanse Washington.

Now Mr. Hayworth is at risk of being swept out in much the same way. After six years in which Republicans controlled the White House as well as Capitol Hill, voters' revulsion with failed promises, dysfunction and scandals threatens big losses for the party on Tuesday.

So Mr. Hayworth, once among the most recognizable revolutionaries in Congress's big, brash and combatively conservative "Class of '94," now stands as something of a symbol even for Republicans asking: What went wrong?

A member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Hayworth has been on the defensive about both campaign contributions and his initially unreported use of sports skyboxes from disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his Indian tribal clients. To blunt such bad news, Mr. Hayworth boasts of the government funds that he has brought home, from a pedestrian bridge in Tempe to defense contracts for Arizona firms. Such claims win over some locals, but offend many fiscal conservatives.

The widespread sense that Republicans in Congress have lost their way, drifting into the same abuses they had pledged to end, helps explain why many, like Mr. Hayworth, are in trouble. The Republicans' 1994 "Contract with America" vowed to shrink government, balance the budget and limit members' terms. The Republicans said they would end Congress's "cycle of scandal and disgrace."

DOJ_NMG_0090693

That contract is now broken, conservatives say, as the former rebels have morphed into an establishment clinging to power.

The national debt now nears $9 trillion. Rather than curb entitlement programs' growth, Republicans created a new one -- Medicare's prescription-drug benefit -- and rejected President Bush's call to overhaul Social Security. Their original vow to kick the pork barrel has given way to gorging on "earmarks" -- funds lawmakers specifically set aside for special projects -- in the annual appropriations bills. There have been a number of corruption probes.

"You saw the idealism, and then you saw people lose a little focus, and you saw the corrupt influences of power affect Republicans," says Rep. John Shadegg, a congressman from Phoenix and member of the Republican class of 1994.

ELECTION 2006

Predict how the House and Senate votes will go in our Washington Wire reader contest1. Plus, take a closer look at issues and candidates2 in about 20 House races, review polls3 in close House contests and see complete coverage4.

Among those who lament that the movement has gone astray is Newt Gingrich, the general behind the 1994 revolution, who became House speaker but was forced out four years later. "This is a center-right country with a willingness to tolerate a little bit of incompetence. But it's certainly getting more than it needs," said Mr. Gingrich, in an interview this summer. "The Republican Party drifted away from reform and changed back to a standard political party."

He and other Republicans cite achievements as well. They credit a series of tax cuts that climaxed under President Bush for recent economic growth as well as the mildness of past downturns. With President Clinton, Republicans rewrote welfare policy. They toughened criminal-sentencing laws and minimized workplace and environmental regulations. They would have done more, some say, but for the resistance of less conservative Senate Republicans and the obstruction of Democrats.

As he campaigns, Mr. Hayworth says, "What I'm hearing is we have to work harder, but that the spirit of '94 in many ways has been realized ... in terms of pro-growth economic policies, in terms of rebuilding our national defense."

Some Republican lawmakers, including more recent arrivals, still try to hew to the revolution's principles. Among them are three of Mr. Hayworth's fellow Arizona Republicans -- Reps. Shadegg and Jeff Flake, elected in 2000, as well as Sen. John McCain. They have led a mostly losing fight against the explosion in earmarks.

For many congressional Republicans, the shift from reform to self-preservation was most evident at the start of the current Congress last year. Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, anticipating his indictment on corruption charges, pushed a change in House rules so he could remain as leader. After a public furor, Republicans reversed it. Mr. DeLay resigned last June.

Of the Republicans who entered the House after 1994, just under half remain. Several have moved on to be governors or senators. Ohio's Rep. Bob Ney faces prison after pleading guilty in the influence-peddling Abramoff scandal. Florida's Rep. Mark Foley resigned after disclosures of lewd computer messages he had sent teenage House pages.

While term limits were a big issue in 1994, only a few of the members elected that year voluntarily left after three terms -- the length most espoused. Those who remain now seek their seventh term. As Election Day nears, a number are in trouble with a mutinous electorate. This week, independent analyst Charlie Cook moved Mr. Hayworth's race to the "toss-up" category, from "leaning Republican."

At 6-foot-5-inches and 220 pounds, Mr. Hayworth, a former college football player, is in fighting trim, down from 340 pounds in 1996, when he first struggled for re-election. He predicts both he and the Republicans' majorities will survive next week's election, and afterward, the party "can reassert the principles that brought us to power."

He retains the partisan bombast that made him stand out a dozen years ago. Yet just as voters nationally have tired of Washington's un-civil wars, his personality is an issue here. For the first time in his seven races, the state's largest newspaper, the Arizona Republic, didn't endorse Mr. Hayworth. It recently recommended his 66-year-old Democratic rival, Harry Mitchell, a longtime local officeholder, in an editorial headlined "Mitchell over the bully."

After Mr. Hayworth gave a recent speech to a Kiwanis Club here in Fountain Hills, an affluent suburb of Phoenix, the reaction was mixed. As about 50 Kiwanians departed after lunch, Bill Eckhardt, a 75-year-old Republican, said he'll vote for Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0090694

Hayworth given his prize seat on the Ways and Means panel. But the club vice president, Republican Bill Schmitt, 67, says he won't.

"I can't stand to be in the same room with him," Mr. Schmitt says. He's fed up with the war, and with Mr. Hayworth, who he says personifies "the slam and bash and tear and disgrace" partisanship of his party. Mr. Schmitt estimates about 20 club members, half of them Republicans, stayed away when they heard the congressman would be speaking.

Afterward, Mr. Schmitt buttonholed Mr. Hayworth. "I said, 'You know, you guys ought to get together as a group and figure out how you're going to clean up your act.'"

In the past year, four Republican House members have been forced from office by scandal. Besides Reps. DeLay, Ney and Foley, Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California is now in prison after pleading guilty to bribery and other charges for essentially selling defense earmarks. Ongoing investigations are looking at several others.

The spending earmarks at the center of some of those investigations reflect the drift since Republicans ascended.

In 1992, still in the minority, then-Rep. Gingrich taunted Democrats, "I am committed to hunting down every appropriation ... that is some politician taking care of himself." But in 1995, the new Republican-led Congress approved a record 1,430 projects worth $10 billion in the year's appropriations bills, according to the conservative group Citizens Against Government Waste. The totals escalated annually -- to 9,963 projects valued at $29 billion for fiscal 2006.

Scott Lilly, a former House Democratic staffer and now senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank, has documented a proliferation of earmarks in highway bills. For 30 years after a transportation trust fund was created in 1956, highway bills, which are passed every few years specified 14 projects at most; spending decisions were left to the states. Then, in 1987, Democrats salted that year's package with 155 earmarks. The next, in 1991, had 538. "I have never seen anything as outrageous," Ohio's Rep. John Boehner -- now the Republican majority leader -- said back then.

But the Republicans' first highway bill, in 1998, more than tripled the previous 1991 bill's total. Last year's highway bill had 6,371 special projects worth $23 billion.

Earmarks have gone from perks for the powerful to goodies spread all around -- as incumbent protection, grease to get votes for hard-to-pass bills and, as Mr. Cunningham's conviction attests, payback for benefactors. Democrats get a smaller piece of the pie. A Republican database tracks tens of thousands of member requests for new projects. At orientations to Congress, Republican leaders instruct new members how to get projects, Mr. Flake says. "You're told you have to do that to be re-elected."

When House leaders last year strained to pass the Central American Free Trade Agreement, Mr. Flake recalls, "you actually had the Appropriations staffers on the floor of the House taking orders" for highway projects "to secure the last couple of votes." That trade agreement was approved after midnight by two votes.

Similarly, earmarks were currency to get votes for the Medicare prescription-drug bill in 2003. Republican leaders rejected compromise with Democrats, but were faced with conservatives' revolt over their measure. When it appeared to have lost the House tally, the leaders extended the traditional 15-minute limit for voting for nearly three hours, until 6 a.m., openly bargaining with members on the floor until several changed their votes. "One of the most breathtaking breaches of the legislative process in the modern history of the House," write congressional scholars Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein in their new book, "The Broken Branch."

That episode, many Republicans say now, captured how far they had moved from the heady "First 100 Days" of 1995. Then, their initial act was to change House rules to end abuses.

Looking back, a turning point was House Republicans' unpopular 1998 impeachment of Mr. Clinton. They lost seats in that year's midterm elections and Republicans forced Mr. Gingrich's departure. Power shifted from him and House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas, the revolution's philosophical architects, to Mr. DeLay and his former deputy Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who became Speaker. Both are seen as more pragmatic political gamesmen. Mr. DeLay, a former appropriator, expanded the use of earmarks as part of his plan for a permanent Republican majority.

After Mr. Bush's 2000 election, with all power in Republicans' hands, many conservatives had expected to realize their dreams. Instead, says Joe Scarborough, a '94 classmate who now hosts MSNBC's "Scarborough Country," that's when the revolution really ended: "Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.'"

DOJ_NMG_0090695

Certainly conservatives who were elected with Mr. Bush have been disappointed, except on tax cuts. They cite the "No Child Left Behind" law, which expanded the federal role over education, the Medicare drug benefit, restored farm subsidies, and nondefense spending increases. Also, they lament, Republicans let Mr. Bush set the agenda, abandoned their own search for conservative ideas and acquiesced as he centralized power in the executive branch. "We're thinking, we've finally made it to Congress and the Revolution is over," Mr. Flake says.

He and other Republicans look to jumpstart the movement once the election is over -- and Congress comes back for a lame-duck session to finish appropriations bills and elect new leaders.

Mr. Hayworth, who unlike his Arizona colleagues has been a leadership loyalist, told the Kiwanis Club, "I was pleased to work with my colleague Jeff Flake on earmark reform so that spending does not come in the dead of night or in a conference room far from the scrutiny of people."

In an interview afterward, he took credit for leading the successful mutiny against last year's House rules change for Mr. DeLay. But Democrat Mitchell, among others, recall Mr. Hayworth's televised defenses of Mr. DeLay at the time. Mr. Mitchell has seized on that to underscore what he says is Mr. Hayworth's complicity in the worst of the Republican leadership's excesses. Amid supporters at the "Cookies From Home" store in Tempe, he said, "If you like the way things are in Washington, J.D. will give you more of the same."

Mr. Hayworth calls the punishing midterm campaigns "a wake-up call to return to those common-sense conservative principles."

"I don't think we've lost our philosophical moorings," he says. "But always in an imperfect world, there will be missteps."

Ranks Of Independent Voters Rising (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, November 3, 2006

The number of independent voters continues to rise, and that should give pause to Republicans trying to keep control of the House and Senate, an analysis of registration and turnout suggests.

About 17 percent of voters registered for next week's election eschew major-party identification, according to a study released Thursday by American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate.

That's up from about 14 percent in 2002, and the trend could help Democrats in their effort to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to achieve majorities, said the center's director, Curtis Gans.

"The people are turning against both political parties and the political process," Gans said. "My judgment is, the intensity factor of this unhappiness benefits the Democrats. ... Karl Rove may prove me wrong."

Gans said the numbers evoke statistical comparisons to 1962, 1982 and 1994, when voters turned against the incumbent parties out of "one form or another of unhappiness or fear."

According to the study, 31 percent of registered voters identify themselves as Republicans, and 37 percent say they are Democrats. The sampling is based on 13 of the 28 states that require partisan registration, plus the District of Columbia. The figures don't add up to 100 percent in part because voter rolls include many people who have died.

"If the political backdrop doesn't radically change between now and next Tuesday, it is also likely that the Democratic midterm vote will exceed the Republican vote for the first time since 1990," Gans wrote in the report.

Of the United States' 138.8 million eligible voters, an estimated 42 to 47 percent are expected to vote. The most recent high in a midterm election was 42 percent in 1982.

Turnout during 2002, the latest midterm election, was 40 percent.

Election '06 Wild Card: 'Indies' (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

.

FORT COLLINS, COLO.

DOJ_NMG_0090696

Excluded from debates, left off the polls, ignored by the news media, or dismissed by the public as a "wasted vote," minor-party candidates could tip a few key races in next week's midterm elections - or win them outright.

From the Mountain States, where a virtual unknown is polling 10 percent and just snagged four newspaper endorsements for a US House race, to the coasts of New England, where two independents are poised to win bids to the US Senate, un-red and not-blue candidates are testing how deep the dissatisfaction with the two main parties is running.

"We're really not used to thinking about third parties in midterm elections, but there is a lot of push away from the major parties," says political scientist Ron Rapoport, coauthor of "Three's a Crowd: The Dynamic of Third Parties, Ross Perot, and Republican Resurgence."

This year, 425 minor-party candidates are running for a US House, Senate, or governor's seat, according to Project Vote Smart. About 80 percent of voters will be able to vote for a Libertarian for statewide office, 60 percent for a Green Party candidate, and 30 percent for a Constitution Party candidate, says Richard Winger, who tracks minor-party candidates and issues for Ballot Access News. Reform Party candidates are on statewide ballots in Florida and Colorado.

In 2002, 5.2 percent of all voters voted for some candidate other than a Republican or Democrat at the top of the ballot (usually governor or senator). That's the highest result for a midterm election since 1934. "This year will be up," Mr. Winger predicts. "More and more high-quality people are willing to run as minor-party candidates for public office."

Some are already big names. Running as an independent, Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut is expected to hold his Senate seat after losing the Democratic primary by staking out middle ground between the two main parties. Independent Rep. Bernard Sanders of Vermont is also expected to win his bid for the Senate - the first time since the mid-1970s that the Senate would have two independents concurrently.

"It's rare for there to be more than one independent in the US Senate," says Betty Koed, assistant historian of the Senate Historical Office. The last time the Senate had more than two independents was in the late 1890s, when five Populists, five Silver Republicans, and two members of the Silver Party served.

Independent candidates could tip the outcome in at least three close House races next week. In Indiana's Ninth District, Libertarian Eric Schansberg's candidacy is expected to help the Democrat, former Rep. Baron Hill, in his bid to oust GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel. And Independent John Binkowski could tip the race between Patty Wetterling and state Sen. Michele Bachmann in Minnesota's Sixth District. In an unexpectedly close race in Arizona's Fifth District, Libertarian Warren Severin could sway the race between Democratic challenger Harry Mitchell and embattled incumbent Rep. J.D. Hayworth.

"There's a lot of dissatisfaction, obviously, among Libertarian voters among the Republicans, but not much enthusiasm for Democrats," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington. In races such as Arizona's Fifth, "it makes it hard to figure out who [the Libertarian candidate] is hurting."

Third-party candidates polling in single digits could also tip close US Senate races in Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, and Tennessee.

Running colorful gubernatorial campaigns in Texas, independents Kinky Friedman and Carole Keeton Strayhorn have held onto double-digit ratings throughout their campaign to challenge the front-runner, GOP Gov. Rick Perry.

For Colorado Reform Party candidate Eric Eidsness, a high point of his US House race came last month. He was the target of an attack ad, with incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R). "It showed I was beginning to count," he says.

A former Reagan administration official, he got into the race because he says he was tired of how Republicans used "the fear factor" to win elections. "People are smart. People know the truth when they hear it. If we agree on a problem, we can fix it," he says.

Victory is a long shot. But four local newspapers have endorsed his candidacy and Mr. Eidsness is polling about 10 percent of likely voters.

Newspapers: Election Advice Or Kingmaking? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090697

EUREKA, S.D. — Between now and Tuesday, all across the USA, you're in for a media barrage of late pre-election news and views. Especially from many newspapers that offer traditional "endorsements."

Before the 2004 elections, I strongly suggested in this column that newspapers should stop all endorsements and "debate, but not dictate." My slightly modified 2006 stance:

•On congressional, state or local office races, voters get such a heavy dose of news, views and propaganda from and about all candidates that they don't need any newspaper telling them for whom to vote.

•But on the ever-growing number of initiatives or referendums, many or most voters are uninformed and newspaper recommendations can be helpful.

That distinction or change of heart came on a visit here to my birthplace. South Dakota has 11 measures on the ballot. The only one most people understand is a referendum that would reverse an almost total abortion ban passed by the Legislature. That's getting heavy local and national media attention because it's a frontal attack on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

The other 10 issues get little media attention. Gov. Mike Rounds told me his advice has been "if in doubt, vote no." This state's newspapers, from the largest Sioux Falls Argus Leader to one of the smallest weeklies, the local Northwest Blade, could be more helpful than that.

Newspapers could play a similar role of informing and advising readers and voters in other states with a heavy issue ballot. Arizona has 19. Colorado, 14. California, 13.

Advice and recommendations by newspapers on issues are helpful and appreciated by readers. Newspaper endorsements of candidates are viewed as kingmaking and resented by readers.

A Duel, But Not Decisive (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

According to the pollsters, pundits and pols -- Democratic and nervous Republican -- a great anti-Republican wave is a-coming. Well, let's assume major Democratic gains: 20 to 25 House seats and four to six Senate seats. The House goes Democratic for the first time in 12 years. The Senate probably stays Republican, but by such an excruciatingly small margin that there is no governing majority.

What to say about such a victory? Substantial, yes. Historic, no. Before proclaiming a landslide, one has to ask Henny Youngman's question: "Compared to what?" (His answer to: "How's your wife?") Since the end of World War II, the average loss for a second-term presidency in its sixth year has been 29 House seats and six Senate seats. If you go back to Franklin Roosevelt's second term, the House loss average jumps to 35. Thus a 25/6 House and Senate loss would be about (and slightly below) the historical average.

True, today there is far more -- and more effective -- gerrymandering as computer power and shamelessness both have grown exponentially. So fewer seats are competitive. But that is true only for the House. You cannot gerrymander the Senate. (Of course, the Democrats are trying even that, with their perennial push for two Senate seats for the 9 to 1 Democratic District of Columbia, which should instead exercise voting rights in the state of Maryland, to which it is geographically, economically and culturally contiguous.) In his sixth year, the now-sainted Ronald Reagan lost eight Senate seats that gave the chamber back to Democratic control. That election was swayed by no wars, no weekly casualty figures, no major scandals. The first inkling of the Iran-contra scandal broke on the morning after the election.

Nonetheless, even if just one chamber falls to the Democrats this time, it will be interpreted as a repudiation of two things: President Bush and Iraq. The Democrats have certainly nationalized the election by focusing on Bush and the war -- with an overwhelming number of Democratic campaign ads doing little else than showing their Republican opponent hugging or praising or merely shaking hands with the president.

Indeed, the anti-Bush feeling is so strong that Democrats -- ignoring the niceties of federalism and enjoying the benefits of guilt by association -- have been running ads linking Bush with Bob Ehrlich, the popular Republican incumbent in the Maryland gubernatorial race.

DOJ_NMG_0090698

Yes, the campaign has been nationalized. But will the results be? In the House, a good five seats (Bob Ney, Tom DeLay, Don Sherwood, Mark Foley, Curt Weldon) are likely to be lost to scandals having nothing to do with Bush or Iraq. Of the losing Senate races, only Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania can be said to be dying for the sins of their party.

The other races, if lost, will be lost largely for local reasons. In Ohio, the state is rocked by an enormous Republican scandal at the gubernatorial level that is taking the whole party down with it, Sen. Mike DeWine included. In Montana, Conrad Burns is in trouble because of his association with Jack Abramoff, not George Bush.

In Virginia, a state that should not even be in play, George Allen has run the worst campaign in living memory, stumbling onto one ethnic land mine after another -- "macaca," the Yiddish mama, N-word allegations. And in New Jersey, the one Democratic seat that could conceivably go the other way and save Senate control for the Republicans, the drag on Sen. Bob Menendez is the very nonnational issue of official corruption.

So when the results come in and the Democrats begin to crow, remember this: By historical standards, this is the American people's usual response to entrenched power -- a bracing and chastening contempt. Sixth-year presidents nearly always bring their parties down. (Republican overreaching on the Monica Lewinsky scandal made Bill Clinton's sixth year an exception.) Moreover, this year, the out-of-the-blue Foley scandal interrupted whatever national momentum the Republicans had gained after successfully passing legislation on terrorist interrogation and detention, and thus refocusing attention on their strongest suit, the war on terrorism.

The election will be a referendum of sorts on Iraq. But it will be registering nothing more than uneasiness and discontent. Had the Democrats offered a coherent alternative to the current policy, one could draw lessons as to what course the country should take. But if either friends or enemies interpret the results as a mandate for giving up, they will be mistaken.

Blues Project: Depressed Voters Roll The Dice (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

If the polls and punditry are correct, the Democrats are about to take control of the House and maybe the Senate. If so, then the American people are about to make one of the biggest rolls of the dice in the country's history.

Congress's daily responsibilities lie largely with domestic affairs. By that measure, the Republicans hardly deserve re-election. They have been profligate, in several unattractive ways. The Democrats, alas, do not deserve the responsibility of congressional power at this moment of peril. They haven't justified it.

Iraq is far and away the most important issue on voters' minds. In this week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 36% said Iraq was the top voting issue followed by 22% for job creation. Sitting at 15% was something called "the war on terror." More starkly, a just-released New York Times/CBS News poll said the issue voters most want Congress to deal with is the war in Iraq at 38%; terrorism is a mere 4%.

The demotion of the war on terror is disturbing but understandable. The Iraq war, though terrible, is overweighted in the public mind. U.S. casualties are low relative to other wars. The pace of Iraq's political formation is not worse than was Russia's after the fall of the Communist Party, or China's will be. What's left is the past year's violence around Baghdad. The nature of that violence -- nearly daily, incomparably awful murders of innocent civilians -- brutalizes and shocks those of us who absorb it through daily media reports. It is a violence beyond the consciousness of a civilized people.

That a foreign war transmitted in the information age in this way can have such a deeply depressive effect on the American psyche is troubling for our role in the world and a fit subject for the 2008 election. But this is the reality the American public absorbs every day now, and if it votes for the other party on Tuesday I think that most of all it will be an attempt at catharsis. What people want most from Iraq is surcease.

As would any party hungry for a much-needed win, the Democrats' campaign ads have boiled down this angst to a simple storyline: "George Bush's failed war in Iraq." Across the country, it's been all-Iraq and all-Bush all the time.

Washington state's Eighth Congressional District is typical. Democratic challenger Darcy Burner, a Microsoft executive, is running in a close race against GOP incumbent Dave Reichert with this: "He supported Bush's plan to invade Iraq. Supported Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld even when they weren't telling us the truth with a failed strategy and no plan to finish the mission . . . If we stay the course, won't we get more of the same?"

DOJ_NMG_0090699

Being the off-year default option may not matter much when the subject is health care or immigration. A party's seriousness of purpose matters a lot, though, when the task is the accumulating terrorist threat described in detail in the 9/11 Commission Report, proven by the London airliner plot and made imminent by the arriving nuclear capability of two rogue states, Iran and North Korea.

What have the Democrats done to prove their seriousness or credibility in addressing such a world? One may ask whether invading Iraq made the threat of terror worse, but the programs the Bush administration put in place to fight the broader war after Sept. 11 were, on balance, good -- aggressive electronic and financial surveillance, the Patriot Act, the pursuit, capture and interrogation of terrorists. Progressive Democrats and press exposés opposed all of this, and when the political going got tough for the administration, senior Democrats piled on, went silent and let the president's authority go into a free-fall merely to achieve the result hoped for this Tuesday.

Potential House committee chairmen such as Henry Waxman and John Conyers -- whose tenure and political formation date to the war years of the 1970s -- promise Iraq-related investigations, which likely will cause our front-line troops and agents in the war on terror to throttle back.

If the Democrats win the House by a large margin, media commentary will call it a "repudiation" of the administration's policies in Iraq. This sort of zero-sum analysis may be the norm now, but it's not at all clear this is the message voters want to send.

A closer look at the Times Oct. 27-31 poll is revealing on this count: 55% favor sending more troops to Iraq; 51% say the U.S. "will have lost" if it pulls out now; 62% think the U.S. will have to remain in Iraq beyond two years; 59% say neither side is winning; a majority, 52%, think the U.S. is likely to succeed there.

On whether the U.S. "did the right thing" with military action against Iraq, it is 44% yes to 51% no. Some 59% say congressional investigations of the administration are "not necessary." On whether invading Iraq has increased the terror threat against the U.S., 46% say it's about the same. George Bush's approval rating on Iraq is 29%, but his approval rating for the war on terror is 44% (with 48% disapproving).

There is more ambiguity -- and common sense -- out there than imagined. Enough ambiguity that come the moment of choosing a course Tuesday, voters may give the Democrats less than they expect.

I think the Joe Lieberman race remains a bellwether. Sen. Lieberman's politics represented a Democratic bridge to the president's war on terror. Stampeded by their party's Web-based left, the Democratic Party elders went to Connecticut and blew up the Lieberman bridge. My reading of the electorate is that it wants that bridge rebuilt and it wants both the Democrats and George Bush on it.

Most people don't vote for parties; they vote their own perceived interests. The American people know they're at risk, and they know the U.S. won't succeed in Iraq or protect them against Islamic terror if their Washington leadership is in a state of unending political war. What voters have gotten the past two years is petulance from embittered Democrats and petulance from a stubborn presidential clique. The stakes have become too high for more of the same. The American people will roll the dice Tuesday to shake up the odds in their favor. God's mercy on the gamblers.

How Low Will Bush Go? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

If Democrats manage to take control of one or both houses of Congress on Tuesday, the reason will be that voters were not adequately roused into a state of heart-pounding, knee-knocking, teeth-chattering fear.

Not that Republicans haven't been trying. George W. Bush used to claim he was "a uniter, not a divider," but that was a long time ago. These days, he'd probably try to deny the quote the same way he tried to disown "stay the course." The Karl Rove formula for political victory has been to draw a bright line between "us" and "them" and then paint those on the other side not as opponents but as monsters.

DOJ_NMG_0090700

Thus Bush openly accused those who disagree with his policy in Iraq of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. "The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses," he said the other day.

Call me naive, but I never thought a president of the United States would stoop so low as to accuse current and prospective members of Congress -- a number of whom, by the way, are decorated war veterans, unlike Bush or anyone in his inner circle -- of being pro-terrorist. But this administration has so lowered the bar on political discourse in this country that it's now more of a limbo stick: How low can you go?

I've pointed out in earlier columns the difference between a leader who faces troubled times with a message of bravery and optimism -- Franklin D. Roosevelt's stirring words about the Great Depression, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself," constitute perhaps the best example -- and a leader such as Bush who encourages people to be afraid because their fear is advantageous to him politically.

This goes beyond other scare tactics that have become standard practice. Republican candidates throughout the land are telling people that the Democrats "want to raise your taxes." The truth of the matter is that many Democrats question some of the Bush administration tax cuts because the benefits have gone so disproportionately to the very rich and because continuing to cut taxes when you're also throwing hundreds of billions of dollars at a long-running war is pure fiscal insanity. But in the context of today's political culture, this kind of distortion doesn't even warrant a raised eyebrow.

Republicans are also trying to demonize individuals, warning that if Democrats take control of the House, Nancy Pelosi (gasp!), who represents San Francisco (shudder!), will become speaker. Never mind that she is actually an effective and pragmatic politician, as evidenced by the fact that, days before the election, she has the Republicans playing defense.

"Wedge" issues are designed to invoke fear. As one would expect, Republicans have tried to portray the New Jersey Supreme Court decision on gay marriage -- which did not, by the way, endorse, mandate or even legalize gay marriage -- as some sort of mortal threat to family values from coast to coast. This effort has been oddly halfhearted, though. Maybe GOP strategists worry that stigmatizing homosexuality won't work so well in the wake of the Mark Foley scandal, which laid bare the party's essential hypocrisy. It's hard to portray the Democrats as the party of Sodom and Gomorrah now that everyone knows there are many powerful gay Republicans working on Capitol Hill.

None of this is pretty, and all of it demeans American politics. But claiming that "the terrorists win" if Democrats are elected to Congress -- a statement whose only conceivable purpose is to make Americans afraid -- is something entirely different. The president knows, and at times has acknowledged, that there are people of good will in both parties who differ with him on Iraq. He also knows, or should know, that fear diminishes us as a nation -- that fear appeals to our baser instincts, not our best ideals; that it makes us smaller, meaner, less noble.

He should know all this, but he uses fear anyway, because fear is effective. John Kerry may have chosen an inopportune time (or just the right moment, from the Republicans' perspective) to demonstrate his inestimable comedic timing and his finely tuned political ear. But while Kerry's recent gaffe produced some last-minute outrage, mere outrage probably isn't enough this time. The only thing that might work is fear, and so far not enough Americans have been made to quake in their boots.

I take that back: The president did say that Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld will serve out the remainder of his term. Run for your lives!

Deborah Walsh And Ellen Malcolm (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

Posted November 03, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1103/p25s01-usmb.html Deborah Walsh and Ellen Malcolm By David Cook

While the 2006 election's outcome will not be known until next week, it is already clear that the contest will set new benchmarks for women candidates.

"We are seeing record numbers of women running for the [US] Senate and ... at the state legislative level we have a new record for the first time in 14 years," says Deborah Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. Even without a record number of women candidates running for the US House of Representatives, "we think that for a number of reasons we are looking at a banner year for women, particularly at the federal level," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0090701

Ms. Walsh joined Ellen Malcom, president of Emily's List as the speaker at Thursday's Monitor breakfast. Emily's List is the nation's largest political action committee and plans to spend $45 million this year helping elect women candidates who hold a pro-choice position on abortion.

The current political climate favors women, Walsh says. "People are looking for change, voters are looking for change." She adds that, "There is a sense of 'let's throw the scoundrels out' and when those kinds of voters come along, women are seen as the change, they are agents of change and voters look to them...."

While Emily's List founder Ms. Malcolm sees a strong tide running in favor of Democratic women candidates, the organization is taking nothing for granted and focusing on voter turnout. "One of the things Emily's List has been doing is targeting Democratic women who don't vote in non-presidential elections and communicating with them through the mail, through the phones, on the radio, to some extent door to door," Malcolm says. The goal is "to make sure that we get our people to come out and vote in this election. The Republicans have an advantage on this...."

Many political professionals agree with Malcolm that President Bush's top political advisor, Karl Rove, and the head of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, have assembled a first-rate voter turnout operation.

But Malcolm argues that the conservative social-issues platform that Rove helped craft has lost its appeal to many voters. "The Rove plan was to take political power by revving up the right extreme-conservative base. And he did that by hammering away on their social agenda and turning out the vote. What he has lost is the majority of Americans and he has lost the middle in this process," Malcolm says.

She argues that Rove's strategy "worked for a period of time. It is clearly not working now. What we see and why we are competitive in these heavily Republican districts is because the middle is moving so strongly to the Democrats ... the Rove plan has run out its string."

If Democrats win the House and San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi becomes speaker, Malcom sees that victory helping move women toward the ultimate prize of the presidency.

"I think having Nancy Pelosi as Speaker of the House is going to send a very wonderful lesson to the American public that women can be strong, they can be tough, they can be effective, and they can lead this country as political leaders. That lesson is not only going to make a tremendous difference, I think, in how the House of Representatives operates, and our ability to try to accomplish something, finally, in Congress," Malcolm says. "But I think it also sets the stage in a very significant way for electing the first woman president."

Hollywood Leans Right, Too (LAT)

By Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Who says Hollywood only supports Democrats?

As the two main parties battle it out for control of the House and the Senate in next week's election, the entertainment industry's political action committees have been working behind the scenes for months in Washington, giving far heftier contributions to, yes, Republicans.

According to the latest campaign filings, 28 entertainment industry PACs — lobbying on behalf of corporations such as Sony, Time Warner, Disney and others — have donated nearly $4.8 million to candidates up for reelection this year.

About 59% of the PAC money has gone to Republicans, including Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Orrin Hatch of Utah and Pat Roberts of Kansas, according to Federal Elections Commission records and the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics (Opensecrets.org).

The Democrats — who are often the beneficiaries of individual contributions from celebs — received 41% of the industry PAC money.

"Well, that should belie the right's belief that Hollywood is just a pack of liberals," said producer Norman Lear, a longtime contributor to Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0090702

In the early 1990s, Hollywood's lobbying organizations contributed equally — and heavily — to both parties. But as the power started to shift in favor of the GOP, the corporate PACs followed suit, giving more money to conservatives — especially those who serve on committees that deal with issues vital to the entertainment industry.

In 1996, 57% of Time Warner's PAC contributions went to the Democrats. This year, Republicans received 59% of the company's PAC money.

"It's important that we keep ties with the Republicans," said John Feehery, vice president of external affairs for the Motion Picture Assn. of America and former aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We need to have credibility when we walk into their offices."

The entertainment industry's individual contributions have topped $12 million this election cycle, according to information released Oct. 10 by the Federal Elections Commission. Donations tilt heavily in favor of the Democrats, according to data compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics. The PAC donations offer balance.

The reason is simple, Hollywood political strategists say: While individuals contribute according to their own ideologies, corporations look at a range of issues important to their businesses. The entertainment industry, like others, tends to give to leaders whose positions it supports, regardless of party affiliation.

The MPAA — which depends on studio heads (most of them Democrats) for donations — gave $41,000 to Republicans. By comparison, the Democratic candidates — including Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California — received $26,584.

Both Specter and Hatch often turn up on the industry PAC contribution lists because they serve on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees issues such as intellectual property rights.

What's more, Feehery pointed out, Hatch is also a musician, and so can appreciate the challenges facing artists.

"We try to focus on supporting the people who support the industry," Feehery said. "The fact of the matter is Republicans have been very good on copyright issues."

Santorum receives donations, Feehery said, because "he has expressed a lot of interest in our industry and has been helpful on some content issues, like PauseParentPlay, which helps parents make decisions on what their children watch in a way that doesn't involve government control."

As for Roberts, Feehery said: "He has a good relationship with [MPAA top executive] Dan Glickman."

But sometimes, in retrospect, Hollywood bosses wonder about the wisdom of PAC donations.

For example, the Universal Music Group PAC gave $2,500 to Florida Rep. Mark Foley before the controversy erupted over his explicit messages to a congressional page. The group gave $2,000 to Sen. George Allen, (R-Va.), before he came under criticism for using the word "macaca," considered a racial slur, at a rally.

"George 'Macaca' Allen?" Lear said when told of the contribution. "Oh, good God, I couldn't be more embarrassed."

Generally, however, the fact that the PACs favor the Republicans does not come as a surprise to industry insiders.

When told about the contributions, celebrity political consultant Andy Spahn was matter-of-fact. "They've been the party in power."

Longtime Hollywood publicist and activist Howard Bragman added. "As lefty as I am, I do understand bipartisanship.

"You can't leave the Republicans on the cutting room floor."

Three For Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

THE THREE Maryland congressmen representing suburban districts near Washington face only token opposition in the general election. All are Democrats -- one a seasoned veteran who may play a key leadership role if his party takes control of Congress; one an up-and-coming two-termer who's staked out a reputation for legislative know-how; and one a journeyman who narrowly survived a hard-fought primary. We endorse them all.

The veteran is Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of the 5th District, which includes Southern Maryland and parts of Prince George's and Anne Arundel counties. Mr. Hoyer, currently the Democratic whip, is an effective 13-term House member who knows the folkways of Capitol Hill as well as anyone and exercises power as a member of the House Appropriations Committee. He has been a key member of this region's congressional delegation, working to secure funding to replace the Woodrow Wilson Bridge, among other priorities. The Republicans, whose candidates have rarely attracted even a third of the vote against Mr. Hoyer, have given up for the time being; his only opponent, Steve Warner of the Green Party, is a developer who is a political novice.

DOJ_NMG_0090703

The up-and-comer is Rep. Chris Van Hollen of the 8th District, which includes parts of Montgomery and Prince George's counties. Mr. Van Hollen, having weighed and rejected a race for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat, is an astute lawmaker who's managed to be effective on education and issues affecting federal workers and contracting despite his status as a junior member of the minority party. His Republican opponent, Jeffrey M. Stein, is a lawyer whose race seems more a personal journey than a political one; he has not campaigned actively and believes Mr. Van Hollen is doing a fine job.

The journeyman is Rep. Albert R. Wynn , who for 14 years has represented Maryland's 4th District, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties. We endorsed Mr. Wynn's opponent in the Democratic primary, Donna Edwards, and criticized him for casting votes that seemed at odds with the district's interests while meddling in local politics in Prince George's. We assume that Mr. Wynn, having eked out a primary win by fewer than 3,000 votes, has gotten the voters' message. If he sticks to his job in Congress and listens more closely to his constituents, he can be an able lawmaker. His Republican opponent, software developer Michael Moshe Starkman, moonlights as campaign manager for Mr. Stein. And like Mr. Stein, he is running what amounts to a vanity race.

Weighing Minimum Wage Hikes (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. -- If Democrats succeed in retaking one or both houses of Congress next week, a top priority will be increasing the minimum wage for the first time since 1997. That raises a persistent question: Does lifting the minimum wage destroy so many jobs that it hurts more than it helps?

In 2002, voters here raised the state's minimum wage -- and mandated automatic annual increases to keep up with inflation. Oregon's 100,000 or so minimum-wage workers are paid at least $7.50 an hour, a rate that will increase to $7.80 in January, well above the federal $5.15 minimum.

On Tuesday, voters in six other states are considering raising the minimum wage, all of which would index minimum wage to inflation as do Oregon, Washington, Florida and, beginning in 2007, Vermont. Democrats see the minimum wage as a way to bolster their base, much as initiatives on gay marriage and other cultural issues boost Republican turnout.

STATE WAGES

• U.S. Department of Labor: Minimum Wage Laws1

During the 2002 debate in Oregon, foes of a minimum-wage increase argued that it would chase away business and cripple an economy that traditionally had higher unemployment than the national average. "With so many Oregonians already unemployed, raising the minimum wage and then increasing it annually would devastate our economic recovery," Bill Perry, head of the Oregon Restaurant Association, wrote at the time.

Four years later, though it is impossible to say what would have happened had the minimum not been raised, Oregon's experience suggests the most strident doomsayers were wrong. Private, nonfarm payrolls are up 8% over the past four years, nearly twice the national increase. Wages are up, too. Job growth is strong in industries employing many minimum-wage workers, such as restaurants and hotels. Oregon's estimated 5.4% unemployment rate for 2006, though higher than the national average, is down from 7.6% in 2002, when the state was emerging from a recession.

Some employers are being squeezed, for sure, and their experiences will become ammunition for those who will fight any increase in the federal minimum wage. Agriculture is pinched because sellers can't raise prices, set on global markets, when labor costs go up. Some businesses say they have avoided expanding in Oregon because labor costs have risen, the sort of change in behavior at the margin that foes of a minimum wage worry about.

At Petite Provence eatery in Portland, co-owner Didier Blanc says the minimum wage, while paid only to servers, has had an "aftershock effect," forcing him to raise wages for all employees. While servers earn the minimum, bakers and cooks earn between $9 and $12 an hour. The costs are passed on to customers.

DOJ_NMG_0090704

"After it goes up, everybody at $9 an hour and above will want some kind of raise," says Mr. Blanc. "We have to pass it on in our prices because it goes straight to our bottom line."

So far, though, customers have been willing to pay. Mr. Blanc and his partner have two successful shops and are talking of opening a third. "I don't worry about it," he says of the higher wages, "because if I have to raise prices, next door will have to do the same thing, too."

Chris Dussin, owner of Old Spaghetti Factory, a Portland-based chain with 38 restaurants in 16 states, sees it differently. "You can only raise prices so much before you're going to chase the customer away," he says. Costs at his three Oregon restaurants have gone up $300,000 since the minimum-wage increase -- more than revenues. Mr. Dussin says his bottom line "is eroding" and his profit margin has fallen to 2% or 3%. He raised prices on some items, cut the number of hostesses and has increased the number of tables for each server.

"It's important to take care of people in minimum-wage jobs, but what's missed is the impact on the economy and job creation," he says. "It's not feasible to hire 10 people, so I'm just going to hire seven." He says labor costs scotched plans to open a restaurant in Bend, Ore., a tourist hotspot. The next Old Spaghetti Factory will be in Boise, Idaho, which has a minimum wage of $5.15 and -- unlike Oregon -- allows employers to pay less to workers who collect tips.

Oregon's increase has continued to be a political issue. The Republican candidate for governor, former Portland school-board member Ron Saxton, has argued that indexing depresses employment and particularly hurts agriculture, an important employer here. The incumbent governor, Democrat Ted Kulongoski, counters that repealing indexing would amount to a wage cut.

The legislature last year passed a tax credit to help farming operations pinched by the minimum wage. Gov. Kulongoski refused to sign it after state analysts determined it was so broadly written that it could apply to all wages paid and would cost the state too much.

Now restaurant and agriculture industries are lobbying for repeal of the automatic cost-of-living increase, which has raised the minimum wage 8.7% since 2003. "The question is: How many businesses are going to go down until we decide this is unsustainable?" says Tim Bernasek, general counsel of the Oregon Farm Bureau.

Academic economists traditionally have argued that raising the minimum wage inevitably leads employers to hire fewer workers. The experience of the late 1990s and a landmark study of employment in the fast-food industry by economists David Card and Alan Krueger in New Jersey (which raised its wage) and Pennsylvania (which didn't), has undermined that view.

But they haven't won over everyone. In a new report, economists David Neumark of the University of California at Irvine and William Wascher of the Federal Reserve Board say a review of more than 90 studies in more than 15 countries since the early 1990s shows nearly two-thirds of the studies find a "consistent" though not always statistically significant negative impact on employment. Fewer than 10 found a consistently positive impact. While there's "no consensus," they say, "the weight of empirical evidence" supports the traditional view.

Art Ayre, Oregon's employment economist, says the effect of the minimum wage varies by region and industry. Amy's Kitchen, a California organic-food producer, opened a 250-employee production facility in Medford, about 270 miles south of Portland, where wages for workers producing frozen pizzas will start at about $8 an hour. Among other things, higher wages were offset by electric and workers' compensation insurance rates, which are lower than in California.

Demand for workers is so strong in some areas that businesses already pay more than the minimum. A 7-11 store in Wilsonville, about 25 miles south of Portland, offers $8 an hour and up for an employee to handle the register and stock coolers.

Supporters of the wage increase say it has been a boon to the state's economy. "Minimum-wage workers are the only class of workers you can give a raise to and guarantee that they're going to spend the money and spend it in the local economy," says Dan Gardner, state labor commissioner. "They're not saving for a Hawaiian vacation."

Foes say Oregon has hurt its ability to attract and retain business, and warn that the effects will be long-term. Restaurant and farm industries argue that voters didn't understand that indexing meant businesses would have to keep raising wages.

The Oregon Restaurant Association is lobbying to freeze indexing and implement a tip credit, which would allow employers to pay tipped workers $7.50 an hour but not be subject to the automatic increases. Still, the number of employees working in the industry has jumped 15% since 2002. Mr. Perry, the head of the restaurant association, says as Oregon's population grows, so does its desire to eat out. But he says the wage increase will force many restaurants to raise prices and scale back on service.

DOJ_NMG_0090705

The biggest yelps have come from Oregon's $4 billion farm industry. The 2002 minimum-wage law applies to all workers, even seasonal fruit pickers. So while a competing blueberry farm in New Jersey can pay $6.15 an hour and one in Chile may pay even less, Oregon farmers pay $7.50.

Since 2002, employment in the agriculture industry has grown about 7% to 58,600 workers. But state officials say much of the growth is attributable to the state's booming nursery industry, which is more able to pass on increased costs to customers.

Barb Iverson and her brother say higher wages prompted them to stop cultivating daffodils and potatoes at their Willamette Valley farm. "Why grow a potato here when you can do it in Idaho for $5.15 an hour?" asks Ms. Iverson.

As for the workers, those in low-wage jobs say they're grateful for the state's automatic inflation increase. Pumping gas at a Conoco gas station in Woodburn, Matthew Holt, 25, says the $7.50 an hour he earns is barely enough to make ends meet. "The increase each year does help a little, but when inflation goes up, then everything goes up," he says.

The 25-year-old has two children. His wife works nights at Wal-Mart for $9.80 an hour. Mr. Holt, who completed high school but couldn't afford college, works 40 hours a week at the gas station and plans to get another minimum-wage job at Pizza Hut.

While he says he'd like to have a better paying job, he says there's nothing available for someone without a college degree or training. "You've got to have a skill or a trade," he says. "If you don't, there's no chance of finding a job making more than minimum wage."

The Democrats And Defense (WP)

By Kurt Campbell And Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The last-minute campaign furor over Sen. John F. Kerry's "botched joke" about the uneducated becoming "stuck in Iraq" was no joke for the Democratic Party. Once again, with an election looming, it found itself cast as the peacenik, antiwar, hostile-to-the-military, soft-on-defense, weak-on-terrorists party.

Whether that will stick won't be known until Tuesday. Polls have shown that voters for a change are more likely at the moment to trust Democrats on Iraq and terrorism than Republicans. But that support seems perishable, and even if Democrats win one or both houses of Congress, they face a long-term challenge of redefining their image when it comes to national security.

That's where Kurt Campbell and Michael O'Hanlon come in. Their provocative new book, "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security," offers a manifesto of sorts for a party still struggling to find its voice in the post-Sept. 11 world. As a party, Democrats have been torn between two poles as represented in the extreme by Joseph I. Lieberman, the hawkish Connecticut senator, and Ned Lamont, the antiwar liberal who beat him in a Democratic primary.

Campbell and O'Hanlon come closer to Lieberman than to Lamont, offering a muscular vision for U.S. power in a dangerous world tempered by the sort of pragmatism they say the Bush administration has been missing. "Democrats must make clear that they, like Republicans, understand that effective diplomacy must often be backed by the credible threat and sometimes use of military force," they write.

In fact, they argue that President Bush has it right in some ways, praising his priorities in terms of promoting democracy and free trade, defeating terrorists, and opening a new relationship with India. "Hard-power Democrats, independents, and moderate Republicans should therefore not run against the Bush legacy on matters of ideas so much as of seriousness, competence, and execution."

This may be a hard sell even within their own party, where the loudest voices these days argue for a radical departure from Bush's policies. A succession of think tanks and foreign policy elites have been trying to counter the angry blogosphere with a more nuanced position for the party, with limited success. If Democrats win on Tuesday, the internal fight over national security will grow even more pronounced. Democrats have prospered this year mainly by being against Bush without coming up with a genuine alternative. If they find themselves in charge on Capitol Hill, they will face pressure to develop a common posture.

DOJ_NMG_0090706

Campbell and O'Hanlon bring years of experience and study to the debate. Campbell served as a Pentagon official under George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton and now works as senior vice president at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. O'Hanlon is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a frequent commentator on foreign policy.

As they note, Democrats have been hobbled for decades by the public perception of weakness. The party of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman and John F. Kennedy was transformed by the Vietnam War and has wrestled with national security ever since.

Clinton's discomfort with the military -- his awkward initial salute to Marines standing guard at his helicopter, his fight over gays in uniform, his tentative response to Bosnia -- exemplified the problem to many. But during eight years in office, he grew more accustomed to his role as commander in chief, responding more confidently to the Kosovo crisis.

Bush, though, has used the issue against Democrats as a cudgel for years, managing to paint Kerry, a combat veteran decorated for service in Vietnam, as weak on security. This year, Bush has cited votes against his counterterrorism legislation to assert that Democrats do not even want to spy on, detain or try terrorists; he went so far this week as to declare that if Democrats win, so will terrorists.

The authors argue that it is not enough to simply shout back; Democrats, they say, "sometimes try too hard to sound like anti-Republicans -- and wind up weakening themselves more than their political opponents in the process."

Instead, they propose a detailed agenda dealing with homeland security, the military, Iraq, terrorism, nonproliferation, energy and China. They propose increasing active-duty armed forces by 50,000, creating State Department rapid-response teams for post-conflict situations and setting up regional National Guard planning centers to better respond to crises such as Hurricane Katrina or a terrorist attack. They would continue missile-defense development but at a lower level, cut the F/A-22 program in half, revamp the Joint Strike Fighter program, retire more Minuteman missiles and Trident submarines, and cut back the V-22 Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft.

On Iraq, they heartily agree with fellow Democrats that Bush "bungled" the war and "dispelled any notion of innate Republican superiority in matters of international hard power." But they criticize their party's rush for the door. "Democrats have focused mostly on missteps in Iraq. But there has been a less vibrant debate about the potential downsides of a precipitous American military withdrawal and how the dangerously eroding U.S. position in Iraq might somehow be made more promising."

It's a debate Campbell and O'Hanlon want to make more vibrant. If Democrats find the right course, the authors argue, the party has a chance to make a historic shift in the party's political perception. If not, they say, "Democrats are apt to remain on the political sidelines, left to contemplate what went so terribly wrong."

Federal Censorship Commission? (WSJ)

By Bob Wright

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Two years ago, I warned in these pages of the danger that the government, in response to the infamous "wardrobe malfunction" during January's televised Super Bowl, would use the threat of fines and license-revocation to create a climate of self-censorship among broadcasters. I take no pleasure in saying "I told you so." But the chill in the airwaves is unmistakable, and the viewing public is the biggest loser. The most recent example involves dozens of CBS affiliates who refused to rebroadcast the documentary "9/11" for fear they would be fined for the coarse words uttered by rescuers. This is one of many instances of broadcast licensees altering or canceling worthwhile programming out of concern about finding themselves in the Federal Communications Commission's crosshairs.

The FCC doesn't operate in a vacuum. It is responding to a degree of public unease with the content available in homes. And it is sensitive to campaigns orchestrated by interest groups with cultural and political agendas. But America long ago determined that government's role in shaping media should be extremely limited. This is true even in the case of broadcasters, who willingly assume public-service obligations in exchange for being licensed to transmit content over public airwaves. No one imagined these obligations to include accepting censorship.

Some FCC officials have said publicly that they would welcome the return of the family viewing hour -- a voluntary agreement first made 30 years ago among the three broadcast networks to offer family-friendly programming during the 8 o'clock hour. But with cable and satellite, access to VOD services, DVD players and digital recording devices, the vast majority of Americans have programming at their fingertips that will meet any conceivable interest at any time of the day or night. That's great news for parents. But it also highlights the flaw in the notion that, in 2006, the government should mandate that a specific hour be set aside for a certain type of programming on broadcast TV, or indeed that the FCC should attempt to regulate all of broadcast network primetime TV based on standards to protect kids.

DOJ_NMG_0090707

For starters, two-thirds of households do not have children under 18. One could reasonably suggest that government policy should not try to force all of broadcast TV to disregard the programming tastes and desires of two-thirds of all households. But FCC regulators do more than just ignore these households. They are blind to the reality of today's media environment. With more than 50% of homes having Internet access and 85% subscribing to cable and satellite services, the media choice is staggering. The average home receives 100 TV channels. Broadcast channels sit side-by-side with cable; and the under-18 cohort that the FCC focuses on so intently no longer knows the difference. Indeed, kids watch cable significantly more than broadcast and spend time on the Internet with unlimited access to material of every description.

So an FCC policy intent on ensuring that there will be nothing on broadcast TV that is inappropriate for kids during certain hours is doomed to failure. Do the math: 85% of households have cable and satellite, leaving 15% receiving broadcast TV only. Two-thirds of those households do not have kids under 18. Thus, the FCC appears to be basing its actions on a policy that is relevant to 5% of households. Moreover, government efforts to regulate content are invariably riddled with unfortunate consequences.

For example, breaking with established precedent, the FCC recently found a live network news program to be "indecent" because a single expletive was unexpectedly uttered by someone being interviewed by a reporter. What public interest is served when news organizations, unwilling to take the risk of incurring a fine, stop interviewing individuals live on camera -- or air all newscasts only after being cleared by a language censor? This ruling also jeopardizes the live sports broadcasts. What if a microphone accidentally picks up a fan yelling something on the FCC's list of bad words? A sports broadcast becomes a multimillion dollar gamble.

So what is the answer? It is certainly not that government should regulate content on cable TV and the Internet. But there is a reasonable solution. Just as parents use technology on the Internet, ratings information and blocking technology are available for TV. Broadcast and cable networks have a ratings and parental-advisory system, and today's TV sets are equipped with V-chips that block specified programming from entering a home. The entire TV industry is striving to provide parents with help to guide them through today's thicket of offerings. To make sure parents are aware of the control they have over programming, the TV industry and Ad Council are collaborating on a $300 million educational campaign.

No one suggests broadcast networks adopt an "anything goes" approach. All broadcast networks employ standards experts who vet thousands of hours of programming to make sure it doesn't violate sensibilities. Of course they make mistakes, and neither audiences nor government officials have been shy in voicing concerns -- to which the networks respond. Over-the-air broadcasters -- who are the most responsible, community-focused providers of programming in the business -- do an excellent job. Indeed, the vast majority of complaints about specific shows filed with the FCC (99% in 2004) came from organized interest groups who regularly trawl for complaints from individuals who never saw the show in question.

The FCC should formulate policies that take advantage of advanced technology, rather than hark back to solutions developed in -- and for -- a bygone era. An appropriate FCC policy would recognize that our TV audience is quite varied; that some programs at all hours should appropriately serve the two-thirds of households that do not have children; and that blocking technology is a 21st-century solution that is consistent with the Supreme Court's admonition that the government is constrained by the First Amendment to use the least restrictive means to address "indecent" programming content.

Mr. Wright is vice chairman of GE and chairman and CEO of NBC Universal.

The Second Election Without Soft Money Suggests That 2004 Was Not A Fluke (WP)

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

THE MCCAIN-FEINGOLD campaign finance law was supposed to be -- or so its critics warned -- a body blow to political parties. Starved of the six- and seven-figure "soft money" checks to which they had become addicted, opponents said, the parties would wither, their influence eclipsed by outside groups that remained free to accept unlimited sums. Democrats, who were especially dependent on soft money, would find themselves at a fatal disadvantage.

DOJ_NMG_0090708

None of that has happened. Not in 2004, when the parties raised a combined $1.5 billion ($785 million by Republicans, $684 million by Democrats) -- amazingly, more than their hard and soft money combined in any previous election. And not in 2006, the first midterm campaign conducted under the new rules, when the combined party fundraising was $768 million as of mid-October ($438 million by Republicans, $330 million by Democrats), according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute. The parties, now limited to maximum annual contributions of $26,700 from individuals, haven't recouped all the soft money they once vacuumed up, but they have rebounded far more robustly than anyone had predicted.

Instead of being hobbled by the abolition of soft money, Democrats are actually more financially competitive with Republicans than before. At this point in the 2002 election cycle, their total fundraising was $185 million behind the Republicans' figure; this year, that gap has shrunk to $108 million. The Democrats' House and Senate campaign arms have more than doubled their hard-money fundraising from four years ago.

All of this is welcome news. Unlimited soft-money checks were a corrupting influence; they needed to be done away with no matter the impact on the political parties. That soft money could be abolished and the parties remain a vibrant political force is a double benefit. Indeed, as a financial matter, the biggest difference between the 2004 and 2006 elections is the relatively more muted role of the outside groups known as 527s.

This remains a flawed system; it looks good only by comparison to the even more flawed previous regime. And the 2006 campaign has pointed up one particularly ridiculous aspect of campaign finance law that ought to be fixed before 2008: The rules limit how much political parties can spend on candidates in consultation with them but allow parties to spend unlimited amounts on behalf of candidates so long as they act "independently." Thus there is the spectacle of a Republican National Committee ad attacking Tennessee Democratic Senate candidate Harold E. Ford Jr. that the chairman of the RNC says he can't control -- because it was produced by an "independent" arm of the RNC. There's no good reason to force the political parties to engage in this charade of setting up independent groups. In fact, as the Ford ad shows, there's every reason to set up a system that requires those who underwrite ads to take responsibility for them.

US Envoys To Visit Asia To Prepare North Korea Nuclear Talks (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, November 3, 2006

Senior US diplomats will travel to Asia Sunday to prepare for a resumption of six-way negotiations with North Korea aimed at ending Pyongyang's newly proven nuclear weapons program, the State Department said.

The envoys will press Japan, China and South Korea to maintain tough UN-mandated sanctions against North Korea in the run-up to the negotiations and to ensure a united front in insisting the talks lead to Pyongyang's full denuclearization, department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Under pressure from the sanctions imposed after North Korea carried out its first nuclear test explosion on October 9, the Stalinist regime agreed earlier this week to return to the multilateral disarmament negotiations it had been boycotting for nearly a year.

But US officials remain wary of Pyongyang's motives, fearing the unpredictable North Korean leadership could use its new nuclear status as leverage to seek an easing of the sanctions against it while stalling on demands it verifiably give up the arsenal.

"We don't want this just to be about talk, we want it to be about getting some concrete, positive outcomes," McCormack said.

The US team will be led by Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's senior deputy, and include Robert Joseph, the hawkish head of the State Department's non-proliferation initiative who has been charged with overseeing implementation of the sanctions against North Korea.

They will meet Sunday and Monday with Japanese leaders in Tokyo before heading to Beijing for two days of talks with both Chinese and Russian officials, McCormack said. The pair will visit Seoul November 8 and 9.

DOJ_NMG_0090709

China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States are the five parties which have been trying for the past three years to convince North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic incentives and security guarantees.

The two sides reached a framework agreement in September 2005 under which North Korea agreed to give up its nuclear weapons, though the sequencing of the process was left for further negotiations.

Pyongyang walked away from those talks two months later after Washington slapped sanctions on a Macau-based bank accused of laundering money and passing counterfeit US currency on behalf of the North Koreans.

The US action led the bank, Banco Delta Asia, to freeze some 24 million dollars in North Korean assets, believed to include personal funds belonging to North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il and his entourage.

There were also reports at the time that Washington had angered Pyongyang by backing away from a promise to provide North Korea with a light-water nuclear reactor for its civilian energy program as part of the deal.

As part of this week's deal to resume negotiations, Washington told North Korea it was willing to discuss the Banco Delta Asia sanctions as part of the talks.

McCormack reaffirmed Thursday that the six-party talks were expected to resume before the end of the year and that Washington wanted the starting point to be the September 2005 framework agreement.

The mission for Burns and Joseph, he said, was to "create the right conditions, the best atmosphere" for the negotiations.

McCormack said there were no plans for the US envoys to meet with the North Koreans during next week's trip.

"I don't see that happening", he said.

U.S. Speeds Attack Plans For North Korea (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The Pentagon has stepped up planning for attacks against North Korea's nuclear program and is bolstering nuclear forces in Asia, said defense officials familiar with the highly secret process.

The officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the accelerated military planning includes detailed programs for striking a North Korean plutonium-reprocessing facility at Yongbyon with special operations commando raids or strikes with Tomahawk cruise missiles or other precision-guided weapons.

The effort, which had been under way for several months, was given new impetus by Pyongyang's underground nuclear test Oct. 9 and growing opposition to the nuclear program of Kim Jong-il's communist regime, especially by China and South Korea.

A Pentagon official said the Department of Defense is considering "various military options" to remove the program.

"Other than nuclear strikes, which are considered excessive, there are several options now in place. Planning has been accelerated," the official said.

A second, senior defense official privy to the effort said the Bush administration recently affirmed its commitment to both South Korea and Japan that it would use U.S. nuclear weapons to deter North Korea, now considered an unofficial nuclear weapon state.

"We will resort to whatever force levels we need to have, to defend the Republic of Korea. That nuclear deterrence is in place," said the senior official, who declined to reveal what nuclear forces are deployed in Asia.

Other officials said the forces include bombs and air-launched missiles stored at Guam, a U.S. island in the western Pacific, that could be delivered by B-52 or B-2 bombers. Nine U.S. nuclear-missile submarines regularly deploy to Asian waters from Washington state.

The officials said one military option calls for teams of Navy SEALs or other special operations commandos to conduct covert raids on Yongbyon's plutonium-reprocessing facility.

The commandos would blow up the facility to prevent further reprocessing of the spent fuel rods, which provides the material for developing nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0090710

A second option calls for strikes by precision-guided Tomahawk missiles on the reprocessing plant from submarines or ships. The plan calls for simultaneous strikes from various sides to minimize any radioactive particles being carried away in the air.

Planners estimate that six Tomahawks could destroy the reprocessing plant and that it would take five to 10 years to rebuild.

Asked about the strike planning, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the U.S. government is seeking a "peaceful, diplomatic solution" to the threat posed by North Korea.

Regarding any military options, Mr. Whitman said, "The U.S. military is prepared and capable of carrying out all of its assigned missions."

The planning does not mean that the United States will attack, only that military forces are ready to do so if President Bush orders strikes. Concerned about threats from rogue states such as North Korea, Mr. Bush called for a ballistic missile defense system, parts of which are operational.

Defense officials said a key factor in the ramped-up planning effort is China's new attitude toward North Korea. Beijing's leaders, upset that North Korea conducted the test, supported a U.S.-led United Nations' resolution.

Chinese opposition to military action had limited defense planning, the officials said. In the past, U.S. military plans required warning Beijing, a move considered likely to compromise any planned action because of the close military ties between China and North Korea.

The Bush administration regards the new level of Chinese support as a "green light" for more aggressive military planning.

U.S. officials think North Korea will conduct another underground test soon because Pyongyang is demanding to be recognized as a declared nuclear power. Both China and the U.S. gauged the test as only partially successful.

The Yongbyon plant, 32 miles from the coast and a half-mile from a river, is considered a key target because U.S. intelligence agencies suspect that it is where the plutonium fuel used in the Oct. 9 test was produced.

Defense planners also said equipment destroyed at Yongbyon would be difficult to replace once newly approved U.N. sanctions are in place.

Another set of targets could be the nuclear test site near Kilchu, in northeastern North Korea. That site includes several research and testing-control facilities in the mountains -- and possibly one more tunnel where a nuclear device could be set off, the officials said.

Recent intelligence reports also provided new information about Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, which remains hidden in underground facilities in northern North Korea, the officials said.

The U.S. Special Operations Command has been planning raids against North Korean nuclear facilities for some time. It has conducted training for joint operations with South Korean special forces as well as unilateral U.S. operations.

U.S. Pacific Command spokesman Capt. Jeff Alderson declined to comment on military planning but said the command is continuing to shift forces to the Pacific and has four missile-defense ships deployed in Japan.

Mr. Bush said recently that any transfer of nuclear weapons by North Korea would be a "grave threat," phrasing viewed as diplomatic code for a military response. Defense officials said the military option will be used if North Korea is caught transferring nuclear arms to other states or terrorist groups.

Six-Party Fever (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

After launching long-range ballistic missiles and setting off a nuclear device, North Korea's Kim Jong Il suddenly announced this week that he is prepared to return to the six-party talks after nearly a year's absence. Something must have happened to inspire this abrupt display of totalitarian pliancy, and it wasn't the intercession of Jimmy Carter.

The Bush Administration is treating the decision as something of a vindication of its policy, and that's partly true. At the U.N., Ambassador John Bolton answered Kim's fireworks displays by engineering unanimous Security Council resolutions 1695 and 1718, the second of which includes sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0090711

At the Treasury Department, meanwhile, Undersecretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence Stuart Levey aggressively cracked down on North Korea's money-laundering and counterfeiting schemes in places like Macau's Banco Delta Asia. Now Kim can no longer easily access his overseas slush funds to grease the spokes of his military machine.

Most important, Beijing finally decided to lean on its truculent neighbor, with some Chinese banks cutting off remittances to North Korea and, according to one report, the Chinese government briefly turning off the oil spigot without which Kim's regime would quickly collapse. China's helpfulness may owe less to any innate sense of good global citizenship than to its fear that a nuclear North Korea will eventually inspire a nuclear Japan. But whatever the case, the Chinese moves vindicate the Administration's long-held view that only regional pressure can sway Pyongyang, and that there's little to gain from direct bilateral talks.

Yet these small victories won't mean much if the Administration agrees in the six-party talks to abandon the very tools that brought North Korea back to the table in the first place. On Tuesday, Christopher Hill, the State Department's emissary to the talks, agreed that the U.S. would discuss the financial measures it's imposed on Kim's regime; in return, the regime will "discuss" denuclearization.

Problem is, however, that while the U.S. can be counted on to honor its diplomatic promises, the North Koreans cannot. Does anyone today remember North Korea's pledge last year to abandon its nuclear programs? At the time, Mr. Hill described the supposed breakthrough as "one of the best examples of multilateral diplomacy in this part of the world." Kim walked away from his pledges within a week, complaining that he wouldn't return until the U.S. stopped leaning on his finances.

There is also something troubling about an American initiative that's willing to be flexible, even if only in theory, about enforcing American law. Kim's forays into nuclear physics are dangerous and destabilizing, but they are not, strictly speaking, criminal. But his country's counterfeiting of American currency is criminal, as is its involvement in the heroin trade, and the idea that the U.S. might ease the pressure on North Korea's underworld activities as a diplomatic gambit takes realpolitik too far.

Barring outright regime change in Pyongyang, the goal of any American diplomatic initiative is to demonstrate to Kim, as the U.S. did to Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, that unless he disarms his regime will continue to be isolated and starved for cash and trade. His return to the table is probably a ploy, but at least it demonstrates that he is susceptible to financial and economic pressure. Keep that pressure up, and the six-party talks might actually succeed.

Iran Revolutionary Guards Hold War Games After U.S. Exercise (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

TEHRAN, Nov. 2 — Iran's hard-line Revolutionary Guards began another series of war games on Thursday days after a United States-led naval exercise began in the Persian Gulf.

During the Iranian exercise, called Great Prophet 2, dozens of missiles were fired, state-run television news reported.

It showed film of missiles fired from mobile launchers in the deserts near Qum, a religious city south of Tehran, the capital.

"Iranian experts have made some changes" to Shahab missiles, the news report said, "installing cluster warheads in them with the capacity to carry 1,400 bomblets."

"The first and main goal of this exercise is to demonstrate power and national determination to defend the country against any possible threat," it added.

Iran also conducted war games in August and April.

Heliport operations in the Strait of Hormuz are expected to follow the latest games.

The maneuvers appeared to be a response to the United States-led naval exercise in the Persian Gulf that began Monday, involving 25 nations, some of them neighbors of Iran. The exercise is aimed at enhancing security in the Persian Gulf and blocking the transportation of unconventional weapons.

A spokesman for the Iranian Foreign Ministry condemned the exercise on Sunday and urged neighboring countries to set up their own security arrangements. "We do not consider this exercise appropriate," said Muhammad Ali Husseini, the spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0090712

Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, leader of the Revolutionary Guards, said on television that Iran's war games were "no threat for the region or neighboring countries."

General Safavi said the games would last 10 days and would take place in the Persian Gulf, the Sea of Oman and several Iranian provinces.

Iran Test-fires Longer Range Missile (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 3, 2006

Iran test-fired dozens of missiles, including the Shahab-3 that can reach Israel, in military maneuvers Thursday that it said were aimed at putting a stop to the role of world powers in the Persian Gulf region.

The show of strength came three days after U.S.-led warships finished naval exercises in the Gulf that Iran branded as "adventurist." Iran remains locked in dispute with the West over its nuclear program, which Washington says is geared to producing atomic weapons but Tehran says is only for generating electricity.

Asked about Thursday's maneuvers, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she thought the Iranians "are trying to demonstrate that they are tough."

"The Iranians also I think are not unaware that the security environment is one in which if they actually were to do something Iran would suffer greatly and so I think they probably understand that," Rice said on the Bill Cunningham radio show on WLW Cincinnati.

"They are trying to say to the world you are not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon," she said. "The world has to say to them, yes, we will."

Iranian state television reported that several kinds of missiles were tested, and broadcast footage of them being fired from mobile launchers.

"We want to show our deterrent and defensive power to trans-regional enemies, and we hope they will understand the message," the head of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, said in a clear reference to the United States, Britain and France, who were among the six nations that took part in the Gulf maneuvers this week.

Iranian state radio said: "The maneuver is aimed at providing security in the region without the intervention of trans-regional powers, which are trying to justify their presence by portraying the region as convulsive."

In Israel, Infrastructure Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer said he was not surprised by the missile tests, and warned that to leave Iran unchecked would pose a risk to the world.

"Iran is following a direct line after North Korea. Therefore this problem is not Israel's but that of the entire world," Ben-Eliezer said, referring to North Korea's recent nuclear test and its frequent launches of long-range missiles.

Iran's Shahab-3 missile, which can carrying a nuclear warhead and is believed to have a range of more than 1,240 miles, is believed to be based on North Korea's Nodong missile. Iran is said to have funded the Nodong's development.

Iran, which denies obtaining missile technology from North Korea, has been testing the Shahab-3, which means "shooting star" in Farsi, since the late 1990s and publicly paraded the rocket for the first time in 2003.

The Iranian missile tests "should bother not only Israel. It should bother the Arab countries, Islamic countries, the Gulf region, North Africa and Europe. We are always warning the world about this phenomenon called Iran," Ben-Eliezer said.

Iran already has held three large-scale military exercises this year. It often uses maneuvers to test weapons developed by its arms industry.

Safavi, whose elite Revolutionary Guards conducted the missile tests, said the maneuvers that began Thursday, named "Great Prophet," would take place in the Gulf, the Sea of Oman and several provinces of Iran. He did not say how many troops were involved.

State radio quoted the air force chief of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Hossein Salami, as saying: "A large number of advanced missiles, different in range, warhead and kind, were successfully test fired at the same time."

DOJ_NMG_0090713

State TV reported that among the rockets fired was the Shahab-2, which has a warhead that can distribute 1,400 bomblets at the same time. It also said the troops launched solid-fuel Zalzal missiles, guided missiles as well as Scud-B, Zolfaghar-73 and Z-3 rockets.

Iran has already held three large-scale military exercises this year. In its April exercises, Iran tested what it called an "ultra-horizon" missile, which is fired from helicopters and jet fighters, and the Fajr-3 missile, which can reportedly evade radar and use multiple warheads to hit several targets simultaneously.

While U.S. officials have suggested that Iran is exaggerating the capabilities of its newly developed weapons, Washington and its allies have been watching the country's progress in missile technology with concern. Last December, Israel successfully tested its Arrow missile defense system against a rocket similar to Iran's Shahab-3. The Arrow was developed jointly with the United States.

The U.S.-led maneuvers that finished Monday focused on surveillance, with warships tracking a ship suspected of carrying components of illegal weapons. The nations that took part were Australia, Bahrain, Britain, France, Italy and the United States.

The U.N. Security Council is considered imposing sanctions on Iran, which has ignored demands that it cease uranium enrichment, a process that can produce the fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs.

Iran Fires Longer-range Missiles, To West's Dismay (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Iran fired its longer-range Shahab-3 ballistic missile for the first time, official media said, kicking off 10 days of war games and renewed warnings from the West over its nuclear program.

"Shahab missiles, carrying cluster warheads, with a range of 2,000 kilometers (1,200 miles), were fired from the desert near (Iran's clerical capital) Qom," state television reported.

That range is sufficient to threaten US bases in the Gulf.

The war games came amid US-led efforts to impose UN-mandated sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

They also came a day after a US-led naval force launched maneuvers for the first time in the Gulf near Iran in a test of capabilities to halt trafficking in weapons of mass destruction -- an initiative seen as a clear message to the Islamic republic.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice chided Iran: "I think they're trying to demonstrate that they're tough."

The hardline Revolutionary Guards fired the missile during the first phase of military maneuvers in the central desert.

"Dozens of Shahab-2 and -3, Zolfaghar-73, Scud B, Fath-110 and Zelzal have been launched in the presence of (Guards chief) General Yahya Rahim Safavi and other high-ranking commanders," the television report said.

"The cluster head of the Shahab-2 has the capability to disperse 1,400 bomblets with great destructive power."

It was the first time that Iran had fired the longer-range Shahab-3 and commanders said they would also be employing other "new equipment" during the war games.

Russia said it would monitor Iran's military moves after the reports of the missile-firing but ruled out the possibility that the Islamic republic had the technological means to create even longer-range missiles.

"If we are talking about intercontinental ballistic missiles, according to our information, Iran does not possess the technological capability" to create missiles with a 5,000-kilometer (3,100-mile) range, the head of Russian military's general staff Yury Baluyevsky told ITAR-TASS news agency.

Dubbed "Great Prophet 2," the air, land and sea maneuvers are to extend across 14 provinces with the focus on the Gulf and the Sea of Oman.

"The first and main goal of this exercise is to demonstrate power and national determination to defend the country against any possible threat," Safavi said.

"Heliport operations will be carried out in the Hormozgan region (on the Strait of Hormuz) and some of the Persian Gulf islands."

The strategic Strait of Hormuz is the obligatory passage for tankers exiting the Gulf that carry much of the world's oil supply.

The Iranian maneuvers come on the heels of naval exercises launched in the Gulf on Monday by a US-led flotilla including warships from Australia, Bahrain, France, Italy and Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0090714

"That is a propaganda and political maneuver without military value," Safavi said then.

"If forces from out of the region want to jeopardize Iran's security and interests, the Revolutionary Guards and the Basij (volunteer militia) will use all their capabilities to strike their enemies and their interests," he warned.

But the Guards commander insisted Iran's exercises were no threat to its neighbors.

"This maneuver is no threat for the region or neighboring countries," he said, adding: "Our neighbors are our friends and we consider our neighbors' enemies our enemies."

The aim of the exercises was the "defense of sensitive centers, strategic bottlenecks and confrontation of possible troubles," he said.

It is Iran's third round of war games this year. In August, the armed forces held country-wide maneuvers dubbed Zolfaghar Blow. Iran also staged Great Prophet 1 exercises in April.

Rice said Thursday's missile test was Iran's way of telling the world "you're not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon".

"The world has to say to them, yes, we will," she said.

The United States and its big power partners are negotiating among themselves a package of sanctions designed to persuade Iran to give up its uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists the program is aimed at providing fuel for nuclear power plants while Washington and others suspect the ultimate aim is to develop atomic weapons.

Referring to Iran's refusal to comply with a UN Security Council resolution demanding it abandon suspect nuclear activities, Rice said: "I think the Iranians are a threat and that's why the international community's got to be strong in resisting their ambitions."

Iran Fires Missiles In War Games (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr In Tehran And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process even as Europe took the first steps at the United Nations Security Council towards obtaining a resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend its nuclear fuel programme.

Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week.

"The product of the second cascade will be achieved soon after gas injection," the official said.

Iran began running one cascade of 164 centrifuges at its Natanz facility under UN inspection in January. It denies it has a weapons programme and says the uranium will only be enriched to the low level needed to fuel a civilian nuclear reactor.

Experts in Tehran believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened following the Islamic republic's refusal to heed a UN security council demand to suspend the programme that set an August 31 deadline.

"It's a significant part of Iran's policy… to show 'stick policy' will lead only to escalation of [the] crisis and won't hurt Iran's irreversible path," commented Aftab website which is close to Hassan Rowhani, the former nuclear negotiator.

Regime insiders say Iran's top leadership is not particularly worried about nuclear-related sanctions.

On Wednesday France, Germany and the UK – the so-called EU3 that had been negotiating with Iran – presented a draft sanctions resolution to the US, Russia and China for discussion.

Diplomats said one issue at dispute between the EU3 and the US was the future of the Bushehr reactor under construction by Russia in southern Iran. The draft says the "construction" of Bushehr is exempt from the sanctions, but the US has sought to block Russia's planned supply of nuclear fuel next year.

Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block.

DOJ_NMG_0090715

The European proposal would seek to prohibit nuclear and ballistic missile cooperation with Iran - unless exempted - by taking "necessary measures" to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of materials and technology. It would also halt related financial transactions, block international travel for Iranians connected to those activities and freeze their overseas assets.

A list is to be drawn up of individuals subject to the travel ban and asset freeze. It is not clear how far up the political hierarchy such a list might go.

Discussions among the five permanent members of the Security Souncil and Germany are to start on Thursday.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament that the UK was working closely with other veto-wielding Security Council members to get a "proper, binding resolution".

The US and Europe say the proposed resolution is intended as a first step, and would be followed by steadily escalating measures if Iran did not comply.

At the same time, diplomats are worried that the process could end up replicating the crisis with North Korea whereby Iran would respond to threats by expelling UN inspectors and quitting the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty. For this reason Europe – including the Russians who have a $1bn contract – are insisting that the Bushehr project should be allowed to continue.

European officials hope negotiations will resume with Iran but on the precondition that it first suspend its enrichment programme.

President George W. Bush reiterated yesterday that the US would be ready to join Europe in negotiations following verifiable suspension.

"We've got a lot of issues with Iran," Mr Bush told a news conference. "The first is whether or not they will help this young democracy succeed," he said, referring to Iraq. He said the "second issue" was whether Iran would help the Lebanese government, and that the "big issue" was "whether or not Iran will end up with a nuclear weapon".

Six Major Powers To Resume Talks On Iran Sanctions Friday (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Six major UN powers are due to resume delicate negotiations Friday on a package of sanctions against Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work, UN diplomats said.

The informal meeting will notably hear from Russian ambassador Vitaly Churkin, who travelled home this week to work out Moscow's response to a draft resolution drawn up by Britain, France and Germany, they said.

The negotiations were suspended a week ago with Russia and China still deeply reluctant to agree to tough sanctions and Washington feeling the proposals from its European allies did not go far enough.

The draft calls for a series of nuclear- and ballistic missile-related trade sanctions, a freeze of assets related to Iran's nuclear and missile programs and travel bans on scientists involved in those programs.

But it would allow Russia to continue building a billion-dollar nuclear power plant in the Iranian city of Bushehr -- an exemption crucial to gaining Moscow's approval for any resolution, diplomats said.

Iran faces sanctions after rejecting an earlier Security Council resolution requiring it to suspend a long-secret program to enrich uranium -- a process that can eventually provide fissile material for nuclear weapons.

Tehran insists the program is only to provide fuel for civilian nuclear power stations.

The six powers -- the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany, which has close ties to Iran -- have offered Tehran a package of economic and diplomatic incentives if it gives up the enrichment program.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called her five counterparts on Tuesday to urge speedy passage of the sanctions resolution and on Thursday warned that inaction was not an option.

"I think the Iranians are a threat and that's why the international community's got to be strong in resisting their ambitions," she said.

Rice also responded to the first launch by Iran earlier in the day of a new long-range ballistic missile, the Shahab-3, during war games seen as a warning to the West over the nuclear showdown.

"They're trying to say to the world, 'You're not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon.' The world has to say to them, yes, we will," Rice said in a radio interview.

DOJ_NMG_0090716

"But the Iranians also I think are not unaware that the security environment is one in which if they actually were to do something, Iran would suffer greatly and so I think they probably understand that," she added.

But diplomats said there was still protracted and tough haggling to come as Russia and China remain reluctant to accept biting sanctions against a country with which they have close energy and trade ties.

The head of Russia's national security council, Igor Ivanov, reaffirmed Russia's reticence on the issue Thursday, warning that any Security Council decision "should be aimed not at punishing Iran but at continuing to resolve the problem through political means."

US officials have refused to elaborate publicly on their objections to the European draft, though the fact that Washington has so far not agreed to co-sponsor the measure is a clear sign that differences remain.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack did say earlier in the week that Washington wanted firm guarantees that construction of the Bushehr power plant would not provide Iran with access to sensitive fuel-cycle technology.

But McCormack expressed confidence that the issues could be resolved and that the Bushehr project was not a deal-breaker.

"The bottom line is, at the end of these negotiations on a resolution, we believe we are going to get a good, strong resolution that sends a message to Iran that it must come into line with what the international community has demanded that they do," he said.

Abbas To Consider Seeking New Elections (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, November 3, 2006

Mahmoud Abbas is inclined to seek new elections if talks with Hamas militants on forming a moderate government don't produce results in about two weeks, a top aide to the moderate Palestinian president said Thursday.

Abbas has been trying to end a punishing aid cutoff by setting up a government acceptable to the West, either in a power-sharing arrangement between Hamas and his Fatah movement, or by appointing independent technocrats. However, Hamas has balked at demands that it recognize Israel, and no solution to the deadlock has emerged.

In other developments Thursday, Israeli attack helicopters, tanks and ground troops tightened their grip on the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, killing an elderly civilian, two militants and a police officer on the second day of Israel's biggest push in months to stop Palestinian rocket fire.

Palestinian hospital officials said another five militants were killed and several wounded in airstrikes during the early hours Friday. The military said aircraft targeted rocket launch sites in the area.

In a separate operation, an airstrike on a car in Gaza City killed three Hamas members travelling inside, one of them a local militant commander, witnesses said. An army spokeswoman said a vehicle carrying "terror activists" was hit.

Independent legislator Mustafa Barghouti, who has been shuttling between the two sides, said Thursday that an agreement on a new government is close, but he would not disclose details. "We have made good progress. We are almost there," Barghouti said after meeting with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

Barghouti later met Abbas to brief him on his five hours of talks with Haniyeh and told reporters the two men had also spoken directly by phone.

He said tentative agreement has been reached on a political program acceptable to the West. However, negotiations have broken down in the past, despite upbeat forecasts.

The head of Abbas' office, Rafiq Husseini, said the Palestinian leader still hopes to reach a solution. But if negotiations fail, Abbas "feels instinctively that the best thing for him to do is to go back to his people," meaning a new election, Husseini said in an interview at the presidential headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Under the Palestinians' Basic Law, Abbas cannot call an early election. However, he could try to get around that by holding a referendum on early elections.

Hamas was elected in parliament elections in January, and the next vote is not due for another three years. Abbas was elected separately in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0090717

Abbas aides, speaking privately, have said the Palestinian leader has set a two-week deadline for wrapping up negotiations with Hamas. Husseini confirmed that Abbas has given a time frame.

"The president does not like lengthy negotiations, lengthy discussions ... and therefore he has to put deadlines," Husseini said. "I think everybody is talking about a deadline of a couple of weeks ... and I think this must be true."

Still, Abbas' low-key leadership style makes it unlikely he will seek a showdown with Hamas. In the past, he has repeatedly backed down from such confrontations.

Violence in and around the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun has increased since Wednesday with a total of 20 Palestinians killed, including the four new deaths early Friday. Israeli attack helicopters, tanks and ground troops on Wednesday launched the military's biggest push in months to stop Palestinian rocket fire.

The Israeli army said more than one-third of the 800 rockets fired at Israel in recent months were launched from Beit Hanoun.

At a Hamas rally after nightfall Thursday in Gaza City, Haniyeh called the Israeli offensive "terrorism."

Despite the offensive, militants fired six rockets at Israel from northern Gaza on Thursday, the military said. Two Israelis were slightly wounded and a house was damaged.

A Western diplomat, meanwhile, said he expected new security arrangements to be in place at the Karni cargo crossing between Gaza and Israel, the coastal strip's main lifeline, before the end of the year.

The U.S.-backed arrangements, including new scanners, European monitors and deployment of elite Palestinian forces, are to prevent closures of Karni over security threats. In recent months, Karni has been closed down repeatedly by Israel amid warnings of possible attacks by Palestinian militants.

Last week militants smuggled high explosives through the crossing. They were intercepted on the Israeli side, the military said.

Israeli Troops Kill 6 Palestinians In Second Straight Day Of Fighting In Gaza Farming Town (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 2 — Israeli troops on Thursday rounded up Palestinian men and battled militants for a second straight day in the northeastern corner of the Gaza Strip, killing six Palestinians, including militants and civilians, Palestinian medical workers said.

The Israeli operation in Beit Hanun, a farming community that has been the scene of frequent fighting, is one of the largest since Israeli forces entered Gaza four months ago. It is intended to stop, or at least limit, the persistent Palestinian rocket fire from the area into Israel, the Israeli military says.

Despite the large Israeli presence, Palestinians still managed to launch several more rockets Thursday from nearby areas in northern Gaza. One hit a house in the Israeli town of Sderot, which is just beyond Gaza's perimeter fence, and two Israeli civilians were wounded, Israeli officials said.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, speaking in Gaza City, just a few miles from the fighting, said the Israeli action would not succeed. "We are completely sure this will fail, as all previous campaigns failed," he said.

In Beit Hanun, the streets were largely deserted except for Israeli tanks and other armored vehicles that kicked up clouds of dust as they patrolled the town. Most of the town's 30,000 residents remain holed up in their homes. The Israeli military interrupted Palestinian radio broadcasts, telling women, children and older men to stay inside for their safety.

However, in a separate announcement on loudspeakers, the Israeli forces ordered all males ages 16 to 45 to gather at a square in the town. Many were put onto trucks and driven outside the town for questioning. Most were later released, but about 15 were held for further questioning, the Israeli military said. While the fighting was less intense than on Wednesday, when the Israeli incursion began, there was sporadic gunfire throughout the day.

DOJ_NMG_0090718

On Thursday night, Israel carried out airstrikes against Palestinians responsible for firing rockets, the Israeli military said. Two Palestinians were killed, according to Palestinian medical workers. There were conflicting reports about whether they were militants or civilians.

Earlier in the day, two Palestinian militants and two civilians were killed, said officials at Kamal Adwan Hospital. One of the civilians, Diab al-Bassioni, was in his 70s. Mr. Bassioni was hit by a bullet when he stepped outside to get water, his neighbors told Agence France-Presse. More than a dozen Palestinians were wounded, hospital officials said.

In two days of fighting, at least 14 Palestinians have been killed and more than 60 wounded, according to Palestinian hospitals. Most of the dead and wounded have been militants, though a number of women and children have also been hurt, according to the hospitals. One Israeli soldier was killed Wednesday, and two were lightly wounded on Thursday, the Israeli military said.

For the past five years, Beit Hanun has been one of the Palestinian militants' favorite places from which to launch rockets toward Israel. Beit Hanun is only about two miles from Sderot, but the rockets have a limited range and are wildly inaccurate.

The Gaza militants have fired about 300 of their 800 rockets so far this year from Beit Hanun, according to the Israeli military. Most of the other 500 have been launched from elsewhere in northern Gaza.

The militants frequently fire from the orange and lemon groves on the outskirts of Beit Hanun, but Israel has bulldozed many of those orchards, removing the cover for the militants, as well as the livelihood of many residents.

Many militants come from Gaza City, or other parts of Gaza, and not Beit Hanun. Some local residents oppose the Palestinian rocket fire because the town bears the brunt of the Israeli military response, but others support the Palestinian attacks.

Israel has staged repeated raids into northern Gaza over the past five years in an effort to halt the rockets. While the incursions have reduced the rocket fire in some instances, it has never stopped it completely.

Syria Denies Plan To Topple Lebanon Govt. (AP)

By Samar Kassabli

AP, November 3, 2006

Syria on Thursday denied U.S. accusations that it was seeking to topple Lebanon's Western-backed government with the help of Iran and Hezbollah.

The Foreign Ministry said Syria has stayed out of its neighbor's affairs since pulling its troops out of Lebanon last year.

"The U.S. administration's attempts to circulate that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are seeking to destabilize Lebanon are not true," the Foreign Ministry said. "Since it withdrew its troops from Lebanon, Syria has voiced its support for anything that the Lebanese agree on through their national dialogue."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday there was "mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah, and their Lebanese allies are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

A strongly worded statement from the White House did not detail that evidence. It did single out Syria for an alleged plan to derail possible prosecutions for the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who had tried to draw his country away from Syrian domination.

Lebanese and international pressure following Hariri's February 2005 assassination forced Syrian troops to end their 29-year presence in Lebanon.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, accused Syria and Iran on Monday of violating a U.N. embargo meant to keep Hezbollah from rearming after the Lebanese guerrillas' 34-day war with Israel last summer. He said Tuesday that violations of that embargo are part of the "evidence base" the White House used.

Syria denies it is violating the embargo.

Terje Roed-Larsen, the top U.N. envoy for Syria-Lebanon issues, said representatives of the Lebanese government "have stated publicly and also in conversations with us that there has been arms coming across the border into Lebanon."

The Lebanese government denied having shared such allegations.

"Neither the government, nor I told anybody about this," Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora reporters Wednesday.

Lebanese Defense Minister Elias Murr said Roed-Larsen's comments were "inaccurate."

DOJ_NMG_0090719

Israel has said weapons smuggling for the Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah was continuing despite the U.N. embargo. Israel has said its military overflights of Lebanon are necessary to monitor the situation.

The Lebanese government has deployed thousands of soldiers on the border with Syria to stop smuggling. A U.N. maritime force led by Germany is patrolling the Mediterranean off Lebanon to enforce the embargo.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah gave Saniora's government an ultimatum on Tuesday: establish a Cabinet of "national unity" by Nov. 13 or face street protests. Such a Cabinet would give the Islamic militants and their allies veto power over key decisions.

U.S. officials said they consider Nasrallah's threat serious.

Threat Deepens Lebanon Political Crisis (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, November 3, 2006

Two months after its devastating war, Lebanon is again on the edge of crisis — at the center of a power play involving the United States, Syria, Iran and Israel.

Neighboring Syria on Thursday denied accusations it wants to topple the Lebanese government, but an ultimatum earlier in the week from the Syrian-allied Hezbollah to stage mass protests to force early elections has alarmed Washington and Europe.

At stake is the August cease-fire that halted the Israel-Hezbollah war, and Western efforts to bolster democracy in Lebanon. The crisis also could undermine U.S. diplomatic overtures to Syria and Iran to help calm Iraq, where both countries have influence among armed groups.

Politics in this ethnically diverse nation have boiled over in recent weeks, washing away a brief period of unity during the war, when Lebanon suffered a pounding from Israel's military after Hezbollah guerrillas crossed the border and captured two Israeli soldiers.

Hezbollah, an armed Shiite group that has often fought Israel, also has 11 legislators in Parliament and has been increasingly aggressive in its political plays. The threat Tuesday from its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, racheted up tensions between pro-Syrian and pro-Western groups.

Nasrallah warned of street protests if Prime Minister Fuad Saniora did not accept his group's demands for a "national unity" Cabinet, in which Hezbollah and its allies would have a veto on key decisions. Nasrallah set a deadline of Nov. 13.

Hezbollah now has two ministers on the 24-member Cabinet and can count on support from three more, but eight votes are needed to veto key decisions.

Nasrallah's threat, as well as five grenade attacks in Beirut in recent weeks, have stoked tensions and raised fears of more violence, particularly after a pro-government Christian group said Thursday that it was ready to take to the streets "to defend the Lebanese republic."

At the same time, Israel has been flying warplanes over Lebanon to pressure the international community into curbing an alleged flow of weapons from Syria to Hezbollah's fighters.

Saniora has dismissed Israeli claims of weapons smuggling and denied his government told the United Nations of such actions. But U.N. envoy Terje Roed-Larsen said he was told by Lebanese officials that arms were still flowing from Syria to Lebanon in violation of a U.N. embargo.

On Wednesday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said there was "mounting evidence" that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah "are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Snow said any attempt to stir up demonstrations, threaten or use violence against Lebanon's U.S.-backed leadership would be a clear violation of the country's sovereignty and of three U.N. Security Council resolutions.

His comments drew a quick denial from Syria.

"The U.S. administration's attempts to circulate that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are seeking to destabilize Lebanon are not true," the Syrian Foreign Ministry said Thursday in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0090720

The statement noted Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon last year under international pressure to end a nearly 30-year occupation. Since then, it said, "Syria has voiced its support for anything that the Lebanese agree on through their national dialogue."

Washington isn't alone in its concerns, however. The European Union, which provided the bulk of troops monitoring the August cease-fire, also has expressed worries about challenges to Saniora's government.

"The EU will be with you. You can be sure of that," EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana told Saniora at a news conference in Beirut last weekend.

While Hezbollah threatened street action, its leader said demonstrations would be peaceful and stressed that the Lebanese people have a democratic right to demonstrate — something the United States has not in the past opposed.

But Washington considers Hezbollah a terrorist organization and the group's push for a confrontation with Washington's Lebanese allies appeared to persuade the White House to take a public stand behind Saniora, who has strengthened ties with the United States.

In a statement Thursday, Hezbollah said the U.S. is trying to draw Lebanon into its dispute with Iran and Syria and enlist the country in the "Bush administration's war against those it considers enemies."

Despite the sharpening rhetoric, Nasrallah left open the possibility of compromise, perhaps by expanding the number of Cabinet portfolios.

The Arabic newspaper As-Safir said Thursday that officials in Saudi Arabia were discussing a formula to add more representation to the Cabinet.

Nasrallah, who met with the Saudi ambassador last week, said in the Tuesday interview that he would not object to Saniora staying on as prime minister as long as the Cabinet was reshuffled and expanded.

Somali Extremists Threaten Bombings (AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy

AP, November 3, 2006

Islamic extremists in Somalia are threatening to stage suicide bombings in parts of East Africa, the U.S. Embassy said Thursday in the latest warning that conflict in Somalia could spread in this volatile region.

The embassy, in a warning to Americans living or traveling in Kenya, said it had received reports of "extremist elements" targeting Kenya, Ethiopia and other "surrounding countries," which it did not identify.

"These threats specifically mention the execution of suicide explosions in prominent landmarks within Kenya and Ethiopia. American citizens are advised to remain vigilant and to use extreme caution when frequenting prominent public places," the statement said.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another. But an increasingly powerful group, the Council of Islamic Courts, seized control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and now controls much of Somalia's south.

The embassy's warning came one day after talks collapsed between the militants and Somalia's U.N.-backed interim government, which controls only the western city of Baidoa.

A leading member of the Islamic militia, Abdirahman Janaqow, told The Associated Press he didn't believe his group had prompted the embassy's warning. He charged that the statement was "designed to create problems."

Officials of the acting Somali government did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

The U.S. government has charged that some in the Somali militant group have tied to al-Qaida.

Experts warn that Somalia could become a proxy battleground for neighboring Eritrea and Ethiopia. Eritrea, which broke away from Ethiopia in a 1961-91 civil war and fought a 1998-2000 border war with its rival, supports the Islamic militia. Ethiopia backs the interim government.

A confidential U.N. report obtained by AP last week said 6,000 to 8,000 Ethiopian troops are in Somalia or along the border. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea are inside Somalia. Eritrea denies having any troops there, while Ethiopia insists it sent only a few hundred advisers.

DOJ_NMG_0090721

Kenya, and Tanzania just to its south, have already been victims of al-Qaida terrorism, with the bombings at the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam in 1998 and attacks on a hotel and an Israeli airliner in Kenya in 2002.

The attacks emanated from Somalia, where the growing militant movement has prompted concerns that the chaotic nation could become fertile ground for Osama bin Laden's terror organization. Two leaders of the Islamic courts appear on U.S. and U.N. lists of people known to have ties to al-Qaida, although both men have repeatedly denied the allegations.

U.S. Urges Caution In Kenya, Ethiopia (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The United States warned its citizens in Kenya and Ethiopia yesterday about the possibility of suicide attacks by "extremist elements" from Somalia amid rising fears of a regional war in the Horn of Africa.

The State Department urged Somalia's neighbors to stay away from the struggle between the country's weak central government and the powerful Islamic courts that control the capital, Mogadishu, and much of the country.

The U.S. Embassies in Nairobi and Addis Ababa cited reports of "terrorist threats emanating from extremist elements within Somalia which target Kenya, Ethiopia and other surrounding countries." The threats "specifically mention the execution of suicide explosions in prominent landmarks within Kenya and Ethiopia," the embassies warned.

The messages called on Americans to be vigilant and to use extreme caution in public places.

Intelligence officials and nongovernmental organizations in the region are warning of an escalation of the Somali conflict, with Ethiopia supporting the interim government and Eritrea backing the Islamists. Kenya is home to many Somali expatriates.

Recent troop movements and artillery fire have added to the anxiety. "Given the situation on the ground, the proximity of the forces and the artillery duels of the last few days, an escalation is likely," regional analyst Matt Bryden told [a] news agency. "It could be hours, it could be days, it could be weeks."

The United States has accused the Islamists of harboring al Qaeda operatives.

"There are concerns that the ... current situation in Somalia might lend itself to wider violence in the region, and we are doing everything we can to see that does not happen," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"We believe the most hopeful course forward begins with transitional federal institutions and the Islamic courts coming together," he said.

Bomb attacks on the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in August 1998 killed 224 persons, including 12 Americans.

Somalia's government yesterday rebuffed efforts to reorganize peace talks after they failed this week in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum.

Diplomats said mediators were trying to persuade the two sides to return to the table in the middle of the month, and the Islamists said they were "always ready and prepared" for negotiations." But government delegate Ahmed Omar Gagale told [a news service]: "The government delegation has refused to set a date and a place."

In Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian Foreign Ministry issued a blunt assessment of the deteriorating situation, blaming "extremist" Islamists for the failure of the talks and the looming war.

EU Cancels Talks Between Turkey, Cyprus (AP)

By Robert Wielaard

AP, November 3, 2006

The European Union on Thursday canceled a meeting bringing together the foreign ministers of Cyprus and Turkey, talks called to resolve a dispute threatening Turkey's already troubled drive to join the EU.

Turkey opened EU membership talks in October 2005 but opposition has since grown — notably in France and Germany — to bringing a large, poor, Muslim nation into the bloc, particularly one that is slow to embrace political reform and that effectively refuses to recognize EU member Cyprus.

Failing to overcome hurdles, the EU canceled a two-day meeting aimed at mediating in the Turkey-Cyprus feud, said Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja, whose country holds the rotating EU leadership. The talks had been scheduled for Sunday and Monday in Helsinki, the Finnish capital.

DOJ_NMG_0090722

"We have been prepared to arrange a round of talks (with) all parties in Finland. Unfortunately, this has not been possible," said Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja.

The EU wants Ankara to drop its refusal to open Turkish ports to Cypriot planes and ships — a key condition for the entry talks to continue. Ankara wants the EU to do more to end the isolation of Turkish Cypriots, whose government only Turkey recognizes.

Tuomioja said in a statement that the stumbling blocks were "questions related to direct trade between the EU and the northern part of Cyprus" and "the uninterrupted continuation of Turkey's accession negotiations."

The Mediterranean island of Cyprus has been divided into a Greek-Cypriot south and a breakaway Turkish-Cypriot north since Turkey invaded in 1974 after a failed Athens-backed coup by supporters of union with Greece. Cyprus entered the 25-member EU in May 2004.

Turkey has no diplomatic relations with the island's internationally recognized Greek Cypriot government, and backs the breakaway Turkish Cypriot state in the north.

In Cyprus, government spokesman Christodoulos Pashiardis blamed the cancellation on Turkey. "We understand that this development is due to the positions and terms put forward by the Turkish side," Pashiardis said.

"The Cypriot government will continue to consult with the Finnish presidency, maintaining the same constructive stance and behavior as it had done up until now."

Under pressure from Greece and Cyprus, the EU may abandon the membership talks if Ankara does not live up to an agreement extending its customs union with the EU to the Greek Cypriot part of Cyprus.

In 2004, Greek Cypriots rejected a United Nations-backed plan to reunite the country on the eve of its entry into the EU, essentially excluding the Turkish-speaking north from receiving EU benefits even though Turkish Cypriots endorsed reunification in a separate referendum.

Greek and Cypriot media reports have said Finland is proposing to reduce restrictions on the Turkish-speaking part of Cyprus if Turkey opens its ports to the Greek Cypriots.

The Finnish government had no comment on the reported proposals.

Earlier this month, Greece and Cyprus forced the EU to postpone the opening of a new chapter of Turkey's EU membership talks — on industrial policy — until a solution to the customs dispute was found.

In Greece, Prime Minister Costas Karamanlis said Turkey had failed to implement basic reforms needed before it joins the European Union.

He called on the European Commission to clearly state Turkey's shortcomings in a forthcoming progress report on the country's membership prospects.

"The truth is that, so far, Turkey has not taken basic and necessary steps on ... its obligations regarding the European Union," Karamanlis said.

Uneasy NATO allies Greece and Turkey have long-running disputes over airspace and undersea exploitation rights in the Aegean Sea, and have come close to war three times since 1974.

Karamanlis said a standing Turkish threat to declare war if Greece extends its territorial waters is an "unacceptable anachronism."

Vietnam To Prosecute Three U.S. Citizens In Terrorism Case (WP)

By Grant McCool

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

HANOI, Nov. 2 -- Seven people, including three Vietnamese-born U.S. citizens, will be prosecuted on charges of plotting violence against Vietnam's communist government, officials said Thursday.

The prosecutor included charges against a U.S. citizen whose 13-month detention has drawn attention in the United States before a Nov. 17-20 visit to Vietnam by President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0090723

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) has linked the detention of Orlando resident Thong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee to passage of a bill that would grant Vietnam permanent normal trade relations status. "Senator Martinez is doing everything in his power as a U.S. senator to get Mrs. Foshee back to Florida," said his spokeswoman, Kerry Feehery.

Washington and Hanoi signed a trade deal May 31 that helped usher Vietnam toward its expected accession next week to the World Trade Organization. The White House hopes to win approval of permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam before Bush's visit.

On Thursday, prosecutors in Vietnam "asked the Ho Chi Minh City People's Court to bring to court seven defendants involved in a terrorism case," according to a statement carried by the official Vietnam News Agency.

A Cold War Ghost Haunts Elections In Nicaragua (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- When the U.S. ambassador here said of a presidential candidate that "if it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, and swims like a duck, it probably is a duck," he ruffled a lot of feathers.

Since the comments earlier this year, the candidate, José Rizo, a white-haired coffee farmer, has been lampooned in the Nicaraguan media as a "pato," or duck, which is also Nicaraguan slang for homosexual. Ambassador Paul Trivelli's friends say the diplomat meant to imply only that Mr. Rizo, 62 years old, is a creature controlled by former Nicaraguan President Arnoldo Alemán, who is under house arrest for embezzlement. But many here suspect the Spanish-speaking Mr. Trivelli knew the full meaning of the word.

"He called me a duck, and that means homosexual," says Mr. Rizo, who says he isn't gay -- and is angry he has to defend himself. Mr. Trivelli declined to be interviewed for this article, as did other U.S. Embassy officials.

The duck flap is illustrative of what Nicaraguans consider U.S. intrusion in this Sunday's presidential election, where former Sandinista comandante and president, Daniel Ortega, 61, whom Washington despises, is running well ahead of banker Eduardo Montealegre, 51, whom Washington favors. Mr. Rizo is running a distant third, but he is attracting U.S. attention in part because support for him would split the anti-Ortega vote -- and keeping Mr. Ortega out of office is extremely important to U.S. officials.

The current controversy carries echoes of the 1980s, when the U.S. sought to overthrow Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government, which had allied itself with the Soviet Union. The current Ortega campaign evokes strong emotions in the State Department as a reminder of that time. Even retired Lt. Col. Oliver North, a prominent figure in the Cold War battle against the Sandinistas, has become involved, criticizing the U.S. for shunning Mr. Rizo, who Col. North believes has the best chance of defeating Mr. Ortega.

Since arriving in Managua last year, Mr. Trivelli, 52, has become a familiar figure in the Nicaraguan media, where he often slams what he calls the country's antidemocratic forces -- Mr. Ortega's Sandinistas and Mr. Rizo's Liberal Constitutional Party, or PLC. The U.S. is battling corruption, he says, which is a threat to Nicaragua's democracy and especially virulent in the PLC. "We will never approve of a candidate, or a party that has as a candidate Arnoldo Alemán, his family, his cronies or someone designated by him," Mr. Trivelli said earlier this year on Nicaraguan television.

Last month, the Organization of American States, which is monitoring elections here, issued a statement that "lamented" outside interference in the election and criticized Ambassador Trivelli by name.

Even some of America's friends here think Mr. Trivelli has been heavy-handed. Carlos Briceño, a U.S. citizen who heads a television station in Managua, says he was telephoned by a deputy of Mr. Trivelli who said the election was a matter of U.S. national interest and suggested his news coverage should reflect that concern. "The U.S. has lost the parameters of what is permissible and what is totally unacceptable," Mr. Briceño says.

In response to such criticisms, a State Department spokesman said in a briefing yesterday, "We're not trying to shade opinion or to try to take a position. This is a democratic election."

Mr. Trivelli, a career foreign-service officer, headed the Central America desk at the State Department before being appointed ambassador last year. One European diplomat says the tall and bearded Mr. Trivelli is known for being withdrawn and somewhat brusque. While of Italian descent, says the diplomat, Mr. Trivelli "obviously didn't learn anything from Machiavelli."

DOJ_NMG_0090724

The Americans aren't the only ones throwing their weight around. Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chávez, has been supplying Sandinista mayors with cut-rate oil for public transportation and fertilizer to be sold to local farmers.

Mr. Rizo, who like many affluent Nicaraguans travels frequently to the U.S. for family and business matters, said recently that he has encountered visa problems at Mr. Trivelli's embassy. When his 10-year U.S. visa expired this summer, Mr. Rizo says he got only a three-month visa, after a tough grilling at the embassy. That visa has already expired and he must apply for a new one.

The U.S. Embassy also has lifted the visas of more than two dozen prominent figures in Mr. Rizo's PLC party, most of them judges, alleging in most cases that they are corrupt. The visa issue has been decried by the PLC as politically motivated. In Managua circles and the press, the visaless officials are called "los desvisados" -- the ones whose visas were lifted.

A State Department spokesman says the government is barred by law from commenting on individual cases, but that the U.S. doesn't revoke visas for political reasons.

The U.S. has opposed the PLC since Mr. Alemán, a 300-pound political boss known as "El Gordo," or "the Fat Man," cut a deal in 1999 with Mr. Ortega, the head of the Sandinista opposition. As part of the "pacto," the two parties rewrote election laws so that a presidential candidate could avoid a run-off and win with just 35% of the vote, rather than 45% as before. That was a boon for Mr. Ortega, who is anathema to a large part of the electorate in this dirt-poor country of 5.5 million.

In the most recent polls, Mr. Ortega has about 33% of the vote, compared with 25% for Mr. Montealegre and 17% for Mr. Rizo.

The U.S. has a turbulent history with Nicaragua, which it has treated as a kind of protectorate. In 1909, the U.S. sent gunboats to Nicaragua, forcing the resignation of President José Santos Zelaya, who had executed two Americans. U.S. Marines occupied the country for most of the next 24 years. But the Marines were unable to quell a revolt by nationalist Gen. Augusto Sandino and left the country in 1933. The U.S. turned power over to an ally, Gen. Anastasio Somoza, whose family ruled until the Sandinista triumph in 1979 put Mr. Ortega in power.

Nicaragua became a Cold War battleground when the Sandinistas allied themselves with the Soviet Union. The U.S. engaged in a proxy war, backing Contra rebels in the 1980s. Mr. Ortega left power peacefully in 1990 when he lost an election, but Cold War ghosts continue to haunt Managua and Washington. Some Bush national security officials got their start during the Contra wars, which may help explain why the U.S. is determined to stop their nemesis, Mr. Ortega. "Daniel Ortega sets them off," says Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "He sets the reptilian part of their brains to work."

Mr. Ortega has run for president three times since his 1990 loss, but this is the first election in which he has a real chance to win, thanks to the new 35% rule. These days, Mr. Ortega runs as the candidate of reconciliation. He picked as a running mate a former Contra leader, Jaime Morales, whose mansion Mr. Ortega had once confiscated, and chose as a campaign song John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

One of Mr. Rizo's few prominent U.S. allies is Col. North, who as a Reagan White House official sold arms to Iran and used the proceeds to fund the Contras -- which provoked a scandal in Washington. In his syndicated column, Col. North, who is also a television host for Fox News, last month slammed the U.S. for distancing itself from Mr. Rizo. He later flew to Managua, where he made an appearance with Mr. Rizo at a breakfast. Mr. Rizo's campaign also ran a television spot using a still shot of Mr. North, with the White House in the background.

Mr. Trivelli wasn't amused, saying the ad wrongly suggested the U.S. was backing Mr. Rizo. Such propaganda by the PLC is "paja," he told reporters, using a word that means "bogus," but has a second slang meaning of "masturbation." The ensuing controversy over yet another linguistic faux pas was the talk of Managua.

The city's mayor Dionisio Marenco, a top aide to Mr. Ortega, jokes that Mr. Trivelli is acting as Mr. Ortega's campaign manager. "I hope he keeps saying stuff," says Mr. Marenco.

Ortega Gives US The Jitters (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090725

On a steamy night in Managua, a young man with a gaunt face and wispy moustache walks over to a car at a traffic light, draws back his rain-soaked sleeve and, with slow and awkward strokes, draws the letters FSLN on one of the passenger windows. Then he clenches his fist as if victory for his beloved Sandinista party were already assured.

The scene only lasts a few seconds. But as Nicaragua prepares for presidential elections on Sunday, it speaks volumes about the growing feeling that Daniel Ortega, the former leftwing guerrilla leader, and his FSLN Sandinista movement have a real chance of returning to power after an absence of 16 years.

Opinion polls, though inaccurate in other recent elections in Central America, show that Mr Ortega has about 33 per cent of the vote and a lead of at least eight points over his nearest rival. If he could increase that to 35 per cent on Sunday, and maintain at least a five-point lead over the second-place candidate, he would win.

With Nicaragua's population of just 5.2m and gross domestic product of less than $5bn (€4bn, £2.6bn), one obvious question is why any of this matters. The main reason is that the US cares – a lot.

Nicaragua's domestic affairs have always been an intense focus of US foreign policy, and its history is pockmarked by US interventions. But when Mr Ortega swept to power in 1979 in an armed revolution during the cold war, the country – and Mr Ortega – became a virtual obsession in Washington. The US government has spent much of the last decade and a half trying to ensure that he does not return.

His increasingly close relationship with Hugo Chávez, the rabidly anti-US Venezuelan president, has only made relations worse.

The 60-year-old veteran revolutionary has run in – and lost – the last three presidential elections. Little seems to have changed on the campaign trail either: the jingles set to John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" may be new but he still turns up hours late and then makes speeches that last longer than most people would like.

However, there is a widespread perception that years of democratic government have failed to alleviate the country's extreme poverty. Enrique Bolaños, the centre-right outgoing president, is set to leave office with modest growth, declining inflation and strong gross central bank reserves. But even that relative stability has failed to affect ordinary people.

On the streets of Managua, beggars abound and barefoot children splash around in rubbish-filled gutters instead of going to class. A recent report by the education ministry pointed out that this year's budget only provided about $40 in maintenance allowance per school.

Mr Ortega may also benefit from the deep rifts that have divided Nicaragua's parties. The right has split, thanks in large part to the corruption scandals surrounding Ricardo Alemán, the former centre-right president under house arrest for corruption.

Indeed, Eduardo Montealege of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance (ALN), Washington's preferred candidate, and José Rizo of Mr Alemán's Liberal party (PLC) have spent the campaign fighting each other rather than doing battle with Mr Ortega.

The left has also split – although not as drastically as the right. The breakaway Sandinista Renovation Movement (MRS) led by Edmundo Jarquín, a former official at the Inter-American Development Bank, could get at least 10 per cent of the vote.

Mr Ortega has tried to widen his support by bringing in faces traditionally associated with the opposition and moving to the right on many issues. Jaime Morales, his vice-presidential candidate, was a member of the so-called Contra rebels, who fought a long and bloody war against Mr Ortega in the 1980s and were illegally bankrolled by Washington.

Mr Ortega has campaigned with a substantial dose of anti-US rhetoric, and has even mentioned renegotiating aspects of Cafta, the trade agreement that came into force this year between Central America, the Dominican Republic and the US.

But he has also been quick to distance himself from the radical Sandinista policies of the past, such as confiscation of private property and obligatory military service. In a move that shocked many people, he recently even helped approve a law that makes it illegal for pregnant women facing life-threatening complications or victims of rape to have an abortion.

The US is in no doubt that outright victory for Mr Ortega on Sunday would be disastrous for Nicaragua, and has warned that it would also give Mr Chávez a foothold in the region.

But Carlos Fernando Chamorro, editor of the weekly Confidencial newspaper and son of Violeta de Chamorro, the former centre-right president who beat Mr Ortega in 1990, is less concerned. He argues Mr Ortega is a pragmatist and that means not doing anything too radical to upset the US. He also says that Mr Ortega would face a deeply divided National Assembly.

DOJ_NMG_0090726

Nicaraguan Vote Links Past, Present U.S. Foes (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist leader of Nicaragua, could join a wave of leftists coming to power in Latin America if he wins his country's presidential election Sunday.

A victory by Ortega would be the second this year for a leftist in Latin America. Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won a second term last month. Other leftist leaders: Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez and Evo Morales of Bolivia.

Ortega's history of confrontation with the United States and support from Chávez have turned a national election into an international confrontation. Chávez is a fierce critic of President Bush who says the United States is interfering in the region.

Though Ortega, 61, leads in pre-election polls, he might not get enough votes Sunday to win outright. To win, a candidate must get 35% the vote and have a 5-percentage-point advantage over the closest runner-up. Otherwise, the top two candidates advance to a runoff election in mid-December.

A poll by M&R Consultores published Oct. 27 showed Ortega and his Sandinista National Liberation Front with 33% support. The U.S.-favored candidate, Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, had 25%. The poll of 4,501 potential voters had a margin of error of +/-1.5 percentage points.

Ortega is positioning himself as a reformed revolutionary. Wednesday, he pledged to promote the private sector and build on free-trade agreements. To support his theme of unity, he has enlisted a former archrival as his running mate.

Montealegre and fellow conservative Jose Rizo of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party, in third place in polls, have made the need to defeat Ortega a key message of their campaigns. The candidates are trying to woo voters still waiting for market reforms to improve conditions for Nicaragua's 5.14 million people. According to the CIA, Nicaragua is one of the Western Hemisphere's poorest nations and has one of the world's most unequal distributions of income.

Ortega's candidacy has not only raised the hackles of the United States, but it also elicited memories of Nicaragua's civil war of the 1980s, which pitted Ortega's Soviet-backed Sandinista government against U.S.-backed contra rebels.

The Reagan administration's effort to topple the Sandinistas became part of the Iran-contra scandal: The administration secretly sold arms to Iran and used the proceeds to fund and arm the contras.

The civil war killed about 50,000 people. It ended in 1990, when a U.S.-backed candidate, Violeta Chamorro, was elected president.

The United States has been outspoken in its desire to see Ortega lose. U.S. Ambassador Paul Trivelli has questioned Ortega's commitment to democracy.

On a visit here last month, Oliver North, the former White House aide at the heart of the Iran-contra controversy, warned that a vote for the Sandinista leader would mean a return to conflict.

"If (someone else) were running for president of Nicaragua and said, 'I am a friend of Fidel Castro and Hugo Chávez, and I oppose U.S. policy,' that would be enough to create some friction, to put it mildly," says Otto Reich, a senior official in the Reagan administration. "The fact of history compounds the problem."

Sitting in his office next to Ortega's home, Bayardo Arce, a top Sandinista party member, says the United States will continue to be the country's principal market if his party wins. But he adds that Nicaragua also will reach out to the rest of Latin America.

That interest in inter-Latin American relations has been highlighted by a deal struck by the Sandinistas with Venezuela to provide discounted oil to alleviate Nicaragua's energy crisis. For the past year, Nicaraguans have suffered regular blackouts, in part because of the high cost of oil. The Venezuelan deal has been criticized by opponent Montealegre and outgoing President Enrique Bolaños as a vote-getting ploy.

Dionisio Marenco, mayor of the capital, Managua, an Ortega ally and a leader of the fuel program, denies a political motive. "If the same offer were given on these terms by Bush, or by (Mexican President Vicente) Fox, or anyone in Saudi Arabia or the Sultan of Brunei, I'd take it," he says.

Nicaraguan voters, meanwhile, are divided. Some former contras are siding with Ortega. His running mate is his former contra archrival, Jaime Morales.

DOJ_NMG_0090727

Mario Romero, 38, a taxi driver, has Montealegre bumper stickers all over his car. He fought in the Sandinista army, and his brother was killed in the war. “Ortega?” Romero says. “Never again.”

Ortega Poised To Take Helm In Nicaragua (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Months of campaigning for Nicaragua's presidency has ended in a flurry of fireworks and flowery rhetoric from supporters of Daniel Ortega, the one-time Sandinista leader and Washington headache who appears poised for a comeback on Sunday.

Thousands of Ortega supporters paraded through the streets of Managua this week, waving banners for his Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) and sporting his "pink tide" hats espousing a return to the party's leftist ideals.

But the modern-day Mr. Ortega -- a balding, pudgier version of the young firebrand who led the overthrow of the Somoza family dictatorship in 1979 -- appears to have mellowed a bit, and in doing so, has garnered just about enough support to win Sunday's election without a runoff.

Aged 60, the FSLN leader who during the 1980s presided over the Sandinista fight against the U.S.-funded Contra rebels now preaches "unity for a triumphant Nicaragua" and has embraced his one-time rivals.

His running mate is none other than Jaime Morales Carazo, a former top Contra political negotiator, nicknamed "the godfather," whose home was seized by the Sandinistas. Mr. Ortega lives there to this day.

Mr. Ortega has also promised to honor the basic principles of the country's free market approach to economic development. In a ceremony Wednesday -- the last day of official campaigning -- he signed an agreement with officials at the Ministry of Commerce pledging to respect its 10-point approach to rectifying the financial woes of the region's poorest countries.

Along with embracing his political adversaries and cozying up to economic officials, the media-savvy Mr. Ortega knows the importance of playing to the country's poor, telling Nicaraguans they have been reduced to "beggars" during the last 16 years of democratic rule.

All that has pushed Mr. Ortega to the top of a crowded field. Recent polls show him just shy of securing enough votes to win outright on Sunday.

To avoid a second election, a candidate must garner 35 percent of the vote and be at least five percentage points ahead of the next leading candidate.

Some analysts are predicting a first-round win for Mr. Ortega, while others think he will fall short, forcing a runoff between the two top vote-getters in December.

"Polling in Nicaragua is rarely accurate and always a 'work in progress,' " noted Manuel Orozco, an analyst with the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue.

If he can't secure a victory in the first round, then Mr. Ortega would face a tough battle against either Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre, who split from the ranks of the ruling Liberal Constitutional Party (PLC) to form his own party, or former vice president and PLC candidate Jose Rizo. Mr. Montealegre has the support of the United States.

Edmundo Jarquin, a former economist with the Inter-American Development Bank who heads a dissident social democratic campaign that rivals the FSLN on the left, poses little threat to the FSLN leader, but he could siphon off just enough votes to deny Mr. Ortega a first-round victory.

But Mr. Ortega's opponents aren't ready to concede defeat.

"It's going to be a very close race," said Terencio Garcia, a lawyer in Managua who is an adviser to the Rizo campaign. He predicted that the PLC candidate would emerge from the first round and contest Mr. Ortega for the presidency next month, provided the Sandinista doesn't resort to "dirty tricks" on election day.

Mr. Rizo has the added burden of the U.S. support for Mr. Montealegre.

Thousands of electoral officials from Nicaragua, the Carter Center, headed by former President Jimmy Carter, and the European Union, will be on hand to monitor every polling station. A national fraud, said one electoral observer, would be "highly unlikely with the number of people that will be watching the ballot boxes."

DOJ_NMG_0090728

"Ortega was ripe for being denied [the presidency]," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, noting the former leader has already lost the last two presidential elections. "Now, if he wins, there's no telling what he's going to do."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz, Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

China defense budget

The Pentagon has had two rounds of discussions with the Chinese military on the defense budget process, with the United States explaining in detail how its military spending works and China revealing very little about its secret military budget.

Chinese military officials met Pentagon officials in June and provided a very limited explanation of the process Beijing uses to support its weapons and forces.

"We're trying very hard to get an exchange of experts on the budgeting process so that we can understand how they create their budgets, since this is an area where we have a very large disagreement with them," a senior defense official said.

China is engaged in a major military buildup but will not disclose the amounts or systems it is building. The budget secrecy, among other factors, has prompted the Pentagon to start a major force buildup in the Pacific as a "hedge" against China emerging as a threat.

U.S. officials traveled to China in December to explain how U.S. budgets are created, including details such as line items for life-cycle costs of weapons systems or costs for bases.

The Chinese did not reciprocate and in June provided "a lesser level of detail" on its budget, the official said. "But at least it was the beginning of a discussion about how the two budget processes are fundamentally different," the official said.

The Chinese did not explain how much it costs them to build a Russian-designed Su-27 bomber and limited the briefing to principles they use to guide budgeting, a second official said.

China does not include its foreign arms purchases, which in recent years have included billions worth of Russian, European and Israeli weapons. It also does not include budget costs for its space program, which the military runs, or funding for numerous research institutes that make military satellites, another costly procurement item, the senior official said.

"We are right now at that very process level with them," the official said. "We don't know if they're going to be willing to engage us at the next level but we're going to try."

Chinese officials complained last year that the Pentagon exaggerated Beijing's military spending in the annual report to Congress.

The latest report states that Chinese military spending is so secret that Pentagon estimates are off by 20 percent to 180 percent of what the Chinese are actually spending.

China claims its latest annual defense budget, which has been growing by double-digit percentages over the past decade, is about $35 billion. The Pentagon estimates it is $105 billion or more.

Chinese officials insist the Pentagon is overestimating defense costs. But some Pentagon officials said the Chinese budget talks are part of a Beijing deception program aimed at minimizing the aggressive arms buildup.

Somalia war clouds

A former military specialist with close ties to the Horn of Africa tells us the situation in Somalia is getting worse after the rise of the terrorist-linked Islamic Courts Union (ICU). The ICU earlier this year took over major portions of the country and is seeking to impose Islamist rule.

The opposition Somali government in Baidoa is said to be in danger of being defeated in the next few weeks.

The U.S. Central Command and the Special Operations Command are closely watching the country but so far have not been taking major action to prevent the creation of a new terrorist base in Somalia.

According to the former military official, there are six senior al Qaeda operatives in Somalia working with the ICU. Additionally, Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorists are in the country, also backing the ICU. Iranians are said to be in Somalia as well, eyeing a large uranium ore deposit in the south.

DOJ_NMG_0090729

The government in Baidoa is being backed by thousands of Ethiopian troops now in Somalia. U.S. support should be provided, including weapons, advice and "a bit of intelligence," thesource says.

Global Strategies Group, a private security firm, this week sent a warning notice to nongovernment organizations that opposing forces in Somalia are getting ready for conflict and that "the situation is very tense."

Talks in Khartoum between faction representatives broke down yesterday, and the ICU is demanding that all Ethiopian troops leave Somalia.

"It is assessed that if conflict does erupt, it will be with little or no notice and will quickly spread to other areas," acc ording to the notice.

Abizaid's assessment

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the man in charge of the bulk of fighting in the war on Islamic extremists, sat down with defense reporters recently to size up the conflict. A few salient points:

•"I believe that our strategy for the area can't be to control it. No nation on Earth has ever controlled the Middle East. As a matter of fact if you try to control the Middle East, you'll rapidly find out that the Middle East is going to control you."

•"We need to build capacity, local capacity, to do the institution building to make societies that are going to be more resilient against the broader extremist trends in the area. The extremism is not mainstream. In many ways we're kind of at a point where we could have been if we decided to resist Fascism in the '20s or Bolshevism in the 1900s."

•"The problem is, you know, a lot of [people] have a hard time understanding why it's to our advantage to be out there in the middle of this. And it's to our advantage so that these terrible ideological movements do not become mainstream and start moving us in a direction that can move toward World War III."

Guidebook

The Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., is putting the finishing brush work on a new counterinsurgency manual. But there is no time for rest.

It is beginning work on a more far-reaching field guide that will describe how to conduct full-spectrum operations. One change:Post-war stability operations will be woven into war plans. It's a lessons-learned from Afghanistan and Iraq, where the importance of rebuilding was driven home. A new Pentagon directive puts the chore on a par with the fighting itself.

As the Army sees it, a brigade combat team can be fighting to secure a town in one sector while other brigade soldiers are starting stability operations in a nearby town.

The doctrine is known as FM-3-0, or field manual-3, last updated in June 2001, a few months before the September 11 attacks. Chapters include "the Army and the Role of Land Power" and "Conducting Full Spectrum Operations."

China's Hu Urges Sudan To Seek Solution Over Darfur (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Chinese President Hu Jintao has praised the efforts of Sudan President Omar al-Beshir to bring peace to the troubled Darfur region and urged him to seek a proper solution to the humanitarian crisis.

"The Chinese side admires and supports Sudan in the realization of north-south peace and is willing to participate in the rebuilding," China Central Television quoted Hu as telling Beshir.

"China understands the concerns of the Sudan government on this issue, and hopes that Sudan can maintain dialogue with all sides, adjust its position and strengthen efforts to reach a proper resolution to maintain a stable situation in Darfur and continue to improve the humanitarian situation."

During the bilateral meeting at the Great Hall of the People, Beshir said the situation in Darfur was improving and that his government was seeking the help of the African Union to push forward the peace process, it said.

Beshir is one of nearly 40 African leaders visiting Beijing for a three-day China-African forum starting Friday aimed at strengthening political and economic relations between the two regions.

Darfur is a region the size of France where at least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million been left homeless since a rebellion against the Khartoum government broke out in early 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0090730

The fighting pits the regime in Khartoum and allied Arab militia against Darfur's mostly black African population, which is seeking autonomy for the region.

Beshir's government has been widely held responsible for most of the violence, while fighting between rebel and government forces in the region has intensified, cutting off humanitarian aid to hundreds of thousands of displaced civilians.

Hu's statements come as the United States looked set to pull back from its muscular approach to ending what it calls genocide in Darfur.

President George W. Bush announced a policy review this week after repeatedly failing to obtain Sudanese government compliance with a US-sponsored UN resolution demanding the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur.

"The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said Tuesday.

Beijing has abstained from votes on sending in peacekeepers to Darfur and voiced opposition to UN sanctions on Sudan, which is a key supplier of oil to China.

"We hold that the United Nations should and can play an active role in the settlement of this (Darfur) issue," China's foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao told journalists Thursday.

"But we believe that on the specific measures, the international community needs to respect the rational concerns of the Sudanese government and get the consent of the Sudanese government."

The New York-based Human Rights Watch also Thursday urged China to pressure Sudan into accepting UN peacekeepers, while criticizing Beijing for engaging African nations who are accused of gross rights violations.

"China's policies have not only propped up some of the continent's worst human rights abusers, but also weakened the leverage of others trying to promote greater respect for human rights," the group said in a statement.

China Courts Africa, Angling For Strategic Gains (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 2 — Billboards here show elephants and giraffes roaming the savanna. Traffic has been curtailed, construction sites shut down and even the sky has been tantalizingly, if temporarily, blue.

Beijing has put on its best face to court Africa, “the land of myth and miracles,” as official posters call it. Political leaders of 48 of the 53 African countries, including 40 heads of state, are to arrive this weekend for a huge diplomatic event, the China-Africa forum.

The official purposes of the three-day event are to expand trade, to allow China to secure the oil and ore it needs for its booming economy and to offer aid to help African nations improve roads, railways and schools.

The unofficial purpose is to redraw the world’s strategic map by forming tighter political ties between China, which has the world’s fastest-growing major economy, and Africa, a continent whose leaders often complain about being neglected by the United States and Europe.

“African leaders see China as a new kind of global partner that has lots of money but treats them as equals,” said Wenran Jiang, a political scientist at the University of Alberta who has studied Chinese-African ties. “Chinese leaders see Africa, in a strategic sense, as up for grabs.”

China’s enthusiasm for Africa has raised concerns among many in the West while the United States is distracted by its efforts to curb terrorism, and France, Britain and other former colonial powers exert less influence in Africa than they once did.

China does not follow the international lending standards intended to fight corruption in the region. It has embraced the leaders of Sudan and Zimbabwe, two countries that are under heavy pressure to improve their poor human rights records. Major oil companies have complained that China uses its influence to secure business opportunities for its state-owned companies.

Chinese officials say those concerns are overblown or hypocritical, and they deny that they have a grand scheme to create an exclusive sphere of influence in Africa. But China has nearly $1 trillion in foreign currency reserves, boundless entrepreneurial energy and a strong drive to compete there on its own terms.

DOJ_NMG_0090731

"The Western approach of imposing its values and political system on other countries is not acceptable to China," said Wang Hongyi, a leading specialist on Africa at the China Institute of International Studies. "We focus on mutual development, not promoting one country at the expense of another."

China's economic goal is to secure Africa's abundant supplies of oil, iron ore, copper and cotton at the lowest possible prices, analysts say. Chinese companies view Africa as an open market, neglected by Western multinationals, that they can cultivate with their trademark low-priced goods.

But if the goal is mostly mercenary, not unlike European objectives in Africa 150 years ago, the method is avowedly anti-imperialist.

The forum's slogan — "Peace, Friendship, Cooperation, Development" — underscores China's pledge not to discriminate or intervene. It even invited the five African countries — Burkina Faso, Malawi, Gambia, Swaziland and São Tomé and Príncipe — that still extend diplomatic recognition to its rival Taiwan, though none agreed to attend.

In the long term, Chinese officials say they hope not only that the overture will give their companies an edge in the competition for resources, but also that it will give their diplomats an advantage at the United Nations and other international organizations, where African countries can constitute a powerful voting bloc.

Unlike China's initial push into Africa under Mao, which aimed to support the Socialist governments of postcolonial Africa, the focus is now on commerce.

"China has offered Africa a new model that focuses on straight commercial relations and fair market prices without the ideological agenda," said Moeletsi Mbeki, a South African businessman and political analyst.

"They are not the first big foreign power to come to Africa, but they may be the first not to act as though they are some kind of patron or teacher or conqueror," he added. "In that sense, there is a meeting of the minds."

The event in Beijing, like most big political affairs in China, promises to be long on ceremony and propaganda and short on substance. President Hu Jintao is meeting a procession of heads of state.

The state media have promoted the "three 50s": 50 years of Chinese-African cooperation, 53 African countries, $50 billion in two-way trade (a projected figure for 2006). China Central Television is conducting a nationwide survey to select 10 outstanding African icons. Contenders include Cleopatra, South African diamonds and the Sahara.

Chinese diplomats hint that by the end of the meeting they will unveil a variety of trade and aid concessions. These may include a list of African goods that can enter China tariff-free, increases in aid and technical cooperation and debt forgiveness.

China's trade with Africa is growing faster than with any other region except the Middle East, increasing tenfold in the past decade, to just shy of $40 billion last year. China buys timber from the Congo Republic, iron ore from South Africa and cobalt and copper from Zambia. An estimated 80,000 Chinese expatriates live in Africa, selling shoes, televisions and everything else the world's factory produces.

More vitally, Africa has helped quench China's growing thirst for oil. Angola, which China cultivated assiduously in recent years, has edged out Saudi Arabia as China's largest foreign source of oil.

Sudan, shunned by the West for its genocidal civil war in Darfur, was a net oil importer before China arrived there in 1995. China has since invested heavily in oil extraction, helping Sudan export about $2 billion worth of crude annually, half of that to China.

Beijing's aggressive pursuit of commodities has often been accompanied by generous aid programs, low-interest loans and other gifts that some Western interests say undermine efforts to foster good governing in Africa. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have expressed their concerns that China's unrestricted lending, including a $2 billion credit line for corruption-plagued Angola, has undermined years of painstaking efforts to arrange conditional debt relief.

Some African economists complain, too, that China wants to extract raw materials for industry and then sell manufactured goods back to Africa, a mercantilist pattern that failed to bring sustained growth in the past.

China has also prompted concerns among human rights groups by using the threat of its veto in the United Nations Security Council to protect Sudan and Zimbabwe against international sanctions. The rights groups say China's arms exports to Sudan fuel the conflict in Darfur, which has claimed at least 200,000 lives and has forced more than two million people from their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0090732

"China insists that it will not interfere in other countries' domestic affairs, but it also claims to be a great friend of the African people," said Sophie Richardson of Human Rights Watch. "But that doesn't square with staying silent while mass killings go on in Darfur."

For years, Chinese officials insisted that such concerns were the internal affairs of the countries involved, but they have recently changed their stance somewhat.

Zhai Jun, an assistant foreign minister responsible for African affairs, said last week that the Africa forum would address human rights and good government, and he specifically mentioned Sudan.

"The humanitarian situation in Darfur should be improved," Mr. Zhai said. "We will adopt our own method and use the upcoming summit to do our part."

Even if China does speak out on some rights issues, its basic strategy of engaging African countries on their own terms remains the core of its foreign policy.

Mr. Jiang, of the University of Alberta, said that unlike in the cold war, when China's foreign involvement was motivated by ideology, Beijing now had a commercial strategy as the developing world's biggest beneficiary of globalization to unite with the region most conspicuously left behind.

It will be up to each country's leaders, and ultimately each country's people, to decide how to use the wealth, he said. "From China's perspective the Western powers and Western companies have had their chance in Africa and really nothing has happened," he said.

"China is trying a different approach," he added. "It is saying, 'Let us have a chance.' "

China Elevates Its Economic Profile In Africa (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, November 3, 2006

China's thirst for oil and raw materials is leading to a major expansion of its involvement in Africa. From Sudan to South Africa, Chinese officials and merchants are building roads, handing out generous aid packages and negotiating lucrative business deals.

This weekend, 48 African leaders are expected in Beijing for a China-Africa summit that will underscore the growing links between the world's fastest-growing economy and a continent that has been a globalization backwater.

What's happening in oil fields, copper mines and retail markets across Africa illustrates that China's galloping economy is spurring Beijing to adopt a higher global profile. That means new customers and aid donors for Africa's 54 nations. But it also threatens to saddle already struggling nations with the poor working conditions, fouled environment and rampant corruption that characterize China's anything-goes economy.

"China is taking a realpolitik point of view, trying to secure natural resources to continue fueling its high rates of economic growth. … For Africa, it's a mixed bag," says Todd Moss, senior fellow at the Center for Global Development in Washington.

Last year, trade between China and Africa totaled $39.8 billion, up more than one-third from the year before. Unlike the West, China applies no import fees on products from 28 African countries.

But China's rise has not been without controversy. African shop owners complain that matching the price of their new Chinese competitors is almost impossible.

In July, Zambian workers at a Chinese-owned mine rioted over arduous working conditions. Five were shot and wounded by police in the melee. Michael Sata, the opposition party candidate for president, vowed to expel Chinese traders from Zambia in the run-up to the Sept 28 balloting, which he lost.

China's involvement in Africa is driven by both oil and diplomacy. Today, imports account for 40% of China's oil consumption and are expected to reach 60% by 2020. In response, Chinese oil companies have embarked upon a global search for new supplies. In Africa, they've found them in such nations as Angola, Chad, Congo, Libya and the Central African Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0090733

But the oil fields haven't come cheap, according to Zhongxiang Zhang, a senior fellow at the East-West Center in Honolulu. In January, China National Offshore Oil paid $2.27 billion for a 45% stake in a Nigerian field — $270 million more than a rival Indian bidder offered.

China regards its foreign oil deals as national security investments, so it hasn't shied from paying top dollar. Additional deals are expected. "The Chinese approach is governed by a significant amount of fear and desperation," says Joshua Kurlantzick of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, who estimates China's African oil industry investment to date at $15 billion.

On the diplomatic front, China considers African support at the United Nations vital on issues such as the status of Taiwan and human rights.

China's expansion in Africa also is complicating U.S. efforts to manage African debt relief and punish with international sanctions nations such as the Sudan, where government-backed militias are engaged in what President Bush has labeled genocide.

In 1996, state-owned China National Petroleum acquired its first stake in a Sudanese oil producer. Today, China buys about two-thirds of Sudan's oil exports and is the pariah state's major arms supplier and investor.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, also has resisted proposed sanctions on Sudan.

For African nations, China offers a commercial partner and aid donor that lacks the West's scruples on human rights or government corruption. China has granted preferential loans to 26 African countries, including countries such as Ghana and the Republic of the Congo that have been granted debt relief by the World Bank and IMF.

World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz last week criticized China's lending practices, including the fact that Chinese banks do not comply with a set of social and environmental standards endorsed by 80% of the world's commercial banks.

China isn't backing down. "The World Bank has its own ideology under Wolfowitz's leadership of emphasizing human rights (and) democracy," says Chu Shulong, a foreign policy expert at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "China does not have these conditions."

The Asian giant also is keen to promote its state-led economy as a model for African nations that bridle at the free market gospel of the International Monetary Fund and U.S. Treasury Department.

China's unabashed commercial orientation, however, is ironic considered against its promotion of leftist revolutions in Africa during the 1960s and 1970s. Under Mao Zedong, Chinese officials also promoted socialist solidarity with the continent's post-colonial nations by dispatching doctors and engineers to work on behalf of the poor.

Today, Beijing is festooned with red banners, a major highway is being restricted for summit-goers' private use, and officials talk of a major new aid package to be unveiled this weekend.

But analysts cautioned against exaggerating China's growing role. Moss says many announcements of new deals are never implemented, adding: "There is a lot of hype around the 'Chinese invasion.' "

China Woos African Trade (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

BEIJING

For Chinese officials, this weekend's summit here of more than 40 African leaders is a chance to celebrate Beijing's booming economic ties with the continent.

For Western governments, though, the jamboree highlights a new and troubling source of friction with China: the Asian giant's readiness to bail out African regimes that the US and Europe are trying to pressure into improving their human rights and good governance records.

Behind the handshakes, and the giant billboards from which elephants look down on Beijing's expressways, the summit raises vexing ethical questions about China's role in the world.

In its drive to feed the booming Chinese economy's voracious appetite for oil and other raw materials, the Chinese government has not always been choosy about the African friends it has made - such as pariah regimes in Sudan and Zimbabwe.

DOJ_NMG_0090734

Its indiscriminate glad-handing, though, is frustrating recent Western efforts to use trade, aid, and investment to compel certain African regimes to clean up corruption and dubious ethics.

For their part, Chinese officials say that business is business, and that it is not their job to tell others how to run their countries.

"It is never our view that a country should interfere in another country's internal affairs," Deputy Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said last week. "We've never imposed on other countries our values ... and we do not accept other countries imposing their values on us either."

That principle has guided China's dealings with the world for 50 years, points out He Wenping, head of African studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. "It has played a very positive role in developing Chinese influence," she says. "Developing countries appreciate it very much. It won't change in the near future."

China's business with Africa is exploding; trade has increased tenfold over the past decade to nearly $40 billion a year, making Beijing the continent's third largest trading partner, just behind the US and France. Chinese investment now tops $6.4 billion, largely in oil installations but also in prestige projects such as railroads in Angola and Nigeria, sports stadiums in Mali and the Central African Republic, and Africa's largest dam in Ethiopia, according to Deputy Trade Minister Wei Jianguo. China's president, prime minister and foreign minister have all visited the continent this year.

Alongside Chinese rhetoric about cooperation among developing countries sits the Asian giant's insatiable need for oil and raw materials. Angola and Sudan are China's biggest African trading partners, selling Beijing 25 percent of its oil imports. Within five years, officials here say, that share will rise to 33 percent.

Beijing secured its position in Angola with a $2 billion loan. That windfall came just in time for Angola, which is ranked 151 out of 158 nations in Transparency International's 2005 corruption ratings. Thanks to Chinese generosity, Angola managed to avoid submitting to good governance conditions that the International Monetary Fund was attaching to its financial assistance.

China's investments in Sudan's oil industry, and its payments for Sudanese oil, have also emboldened Khartoum to rebuff United Nations efforts to send an international force to Darfur, where some 200,000 people have been killed since 2003.

"Khartoum can tell the rest of the world" where to go, complains Peter Takirambudde, head of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch. "They've got the cash. China gets a nice deal and in return it undertakes to see no evil and speak no evil about human rights. That's the most dangerous trend."

Beijing insists that it has used its influence with the Khartoum government to try to convince the authorities to accept a UN force. "We are using our own channels to try to bring the parties to a more sensible position" Mr. Zhai told reporters.

Chinese analysts also say that as latecomers to international investment, Chinese state-owned and private firms have been forced to explore markets that Western firms have not already snapped up, sometimes for political reasons.

International aid donors, though, worry that China's scruple-free approach undermines their efforts to improve African governance. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz complained last week that Chinese lenders "do not respect" a set of internationally agreed principles to ensure that loans to African countries fund projects that meet high social and environmental standards, and hoped that Beijing would not follow past Western practices of propping up corrupt African dictators.

Africans themselves are beginning to complain - especially businessmen and trade unionists in countries such as South Africa, where cheap Chinese imports are undercutting local manufactured goods and threatening local firms. In Zambia, anger over poor conditions at a Chinese-owned copper mine - where a Chinese security guard shot three workers in July - colored last month's presidential election campaign.

That incident should serve as "an early warning bell for the Chinese government and companies," says Dr. He. "These economic frictions can become a political issue."

One problem, says Wang Hongyi, an analyst with the China Institute of International Studies - a think tank linked to the foreign ministry - is that "even at home it is hard to supervise private companies." Another is that Chinese companies unaccustomed to strong trade unions or environmental laws at home find them difficult to deal with abroad.

Chinese firms, however, "are judged by the same standards as other international companies that operate in Africa," says Chris Alden, an expert in African politics at the London School of Economics.

DOJ_NMG_0090735

In the long term, he predicts, Chinese investors - both state and private - "will conform to the same positions as other international players because governance issues will be as much a problem for them as they are for other multinationals.

"As China becomes a card-carrying member of the group of leading states, it will move away from its policy of not attaching conditions" to its loans and investment, Dr. Alden suggests. And with Beijing's activities in Africa under increasing international scrutiny, it will be obliged to "untangle and normalize relations" as it settles down to deal with classic donor problems such as debt management and trade disputes.

As it does so, says Mr. Takirambudde, "China will have to develop relations with Africans at large, not just with the top dogs.

"In the short term they can disregard" the behavior of their African partners, he adds. "But in the long term that is not sustainable. Eventually they will be forced to take account of these issues."

Under Fire, South Africa Shakes Up Its Strategy Against AIDS (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Nov. 2 — Departing from years of indecision and, on occasion, denial, South Africa's government is considering a new and sweeping assault on an AIDS pandemic that already includes one in eight of the world's H.I.V. infections.

Every day, 1,000 South Africans are infected with H.I.V., and 800 more are killed by AIDS, the government says. With that backdrop, the deputy minister of health, Noziza Madlala-Routledge, said in an interview on Thursday that a new AIDS strategy to be announced in December might include proposals to broaden the distribution of life-saving antiretroviral drugs, remedy the shortage of health care workers and improve treatment of H.I.V.-positive pregnant women.

The new strategy will be overseen by a restructured national AIDS council charged with halving the number of new H.I.V. infections by 2011.

The issues top a list of what AIDS activists and nongovernmental experts have long called serious shortcomings in the government's AIDS program. In a striking departure from the past, government officials are drafting the plan in close consultation with those same critics, who have long been all but excluded from past considerations.

Ms. Madlala-Routledge said critics "have identified blind spots" that the government, preoccupied with building a new nation, had missed.

"We've definitely reached a turning point in our country, with civil society and government working in concert," Ms. Madlala-Routledge said. "We recognize that the campaign against AIDS needs all of us."

Experts and activists outside the government said they were heartened by the government's new approach, but would wait to see what new programs were announced and how vigorously they would be carried out.

"I don't think we're popping the Champagne corks quite yet," Jonathan Berger, who directs the AIDS Law Project at the University of the Witwatersrand, said this week. "There are still going to be, on certain key issues, quite significant differences of opinion."

The most important change, he said, may be that the two sides are now talking seriously about how to resolve those differences.

Practically, the signal change may be that the government's lightning-rod health minister, Dr. Manto Tshabalala-Msimang, has been sidelined from day-to-day control of AIDS policy.

President Thabo Mbeki ordered the current deputy president, Phumzile Mlambo-Ngcuka, to oversee a cabinet-level review of AIDS policies in September, saying the AIDS crisis "is bigger than any individual, minister or department."

Soon afterward, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang entered a hospital for a respiratory infection, and little has been heard from her since. Her deputy, Ms. Madlala-Routledge, has taken over AIDS issues for the ministry.

To many here, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang's fall from grace is proof of democratic pressures at work. Mr. Mbeki, who once questioned the scientific link between H.I.V. and AIDS, fell silent on the issue years ago after being internationally criticized. Until now, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang was the public face of his government's AIDS policies.

An unrelenting advocate of vitamin and nutritional defenses against H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, she has been widely derided for calling antiretrovirals "poison" and for advocating a diet heavy in garlic, beetroot and other traditional remedies to forestall AIDS. Under her tenure, the government resisted giving pregnant women drugs to reduce the transmission of H.I.V. to fetuses until it was forced by a court order.

DOJ_NMG_0090736

The government has since begun mass distribution of anti-AIDS drugs at major hospitals. But the slow pace of that rollout and Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang's resistance to drug therapies have ballooned into political issues here, where one in nine South Africans — and one in four adults — is infected with H.I.V.

The discontent became evident this year within the African National Congress, the dominant political party, when Parliament's chief whip urged Mr. Mbeki to work "intimately" with AIDS activists in the interest of millions of H.I.V.-positive citizens. And it bubbled over last August at an international AIDS conference in Toronto, where South Africa's national exhibit, featuring baskets of garlic and beetroot, shocked many.

The United Nations' special envoy to Africa on AIDS, Stephen Lewis, denounced the country's AIDS policies as "worthy of a lunatic fringe" before 20,000 delegates at the conference. At the same time, 81 international scientists sent Mr. Mbeki a petition urging him to dismiss Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang.

Since the Toronto conference, AIDS activists and experts say, the government's position has undergone a sea change. Last weekend, the deputy president and the deputy health minister were the marquee speakers at a Johannesburg conference of AIDS activists and public interest groups; both called for a united assault on AIDS.

South Africa's Treatment Action Campaign, an organization of 20,000 mostly H.I.V.-positive AIDS activists, has been by far the most vocal critic of the government's programs. In an interview from Cape Town on Thursday, the group's general secretary, Sipho Mthathi, said there was now "a growing enthusiasm, across the board, around the possibility of what we can do as a country in a united fashion" to combat the pandemic.

U.N. Official Held, Accused Of Graft (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- A senior U.N. procurement officer was arraigned in federal court yesterday, accused of two counts of steering about $62 million worth of contracts to two companies in his native India.

Sanjaya Bahel, 55, was arrested in New York on Wednesday evening, and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan lifted Mr. Bahel's diplomatic immunity at the request of federal prosecutors.

Mr. Bahel is accused by the U.S. District Attorney's Office, Southern District of New York, of steering contracts to an associate at Thunderbird Industries and Telecommunications Consultants India Ltd. (TCIL), which is owned by the Indian government.

In exchange, the associate, Miami businessman Nishan Kohli, sublet to Mr. Bahel an East Side apartment at a reduced rate, prosecutors said, later selling him the condominium for so little that the transaction raised red flags in the building's board.

According to the indictment, Mr. Bahel "granted exceptional access to Kohli, providing Kohli with a line of communication and source for information within the U.N. that exceeded what U.N. vendors could typically expect to receive."

In addition, the procurement official "even canceled bids by competing companies and re-bid contracts in order to give a competitive advantage to Kohli's business interests."

Mr. Kohli was arrested Wednesday night, charged with trying to bribe or wrongly influence the U.N. official.

TCIL secured contracts worth about $50 million to sell the United Nations radio communications equipment, desktop computers, laptop computers and other items, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Thunderbird won a three-year contract worth more than $12 million to provide engineering manpower to U.N. missions, although the contract was never executed, according to the indictment.

The United Nations suspended Mr. Bahel without pay in August amid an investigation of the procurement office by U.N. auditors and an outside company, Deloitte & Touche.

In January, eight U.N. staff members were suspended in connection with the inquiry, some with pay, pending the outcome of an audit by the U.N. Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS).

Of these, four have returned to work, and two, including procurement chief Andrew Toh, are awaiting a resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0090737

Mr. Bahel, who has worked with the United Nations since 2000, has drawn no pay since Aug. 31, when he was charged by the organization with misconduct.

As the chief of the commercial activities service in the U.N. Postal Administration, his most recent position, Mr. Bahel received a salary of $104,000 to $132,000 a year.

Irregularities in his contracting activities were first discovered by an independent committee looking into corruption related to the Iraq oil-for-food program. None of the contracts Mr. Bahel handled was related to the Iraq effort.

After an OIOS inquiry turned up nothing amiss, the U.N. Department of Administration and Management sought an audit by Deloitte & Touche.

That audit, which cost $3 million, relied on OIOS findings but went further to uncover irregularities in scores of contracts.

An even more detailed audit by Deloitte & Touche, which would have looked for additional irregularities or wrongdoing, was canceled after resistance from member states and some U.N. officials.

If convicted, Mr. Bahel and Mr. Kohli face up to 10 years in prison.

More U.N. Corruption (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Kofi Annan has famously described the United Nations as an institution of "unique legitimacy." But when he turns over the Secretary Generalship to South Korean Ban Ki Moon two months from now, he will be leaving behind an organization whose reputation for integrity and competence has never been lower.

The latest scandal is the arrest and indictment this week of U.N. procurement official Sanjaya Bahel on bribery charges. He's accused by federal prosecutors of steering more than $50 million worth of contracts to bidders in exchange for such considerations as a cheap Manhattan apartment. And his alleged misdeeds may have compromised U.N. peacekeeping missions in places like Liberia, Congo and Kosovo, where a U.N. internal investigation says favored contractors were allowed to skimp on employee salaries and pocket the money for themselves.

Last year, Russian Alexander Yakovlev pled guilty in a case involving $1 million in bribes on $79 million in contracts. And earlier this year a U.N. internal probe concluded that more than $300 million worth of contracts may have been improperly handled, either through mismanagement or outright criminality. One person who had a cozy relationship with the U.N. procurement office, by the way, was none other than Mr. Annan's son Kojo, whose role in a firm that benefited from Iraqi Oil for Food contracts has never been fully clarified.

Which reminds us that Mr. Annan's promise of U.N. reform has also gone nowhere. Christopher Burnham, the talented American brought to the U.N. Secretariat to promote reform, is quietly returning to private life. His attempts were mostly stymied by the U.N. bureaucracy and General Assembly, not that Mr. Annan tried all that hard to move its members.

It would be nice to think we can expect better from Mr. Ban. But it is telling that the South Korean Foreign Minister helped secure his new post with blandishments and pledges of aid to some of the Security Council countries that voted on him. Judging from the record of U.N. scandal, he's right to conclude that what really talks at Turtle Bay is money.

Avoiding Calamity On The Cheap (NYT)

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

A much-anticipated study on climate change ordered up by Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain has attempted to calculate the economic costs of global warming. Though necessarily conjectural, the study warns that if we continue on our current course, atmospheric temperatures could rise four degrees or so in this century, producing a hugely disruptive mix of rising sea levels and withering droughts.

This in turn would drain the world economy of trillions of dollars, with social and economic costs on a scale “similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century.”

The study, led by Sir Nicholas Stern, former chief economist of the World Bank, says that the only way to avoid that dismal outcome is to slash worldwide emissions of carbon dioxide by investing hundreds of billions of dollars in cleaner technologies. The report has been criticized for overestimating the consequences of warming and underestimating the costs of mitigation. Still, its basic point seems unassailable: failure to act now will exact much greater penalties later on.

DOJ_NMG_0090738

Developing and deploying the necessary technologies will require a collective global effort. But the world's leading producer of greenhouse gases, the United States, is doing scandalously little. A detailed examination by The Times's Andrew Revkin pointed out that Washington spends only $3 billion a year for all energy research and development. Of this, only a fraction — $416 million, according to the Energy Department — was spent last year on climate-friendly, renewable technologies like wind, solar power, cellulosic ethanol and hydrogen. By contrast, Washington spends $28 billion on medical research and $75 billion on military research.

The administration claims that it is in fact doing more, especially if various tax incentives for cleaner fuels like ethanol are included in the mix. Even so, in an age when people are worried not only about warming but also about the country's growing dependence on imported oil, the federal effort on alternative energy sources is pathetically small.

The Bush administration's lack of commitment to research might not be quite so lamentable if it had been prodding the private sector into investing in cleaner energy. Private capital is not likely to emerge in big enough quantities unless a significant cost is attached to carbon emissions — either in the form of a carbon tax or a mandatory cap on emissions. But the administration has refused to ask Congress to impose either.

Since the dawn of the industrial revolution, the atmosphere has served as a free dumping ground for carbon gases. If people and industries are made to pay heavily for the privilege, they will inevitably be driven to develop cleaner fuels, cars and factories. Most of the industrialized world has accepted the need for either carbon taxes or strict regulation, and Europe has already imposed a cap on emissions from its cars and factories.

Mr. Bush and many in Congress remain steadfastly opposed — still convinced, it appears, that calamity can be avoided on the cheap.

DOJ_NMG_0090739

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Officials See Qaeda Trials Using New Law In 2007 (NYT) 5
Questions About Torture May Slow Trials (AP) 6
Well-behaved Gitmo Detainee Makes Call (AP) 8
Punting Habeas (LAT) 8
U.S. Web Archive Is Said To Reveal A Nuclear Guide (NYT) 9
U.S. Pulls Web Site Said To Reveal Nuclear Guide (AP) 11
U.S. Shuts Web Site That Contained Nuclear Details (WP) 11
Optimism Turns To Anxiety On Curbing Nuclear Arms (WP) 12
Man Jailed For 3 Years Cleared, Set Free Haroon (KMGH) 13
Terror Probe Target Set For Deportation (RMN) 14
Muslim Defense Committee (WXXA) 15
Britain Eases Carry-on Rules (USAT) 15

Homeland Response:

Many Fear FBI's Anthrax Case Is Cold (LAT) 15
Search Begins Again At Trade Center (USAT) 17
Fresh Sorrows At Ground Zero (opinion) (NYT) 18
U.S. Plans To Screen All Who Enter, Leave Country (WP) 18

War News:

Talks Underway For Release Of American Soldier (LAT) 19
Military: Talks Underway To Win Release Of Soldier (USAT/AP) 20
Missing Soldier Believed Alive, U.S. Says (WP) 21
Congress Tells Auditor In Iraq To Close Office (NYT) 22
Bechtel Calls It Quits After More Than 3 Years In Iraq (LAT) 24
As Bechtel Goes (NYT) 25
Iraqi Leaders Try To Keep US At Arm's Length (FT) 26
General Plays Down Discord Between U.S. And Iraqis (NYT) 27
November Off To Bloody Start In Iraq (AP) 28
Baghdad University Shi'ite Dean Slain (AP) 29
Hughes Stands By State's Man In The Mideast (WP) 30
Abu Ghraib Ended Career, A Top General Says (USAT) 31
Pentagon Widens Its Battle To Shape News Of Iraq War (NYT) 31
Seeking Options On Iraq (WP) 33
Afghan Farmers Likely To Match Harvest (AP) 34
U.S. Warhead Testing Behind Schedule, IG Says (WP) 34
Some Opt Out Of Military Options (USAT) 35

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-CEO Gets 12 Years (AP) 36
Former CA CEO Sanjay Kumar Gets 12 Years In Prison (COMPW) 37
Former CA Chief Gets 12 Years In Jail (FT) 38
Former Tech Exec To Serve 12 Years (USAT) 38
Former CA Chief Is Sentenced To 12-Year Prison Term, Fined (WSJ) 39
Ex-Leader Of Computer Associates Gets 12-Year Sentence And Fine (NYT) 40
Kumar Gets 12 Years In CA Fraud Case (NSDY) 41
Two Bond Traders To Leave UBS Amid SEC Probe (WSJ) 42
A Second Comverse Ex-Executive Pleads Guilty (WSJ) 43
Spiegel Ex-Officers Settle SEC Charges In Accounting Case (WSJ) 43
SEC Enforcement Cases Decline 9% (WP) 44

Criminal Law:

FBI Questions Two More Former Aides To Harris (SPT) 44
Former Federal Prosecutor Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering, Conspiracy (FINDLAW/AP) 45
Currin Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges (RN&O) 45
Ex-Fort Campbell Soldier Indicted (LCJ) 45
Santa Monica Police, FBI Raid Homes In Probe Of Animal Liberation Front (LAT) 46
No Ethics Panel Report Before Election (AP-Y) 46
No Memory Expert For Former White House Aide In CIA Leak Case (FINDLAW/AP) 47
Case Against Arson-murder Suspect Called 'Overwhelming' (LAT) 48
Suspect Charged In California Wildfire Deaths (WP) 50
Suspect Pleads Not Guilty In Calif. Blaze That Killed 5 (USAT) .. 51
Man Is Charged With Murder In Wildfire (NYT) 51
Charges Filed In Deadly Calif. Wildfire (AP) 52
Charges Filed In Deadly Calif. Wildfire (FINDLAW/AP) 53
'They Need To Find The Real Person' (RPE) 54
Foreign Lobbies Took The Guise Of Nonprofits (WP) 56
Credit Card Scam Alleged At Joliet-area Hotels (CHIT) 59
Officer Denies Having Sex With Inmates (TALLDEM) 60
16 Arrested In Sweep Of Townsend Street (LAT) 60
LI Gang Member Guilty Of Murder (NSDY) 60
LI Gang Member Convicted Of Murdering Suspected Rival (AP) 61
FBI Cyber Crackdown Leads To 16 Arrests (USAT) 61
3 Americans Arrested By F.B.I. In Identity Thefts (NYT) 62
FBI Nabs Phishers In U.S., Eastern Europe (CNET) 62
FBI Tightens Net Around Identity Theft Operations (WP) 63
Deception Charge Leveled On Defense (WT) 63

S.A. Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession (SAEN)..... 64
Out Of Grief, A New Search For Hope In SE (WP)..... 64
As Release Nears, These Inmates Are All Business (WP) 66
Gang Trial Hangs On Informant's Testimony (WP)..... 68
Threat Is Exaggerated (USAT) 69

Civil Rights:

Democrats Predict Voter ID Problems (WP) 69
Delays Loom In Counting Ballots (USAT)..... 71
Denver To Get Voting Oversight (RMN)..... 71
The Acorn Indictments (WSJ)..... 72
Lawsuit Targets Political Jurisdictions (FRESBEE)..... 72

Antitrust:

AT&T-BellSouth Vote Delayed By FCC (AP) 73
FCC Delays Vote Again On AT&T, BellSouth Merger (MRKTWTCH) 74
FCC Postpones Vote On AT&T's Purchase Of BellSouth (Update2) (BLOOM) 75
Watch Those Data Pipelines (LAT) 76
Microsoft And Novell Agree To Make Windows, Linux Compatible (BLOOM) 76
Microsoft, Novell Reach Accord On Linux (WSJ) 77
Farm Group Asks Justice Department To Investigate CME, CBOT Merger (MRKTWTCH)..... 78
MySpace Investor Sues, Claims Site Unfairly Blocked Links (AP)79
Federal Judge Orders Recordings Turned Over In Toys R Us Antitrust Case (LAW)..... 79
Google In Bid To Halt YouTube Legal Threat (FT)..... 80

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Overfishing Threatens Catastrophe, Study Finds (LAT)..... 81
90% Of The Ocean's Edible Species May Be Gone By 2048, Study Finds (USAT)..... 82
Study Sees 'Global Collapse' Of Fish Species (NYT) 83
World's Fish Supply Running Out, Researchers Warn (WP) 84
Federal Lawsuit Aims To Resolve Gettysburg Waste Clean-up (AP)..... 85
A Mine's Still-Toxic Legacy (WP)..... 86

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Operation Nabs 11,000 Fugitives In Eastern States (USAT) 87
More Than 10,700 Snared In Fugitive Roundup (AP) 88
More Than 10,000 Fugitives Arrested In Eastern U.S. Roundup (BLOOM)..... 89
Massive Roundup Nabs Record Offender Toll (UPI)..... 89
11,000 Fugitives Caught In 24 States (WT)..... 89
Over 1,600 Arrested In Sex Offender Roundup (NYT)..... 90
200 Fugitives Captured In Alabama (BN)..... 91
National Crime Sweep Results In 90 Local Criminal Charges (WVTM)..... 91
'Worst' Fugitives Captured In Sweep (MR)..... 92
Dozens Arrested Locally In 24-state Fugitive Sweep (NORBULL) 93
Fugitives Nabbed In Operation Falcon III (WTNH)..... 93
Roundup Nabs 167 Fugitives In Conn.Police Call Fugitives 'Worst Of Worst' (WFSB)..... 94
Joint Manhunt Nabs 96 Fugitives In Delaware (WILNJ)..... 94
Nearly 11,000 Fugitives Arrested In Sweep (WP) 95
Local, Federal Law Enforcement Officers Sweep 3 Counties For Offenders (SCRIPPS)..... 95
Police Sweep Up Felony Fugitives (TAMPTRIB) 96
Manatee Rounds Up 37 Felons As Part Of Nationwide Sweep (BRAH)..... 97
National Criminal Crackdown Nabs Central Florida Fugitives (WFTV) 98
'Falcon' Joint Crime Sweep Arrests 61 Area Fugitives (GAINS) . 99
Hundreds Of Fugitives Arrested In Georgia (AJC) 99
Midstate Authorities Arrest 87 People Through 'Operation FALCON III' (MACT)..... 99
National Marshal Operation Has Local Results (WALB) 100
Operation Falcon Puts Thousands Behind Bars (WTOC)..... 101
Operation Falcon Swoops Into Louisville (WHAS) 101
Nearly 150 Arrested As Sweep Nets Fugitive Sex Offenders (LCJ) 101
135 Arrested Locally As Part Of Nationwide Roundup (SHREVET) 102
Fugitive Sex Offender Round Up (KPLC)..... 102
187 Maine Fugitives Nabbed In Roundup (WCSH)..... 102
Roundup Snares More Than 10,000 Fugitives (PPH)..... 102
Operation Falcon Nabs 65 Area Fugitives (WHAG)..... 103
Nationwide Fugitive Sweep Nets 433 Felons In Massachusetts (BOSH) 103
Dragnet Captures Almost 11,000 Fugitives, Including 433 In Mass. (BOS) 104
90 Nabbed In WMass Fugitive Hunt (RMA) 104
Close To 500 Fugitives Arrested In Michigan As Part Of A Federal Sweep (DEN)..... 105
Marshals Nab 1600 Sex Offenders (WOOD) 105
Operation Nets Thousands Of Criminals (FREEP) 106
164 Arrested In Mississippi In Fugitive Roundup (AP) 106
164 Wanted Felons Busted In Mississippi (WLBT) 107
'FALCON III' Crackdown Nets 83 In NH (MANUL)..... 107
Operation Falcon Seizes Hundreds Of Jersey's Most Wanted (NSL)..... 108
NJ Among States Targeted In Massive Fugitive Roundup (WINS) 109
870 Suspects Arrested In New York Area Raids (NEWSDAY). 109
Federal Sweep Snares Fugitives (TROYREC)..... 110
CNY Sweep Nabs 132 Fugitives (SYPS) 111
Dragnet Nabs 11,000 (NYDN) 111
20 Sex Offenders Arrested In Area (Rochester Democrat &) ... 112
367 People Arrested In N.C. Fugitive Roundup (WRAL)..... 112
Drive Nabs Fugitives In Carolinas (CO)..... 113
86 Nabbed In Fugitive Manhunt (GREENREF)..... 114
Massive Sting Targets 'worst Of The Worst' (DURHS) 114
Dozens Of Accused Sex Offenders Arrested (WCNC) 116
77 Central Ohio Fugitives Pulled In (COLDIS) 116
Sweep Nabs 584 In Region (ABJ)..... 116
Butler Fugitive Caught In Sweep (HAMJN) 117
Dragnet Snares 108 Fugitives In Valley (DAYDN) 118

DOJ_NMG_0090741

More Than 25 Arrested In Stark In A Nationwide Fugitive Round-up (CANTREP) ... 118
Operation Falcon Snares Felons In Sweep (SPRINGNS) ... 119
Fugitive Roundup Nets 83 (CINE) ... 119
Hundreds Of Area Fugitives Arrested In Nationwide Bust (WEWS) ... 119
More Than 100 Rounded Up In Federal Operation (WHIO) ... 120
120 Fugitives Rounded Up In Region (PPG) ... 120
Fugitives Flagged Here (PHI) ... 121
Sweep Rounds Up Crime Suspects In Area (PAPN) ... 121
Hundreds Of Fugitives Rounded Up In R.I., Mass. (WJAR) ... 122
Nationwide Sweep Nabs Nearly 400 SC Fugitives (WSPA) ... 123
Operation FALCON Sweeps ET Snatching 284 Fugitives In Net (KNOXNS) ... 123
163 Fugitives Here Caught In Operation Falcon (CHATT) ... 124
260-plus Nabbed In Shelby County (MCA) ... 125
Sweep Nets 'worst Of The Worst' (HENSN) ... 125
Fugitives Seized (JCP) ... 126
Law Enforcement Pools Resources To Round Up Fugitives (DICKSH) ... 127
Hundreds Of Local Fugitives Arrested In Round-up Led By U.S. Marshals (WATE) ... 128
862 Fugitives Captured In Middle Tennessee (WSMV) ... 129
'Operation FALCON III' Takes Down Local Sex Offenders (WMC) ... 130
Roundup Captures 11,000 Fugitives (RUTHER) ... 130
Sweep Nabs 59 Fugitives Locally (RTD) ... 131
227 Felony Suspects Rounded Up In Hampton Roads (V-P) ... 132
Law Enforcement Sting Nabs Dozens Of Dangerous Fugitives (WWBT) ... 132
'Operation FALCON III' Nets 227 Felony Arrests Locally (WVEC) 132
National Fugitive Sweep Includes Many Local Arrests (HHD) ... 133
345 Warrants Issued Across State (CHASGAZ) ... 133
Fugitive Task Force Teams Arrest 129 In West Virginia (WOWK) ... 134
Sweep Nets 65 Area Fugitives (MARTJ) ... 134
Leaks About Lawmakers Prompt Warnings (NYT) ... 135
Coach Is Charged In Balco Case (NYT) ... 136
Graham Indicted In BALCO Scandal (LAT) ... 137
Track Coach Trevor Graham Indicted (SFC) ... 138
Graham Indicted For Role In Probe (WP) ... 139
Sprinter's Coach Indicted For Lying To Feds (CHIT) ... 140
Graham Charged With False Statements In Steroid Probe (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 141
Graham Charged With Hindering Probe (SFC/AP) ... 141
Track And Field Coach Graham Indicted (SN) ... 142
Sports Track Coach Charged With Obstruction In Balco Case (NPR) ... 143
Graham Indicted In Steroids Probe (BBC) ... 143
Sheriff, Aides Indicted In Federal Drug Investigation (WT) ... 144
Sheriff And Several Deputies Charged In Drug Trafficking (WP) 145
Virginia Sheriff Indicted In Gun, Drug Case (AP) ... 145
'Disgraceful' Suspects Rounded Up By Federal Agents In Pre-dawn Raid. (ROT) ... 146
Henry Co. Sheriff Arrested On Federal Charges (RTD) ... 148
'Corrupt To The Core' Virginia Sheriff Indicted On Drug And Racketeering Charges (ABC) ... 149
Drug Bust Leads To Huge Police Corruption Probe (CNN) ... 149
Timeline From The Indictment (WSLS) ... 150
Details From Henry Co. Press Conference (WSLS) ... 152
Feds Raid Pot Dispensary Second Time In A Month (RPE) ... 152
Afghan Farmers Likely To Match Harvest (AP) ... 152
Man Gets Life Sentence On Drug Charges (MUCHRONICLE) 153

Immigration:

Tacoma Pastor Deported From South Korea To Face Fraud Sentence (AP) ... 154

Tax:

Snipes To Feds: Let's Make A Deal (EONLINE) ... 154
Senators Criticize IRS Filing Program (AP-Y) ... 155

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Write New Prescription (WT) ... 156
From The Top Echelons, A Look Beyond The Elections (WP) . 158
BearingPoint Could Lose Federal ID Card Contract (WP) ... 159
Infant-Care Rule Cites Immigrants In U.S. Illegally (NYT) ... 160
Health Groups Raise Child Care Fears (WP/AP) ... 161

Other News:

US Productivity Growth Stalls (FT) ... 162
Economic Reports Likely To Complicate Fed's Decision-making (USAT) ... 163
Sales Cool For Most Retailers Ahead Of Holidays Department Stores Continue To Ring Up Solid Increases (WSJ) ... 163
Retail Sales Show Mostly Rich Shop Till They Drop (USAT) ... 164
Dow Slips Again On Retail, Productivity Data (WSJ) ... 165
Fed Official Says Bad Data Helped Fuel Rate Cuts, Housing Speculation (WSJ) ... 166
The Rich Are Getting Much Richer, Much Faster Than Everyone Else (MCT) ... 166
Cheney Tries To Get GOP Base Energized (MN) ... 167
Bush Blasts Dems As He Stumps For Burns (USAT) ... 168
Bush Chides Democrats As Soft On Terror (AP-Y) ... 169
Bush Touts Republicans In Billings (BG) ... 170
This Election, Modest Tour For President (NYT) ... 182
Bush Hits GOP Outposts, Dems Optimistic (AP-Y) ... 184
Bush Cites Chief Justice In Vote Rally (AP-Y) ... 185
On Final Campaign Swing, Bush Visits Deep Red Territory (WP) 186
Bush Speaks To Core Voters' Fears In Bid To Ignite Conservative Base By JOHN D. MCKINNON (WSJ) ... 186
Republican-friendly States Get Bit Of Bush Before Vote (WT) . 187
Kerry's '72 Army Comments Mirror Latest (AP-Y) ... 188
Insulting Our Troops, And Our Intelligence (NYT) ... 189
Rep. Paying Ex-mistress About $500K (AP-Y) ... 190
Ethics Questions Haunting Races Of Democrats, Too (NYT) ... 190
Menendez Seeks To Bury Image Of A Shady Dealer (WP) ... 192
First Lady Pitches For Roskam, McSweeney, Topinka (CHIT) . 193
Evangelicals' Faith In Republicans Wavers (FT) ... 194
On The Religious Right, An Alliance Torn Asunder (WP) ... 195
Church Leader Resigns After Gay Sex Claim (WP) ... 196
Church Leader Resigns Amid Gay Sex Claim (CHIT/AP) ... 197

DOJ_NMG_0090742

Connecticut Seats May Be Key To Control (USAT) 198
Campaign '06: In Final Days, Parties Dream Of Senate Upsets (TIME) 199
Vitriol Fills The Air And Airwaves As Allen And Webb Battle On (WP) 199
Webb Goes Big As Allen Stays Local (WT) 201
Allen, Webb Turn Focus To Ground Game (WT) 202
In Virginia Race, Women May Be The Decider (NYT) 203
Stem Cells A Wild Card In Missouri Senate Contest (CSM) 204
Actor Tackles Emotional Political Role (BSUN) 206
Cardin Rallies Blacks In PG (WT) 207
Steele Would Help Change Capital's Culture (BSUN) 208
Little Seems Secure About Security Tapes (LVS) 208
Gibbons Asks Ethics Panel's Opinion On Cruise Gift By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ) 210
Police Union Demands Mayor's Records (BSUN) 210
Parties Start Frantic Final Push For Voters (USAT) 211
Inside The Beltway (WT) 212
Campaigns Set For TV Finale (WP) 213
Nasty Ads Close Out A Mud-caked Campaign (USAT) 215
Recent Gains In Shaky Races Have Heartened GOP (LAT) 216
Faded Contract Republican Rebels Of '94 Now Face Their Own Revolt Promises To Balance Budget And Shrink Government Lost Steam In Congress Assailing 'Influences Of Power' (WSJ) 217
Ranks Of Independent Voters Rising (AP-Y) 219
Election '06 Wild Card: 'Indies' (CSM) 220
Newspapers: Election Advice Or Kingmaking? (USAT) 221
A Duel, But Not Decisive (WP) 221
Blues Project: Depressed Voters Roll The Dice (WSJ) 222
How Low Will Bush Go? (WP) 223
Deborah Walsh And Ellen Malcolm (CSM) 224
Hollywood Leans Right, Too (LAT) 225
Three For Maryland (WP) 226
Weighing Minimum Wage Hikes (WSJ) 226
The Democrats And Defense (WP) 228
Federal Censorship Commission? (WSJ) 229
The Second Election Without Soft Money Suggests That 2004 Was Not A Fluke (WP) 230
US Envoys To Visit Asia To Prepare North Korea Nuclear Talks (AFP) 231
U.S. Speeds Attack Plans For North Korea (WT) 232
Six-Party Fever (WSJ) 233
Iran Revolutionary Guards Hold War Games After U.S. Exercise (NYT) 233
Iran Test-fires Longer Range Missile (AP) 234
Iran Fires Longer-range Missiles, To West's Dismay (AFP) 235
Iran Fires Missiles In War Games (FT) 236
Six Major Powers To Resume Talks On Iran Sanctions Friday (AFP) 237
Abbas To Consider Seeking New Elections (AP) 238
Israeli Troops Kill 6 Palestinians In Second Straight Day Of Fighting In Gaza Farming Town (NYT) 239
Syria Denies Plan To Topple Lebanon Govt. (AP) 239
Threat Deepens Lebanon Political Crisis (AP) 240
Somali Extremists Threaten Bombings (AP) 241
U.S. Urges Caution In Kenya, Ethiopia (WT) 242
EU Cancels Talks Between Turkey, Cyprus (AP) 242
Vietnam To Prosecute Three U.S. Citizens In Terrorism Case (WP) 243
A Cold War Ghost Haunts Elections In Nicaragua (WSJ) 244
Ortega Gives US The Jitters (FT) 245
Nicaraguan Vote Links Past, Present U.S. Foes (USAT) 246
Ortega Poised To Take Helm In Nicaragua (WT) 247
Inside The Ring (WT) 248
China's Hu Urges Sudan To Seek Solution Over Darfur (AFP) 249
China Courts Africa, Angling For Strategic Gains (NYT) 250
China Elevates Its Economic Profile In Africa (USAT) 252
China Woos African Trade (CSM) 253
Under Fire, South Africa Shakes Up Its Strategy Against AIDS (NYT) 254
U.N. Official Held, Accused Of Graft (WT) 255
More U.N. Corruption (WSJ) 256
Avoiding Calamity On The Cheap (NYT) 256

DOJ_NMG_0090743

TERRORISM NEWS:

Officials See Qaeda Trials Using New Law In 2007 (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 — The Pentagon expects to begin conducting the first war crimes trials at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, under the new military commission law by summer, senior military officials have said.

But the trials will not involve any of 14 senior Qaeda operatives recently sent to Guantánamo from secret C.I.A. custody, the officials added. Instead, military prosecutors are planning to roll out the new system by trying some of the 10 people previously charged with lesser crimes whose earlier trials were aborted when the Supreme Court struck down the previous system of military commissions as unlawful.

Prosecutors have recently begun reviewing the records in the cases of the more important prisoners, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, said to have been the chief planner of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The chief prosecutor, Col. Morris D. Davis of the Air Force, said in an interview that those cases would be "huge and complex" and would involve a team of Justice Department lawyers as well as F.B.I. agents.

Colonel Davis would not speculate on when those cases would be ready for trial.

Other Pentagon and Justice Department officials said it could be well into 2008, at the earliest, before the men believed to have been the high command structure of Al Qaeda sat in the dock at Guantánamo, where they will almost certainly face the death penalty.

The anticipated dates for the resumption of the trials at Guantánamo, the first war crimes trials conducted by the United States since the end of World War II, is far slower than the pace suggested by President Bush and many who supported the measure that Congress approved to authorize the new proceedings.

Officials say no trials can proceed — indeed, no charges will be issued — until the Office of Military Commissions in the Pentagon produces a new operations manual for war crimes trials.

The manual will list the elements the government needs to prove to convict a detainee for each of the possible crimes to be charged. The trials of the senior Qaeda figures may evoke images similar to those depicted in the photographs of the Nuremberg tribunals, with defendants arrayed alongside one another in the courtroom wearing headphones for the translation of the proceedings.

Officials said some Guantánamo defendants would be tried as a group facing the same wide-ranging conspiracy charges.

Pentagon planners have been discussing building a larger courthouse at Guantánamo with a new courtroom large enough for a trial with multiple defendants. The new building would replace the current courtroom, a converted dental clinic.

Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, the Air Force officer who is legal adviser for the commissions, said recently that he expected the new operations manual to be completed by Dec. 31.

At a recent conference on military commissions at the George Washington University Law School, General Hemingway said it seemed more sensible to begin using the manual and the new law first for some cases in the pipeline.

The Pentagon had been criticized for the first round of hearings in which many of the procedures appeared to be made up by military judges as they went along. The new manual of procedures is aimed at eliminating the problem.

Colonel Davis, the chief prosecutor, said although his office would be required to draft a new set of charges for defendants whose trials had started, their cases would be the easiest.

"Even though we'll be starting over," he said, "we won't be starting over from scratch."

As for the high-level prisoners, the colonel said, "We will be starting just about from scratch."

He added that some preliminary work had been conducted and that some teams had been assigned to individual defendants.

Outside the military, a considerable debate is occurring on any decision to proceed slowly with prisoners like Mr. Mohammed.

Mary Jo White, the former United States attorney in Manhattan who has successfully prosecuted terrorism cases in civilian courts, said she hoped that the government was aware of how much the nation's reputation was at stake and how much it suffered from the flawed first attempt at military tribunals. "The presumption is against it being a fair process, in part because of what went on before," Ms. White said in an interview. "You can get justice out of these commissions, but now we've got a lot to prove."

DOJ_NMG_0090744

She said that the best way would be to "finally bring the heavy-duty players to justice, those responsible for 9/11," and that Mr. Mohammed "should be at the top of the list."

Senator Lindsey R. Graham, the South Carolina Republican who is an expert on military law and was a pivotal player in reaching a compromise on the law, said in an interview this week that he understood why the military might start with lower-level prosecutions.

But Mr. Graham warned that because the trials were explicitly for war crimes, "we should be sparing in who we call a war criminal." He said the defendants tried under the law should be those "engaged in command and control," or the category of war criminal would be watered down.

Of the 10 previously charged defendants, none are capital cases, and the most famous, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, is generally known as Osama bin Laden's driver, although the military points out that he is charged with having a more active role.

Seven of the 10 are charged with conspiracy counts. Just Omar Khadr is charged with murder, accused of killing two American soldiers with a hand grenade. Because Mr. Khadr was 15 at the time, prosecutors are not seeking the death penalty.

In contrast, Colonel Davis said, Mr. Mohammed could, in theory, be charged with the murders of more than 2,700 people on Sept. 11.

"He is liable for the actions he set in motion," Colonel Davis said.

One of the most vexing issues in the new procedures involves rules for evidence obtained through coercion or torture. The law prohibits evidence obtained from torture, but generally allows the trial judge to decide in other cases if it is useful.

Col. Dwight H. Sullivan of the Marines, the chief defense lawyer for the commissions, said that those provisions might be well intentioned but that enforcing them was almost certain to be impossible.

"If you don't have any meaningful prohibition against the admission of hearsay evidence," Colonel Sullivan said, "then evidence obtained by torture can be laundered."

"You need to peel back the layers," he added, but that effort will surely run up against the difficulties of dealing with classified information.

The defendants will not meet Colonel Sullivan or his assistant prosecutors until after they have been charged, which might not be until late next year.

Questions About Torture May Slow Trials (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 2, 2006

Riddled with legal gray areas, U.S. military trials for 14 high-level terror suspects and other detainees could bog down over questions about the CIA's interrogation tactics.

Military judges have wide freedom to define what is torture. And defense lawyers pledge to put on trial the government's treatment of detainees, particularly mock drownings and other practices banned by international treaties.

This week, attorneys for dozens of the detainees asked a federal appeals court to strike down key portions of the new military trials law, arguing the prisoners otherwise would be locked out of the regular judicial system.

"These prosecutions will be a nightmare of procedural issues and disagreements," said Stephen Saltzburg, a law professor at George Washington University who specializes in military justice. "I think military judges are going to be surprised by how many issues come up."

The Defense Department is moving to prosecute more than 70 of the estimated 435 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in trials beginning as early as next spring. Officials have already selected 10 detainees for prosecution, and expect to charge another 14 high-level suspects recently transferred by President Bush from CIA custody.

The group includes Abu Zubaydah, believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells, and Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Both have revealed information in CIA interrogations that reportedly involve forced nudity, stress positions and mock drowning known as waterboarding.

Under the law signed by Bush last month, the government is barred in tribunals from using any evidence stemming from torture. The law also prohibits evidence from "cruel and inhuman treatment" if it was obtained on or after Dec. 30, 2005, when Congress enacted the Detainee Treatment Act.

But coercive evidence obtained before that date could be admitted if a military judge deems it reliable and relevant. Legal experts say that gives the judges broad discretion since the law doesn't define torture and almost all the evidence predates December 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0090745

"Notwithstanding what Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain say about waterboarding being clearly prohibited, the devil is in the details," said Duke law professor Scott Silliman. He noted that Vice President Dick Cheney recently argued that tactics involving a "dunk in water" weren't torture.

Silliman, a former military lawyer, said he expects almost all the evidence obtained before Dec. 30, 2005, to be admitted under the new law. While this might boost chances for successful prosecutions of suspected terrorists, it could expose unseemly details of shadowy interrogation practices conducted by the CIA.

"Public opinion, particularly international opinion, will play a factor in whom they choose to prosecute," he said.

Among those the Pentagon has declined to say would be tried is Mohammed al-Qahtani, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11 attacks. Captured in December 2001 along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, the Saudi wouldn't crack under normal questioning, so Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld approved harsher methods.

After FBI agents raised concerns, military investigators began reviewing the case and in July 2005 said they confirmed abusive and degrading treatment that included forcing al-Qahtani to wear a bra, dance with another man, stand naked in front of women and behave like a dog.

While the Pentagon determined "no torture occurred," the findings were aired in high-profile congressional hearings in 2005 that drew intense scrutiny from human rights groups. A new U.S. Army manual released in September — which doesn't apply to the CIA — now bans torture and degrading treatment, for the first time specifically mentioning forced nakedness, waterboarding and other tactics.

"Al-Qahtani is one who would cause us embarrassment if he is tried," Silliman said.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon, said he could not comment on specific cases such as al-Qahtani's unless they are formally charged. He said prosecutions will be made "based on the facts and the law."

"We are giving the most egregious terror suspects, those accused of law of war violations, their day in court," he said.

Wells Dixon, an attorney for the Center for Constitutional Rights, isn't so sure. His group represents many of the Guantanamo prisoners, and they are trying to stop the military trials immediately by getting the new law thrown out as unconstitutional.

One of the law's most controversial provisions bars Guantanamo prisoners from challenging in federal court their indefinite detentions as "enemy combatants." The law instead authorizes three-officer military panels to review whether there is sufficient evidence to justify the detention.

The Center for Constitutional Rights successfully sued twice before over the right of habeas corpus, a basic tenet of the Constitution protecting detainees from unlawful imprisonment. Their efforts prompted Supreme Court rulings in 2004 that said foreign-born terror suspects at Guantanamo could have access to U.S. courts.

The rulings left open the possibility that "a properly constituted military tribunal" might suffice as a substitute. But several legal experts and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who voted for the new law, say the three-member panels rest on shaky legal ground.

In a filing Wednesday, retired judges from both political parties joined attorneys for the detainees in saying the new law "raises grave constitutional concerns" because it would let authorities use evidence that was gleaned from torturing prisoners.

The Justice Department has until Nov. 13 to respond in the case, which is pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

"One of the issues litigated will be whether certain techniques constitute torture," Dixon said. "I fully expect we will learn that many of the detainees who are held in secret prisons are subjected to waterboarding, prolonged isolation and perhaps forced medication."

"We will put the United States on trial for this," he said.

In a sign of that emerging strategy, lawyers for alleged al-Qaida suspect Jose Padilla asked a federal judge in Miami last month to dismiss his terrorism case in criminal court, arguing that he was tortured and force-fed psychedelic drugs at a U.S. military brig for more than three years.

"The torture took myriad forms, each designed to cause pain, anguish, depression and ultimately, the loss of will to live," Padilla's attorneys said in their motion, citing prolonged sleep deprivation, exposure to extremely hot and cold temperatures and shackling in stress positions.

Michael Greenberger, a former Justice Department attorney who is now a law professor at the University of Maryland, said he believes public sentiment may prove to be the deciding factor as judges sort out the legal gray areas.

"People are going to be all over these proceedings," he said. "The human rights groups are upset. Civil libertarians are upset. You've got the worldwide community looking at this as something coming from outer space. This will not be done under cover of darkness."

DOJ_NMG_0090746

Well-behaved Gitmo Detainee Makes Call (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, November 2, 2006

A well-behaved detainee at Guantanamo Bay was allowed to make a rare phone call to his wife in London recently, his lawyer said Thursday.

Jamil el-Banna, a 38-year-old Jordanian with British residency, had a tearful conversation with his wife Sabah el-Banna for an hour on Oct. 19, his attorney Brent Mickum told The Associated Press. She went to the U.S. Embassy in London to receive the call, authorities said.

"When I heard his voice, I started crying, he cried too," she told a British newspaper, the Willesden & Brent Times.

"He told me that when the prison guards led him away from his camp, he thought he was going to be interrogated again," she added. "He didn't even know he was going to speak to me, so hearing my voice was a complete shock to him."

Hundreds of detainees at the isolated prison camp have been imprisoned for years without ever speaking with their families.

But Mickum told the AP the military allowed el-Banna to make the long-distance phone call on humanitarian grounds because his mother recently died. El-Banna has one of the best behavior records among the detainees at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba, the attorney said.

Because of security concerns, detainees are rarely permitted telephone contacts with family members, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a Guantanamo spokesman, told the AP. He said he did know how many other calls have been permitted.

"The calls are coordinated with the U.S. Embassy, which verifies the identity of the caller," he said.

The detainee's wife declined to speak with an AP reporter about the call.

Mickum said the government initially told him two people would be allowed to speak with el-Banna from the U.S. Embassy in London. But when the attorney pressed to allow all five of the detainee's children to attend, the government said only his wife was invited.

El-Banna, who was arrested in Gambia in November 2002, has been held at Guantanamo since March 2003 on suspicion of associating with an al-Qaida operative. Mickum maintains his client is innocent.

About 435 detainees are held at Guantanamo, most suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. About 120 have been approved for transfer to either their home countries or another nation that was willing to accept them.

Last month, a British court upheld the British government's refusal to seek the release of el-Banna and two other British residents held at Guantanamo. The government argued that it had no duty to defend the interests of residents who were not British citizens.

A total of six former British residents remain in Guantanamo. Nine British citizens were released in March 2004 and January 2005 after the Foreign Office made formal requests to the United States.

Punting Habeas (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

THE BUSH administration has fared miserably with the U.S. Supreme Court when it comes to its more controversial post-Sept. 11 initiatives. That losing streak could be extended now that lawyers for detainees at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba have taken aim at the new Military Commissions Act, which purports to prevent their clients from filing habeas corpus petitions.

If the high court again rules against the administration, President Bush will have himself to blame for obstinately refusing to afford detainees the protection of the Great Writ. But blame also will fall on members of Congress who knew better than to sign off on such flawed legislation. Among them is Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the Senate's purported constitutional conscience.

Congress rushed through the Military Commissions Act before its election break in response to the Supreme Court's June ruling that Bush exceeded his authority by establishing military tribunals without congressional authorization. The court also rejected the administration's argument that it lacked jurisdiction to decide that issue.

In separate 2004 cases, the justices held that both U.S. citizens and foreigners detained at Guantanamo could challenge their confinement. Given that history, Specter warned that another judicial rebuke was coming if the Senate barred habeas corpus appeals.

"Surely as we are standing here, if this bill is passed and habeas corpus is stricken, we'll be back on this floor again," Specter said.

Yet after his habeas corpus amendment was shot down, Specter and 13 other supporters voted for the flawed Military Commissions Act. Specter implied that it was all right for Congress to ignore the Constitution because the high court would "clean it up" on appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0090747

On Wednesday, that clean-up process began when lawyers for some of the hundreds of Guantanamo detainees with pending habeas complaints asked a U.S. court of appeals to allow their clients to continue challenging their imprisonment, despite the Military Commissions Act.

Echoing one of Specter's arguments, the lawyers noted that the Constitution allows Congress to suspend habeas corpus only in "cases of rebellion or invasion." Serious as the terrorism threat may be, it is neither an invasion nor a rebellion.

The appeals court has a choice: either declare the Military Commissions Act unconstitutional or interpret it in a way that doesn't jeopardize pending habeas actions. Either way, the Supreme Court likely will be asked to resolve the issue.

Even if Specter and other supporters of the Great Writ had voted against the Military Commissions Act, it probably would have passed. But the margin would have been narrower if they had been less willing to punt the question of whether the legislation violates the Constitution.

During John G. Roberts Jr.'s confirmation hearings, Specter complained that the high court had appointed itself Congress' "taskmaster." Roberts replied: "I don't think the court should be a taskmaster for Congress. The Constitution is the court's taskmaster, and Congress' as well."

If Congress took its responsibilities to uphold the Constitution more seriously, there would be fewer problems for Chief Justice Roberts and his colleagues to "clean up."

U.S. Web Archive Is Said To Reveal A Nuclear Guide (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

Last March, the federal government set up a Web site to make public a vast archive of Iraqi documents captured during the war. The Bush administration did so under pressure from Congressional Republicans who said they hoped to “leverage the Internet” to find new evidence of the prewar dangers posed by Saddam Hussein.

But in recent weeks, the site has posted some documents that weapons experts say are a danger themselves: detailed accounts of Iraq’s secret nuclear research before the 1991 Persian Gulf war. The documents, the experts say, constitute a basic guide to building an atom bomb.

Last night, the government shut down the Web site after The New York Times asked about complaints from weapons experts and arms-control officials. A spokesman for the director of national intelligence said access to the site had been suspended “pending a review to ensure its content is appropriate for public viewing.”

Officials of the International Atomic Energy Agency, fearing that the information could help states like Iran develop nuclear arms, had privately protested last week to the American ambassador to the agency, according to European diplomats who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue’s sensitivity. One diplomat said the agency’s technical experts “were shocked” at the public disclosures.

The documents, roughly a dozen in number, contain charts, diagrams, equations and lengthy narratives about bomb building that nuclear experts who have viewed them say go beyond what is available elsewhere on the Internet and in other public forums. For instance, the papers give detailed information on how to build nuclear firing circuits and triggering explosives, as well as the radioactive cores of atom bombs.

“For the U.S. to toss a match into this flammable area is very irresponsible,” said A. Bryan Siebert, a former director of classification at the federal Department of Energy, which runs the nation’s nuclear arms program. “There’s a lot of things about nuclear weapons that are secret and should remain so.”

The government had received earlier warnings about the contents of the Web site. Last spring, after the site began posting old Iraqi documents about chemical weapons, United Nations arms-control officials in New York won the withdrawal of a report that gave information on how to make tabun and sarin, nerve agents that kill by causing respiratory failure.

The campaign for the online archive was mounted by conservative publications and politicians, who said that the nation’s spy agencies had failed adequately to analyze the 48,000 boxes of documents seized since the March 2003 invasion. With the public increasingly skeptical about the rationale and conduct of the war, the chairmen of the House and Senate intelligence committees argued that wide analysis and translation of the documents — most of them in Arabic — would reinvigorate the search for clues that Mr. Hussein had resumed his unconventional arms programs in the years before the invasion. American search teams never found such evidence.

The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, had resisted setting up the Web site, which some intelligence officials felt implicitly raised questions about the competence and judgment of government analysts. But President Bush approved the site’s creation after Congressional Republicans proposed legislation to force the documents’ release.

DOJ_NMG_0090748

In his statement last night, Mr. Negroponte's spokesman, Chad Kolton, said, "While strict criteria had already been established to govern posted documents, the material currently on the Web site, as well as the procedures used to post new documents, will be carefully reviewed before the site becomes available again."

A spokesman for the National Security Council, Gordon D. Johndroe, said, "We're confident the D.N.I. is taking the appropriate steps to maintain the balance between public information and national security."

The Web site, "Operation Iraqi Freedom Document Portal," was a constantly expanding portrait of prewar Iraq. Its many thousands of documents included everything from a collection of religious and nationalistic poetry to instructions for the repair of parachutes to handwritten notes from Mr. Hussein's intelligence service. It became a popular quarry for a legion of bloggers, translators and amateur historians.

Among the dozens of documents in English were Iraqi reports written in the 1990s and in 2002 for United Nations inspectors in charge of making sure Iraq had abandoned its unconventional arms programs after the Persian Gulf war. Experts say that at the time, Mr. Hussein's scientists were on the verge of building an atom bomb, as little as a year away.

European diplomats said this week that some of those nuclear documents on the Web site were identical to the ones presented to the United Nations Security Council in late 2002, as America got ready to invade Iraq. But unlike those on the Web site, the papers given to the Security Council had been extensively edited, to remove sensitive information on unconventional arms.

The deletions, the diplomats said, had been done in consultation with the United States and other nuclear-weapons nations. Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which ran the nuclear part of the inspections, told the Security Council in late 2002 that the deletions were "consistent with the principle that proliferation-sensitive information should not be released."

In Europe, a senior diplomat said atomic experts there had studied the nuclear documents on the Web site and judged their public release as potentially dangerous. "It's a cookbook," said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of his agency's rules. "If you had this, it would short-circuit a lot of things."

The New York Times had examined dozens of the documents and asked a half dozen nuclear experts to evaluate some of them.

Peter D. Zimmerman, a physicist and former United States government arms scientist now at the war studies department of King's College, London, called the posted material "very sensitive, much of it undoubtedly secret restricted data."

Ray E. Kidder, a senior nuclear physicist at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in California, an arms design center, said "some things in these documents would be helpful" to nations aspiring to develop nuclear weapons and should have remained secret.

A senior American intelligence official who deals routinely with atomic issues said the documents showed "where the Iraqis failed and how to get around the failures." The documents, he added, could perhaps help Iran or other nations making a serious effort to develop nuclear arms, but probably not terrorists or poorly equipped states. The official, who requested anonymity because of his agency's rules against public comment, called the papers "a road map that helps you get from point A to point B, but only if you already have a car."

Thomas S. Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a private group at George Washington University that tracks federal secrecy decisions, said the impetus for the Web site's creation came from an array of sources — private conservative groups, Congressional Republicans and some figures in the Bush administration — who clung to the belief that close examination of the captured documents would show that Mr. Hussein's government had clandestinely reconstituted an unconventional arms programs.

"There were hundreds of people who said, 'There's got to be gold in them thar hills,' " Mr. Blanton said.

The campaign for the Web site was led by the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Representative Peter Hoekstra of Michigan. Last November, he and his Senate counterpart, Pat Roberts of Kansas, wrote to Mr. Negroponte, asking him to post the Iraqi material. The sheer volume of the documents, they argued, had overwhelmed the intelligence community.

Some intelligence officials feared that individual documents, translated and interpreted by amateurs, would be used out of context to second-guess the intelligence agencies' view that Mr. Hussein did not have unconventional weapons or substantive ties to Al Qaeda. Reviewing the documents for release would add an unnecessary burden on busy intelligence analysts, they argued.

On March 16, after the documents' release was approved, Mr. Negroponte's office issued a terse public announcement including a disclaimer that remained on the Web site: "The U.S. government has made no determination regarding the authenticity of the documents, validity or factual accuracy of the information contained therein, or the quality of any translations, when available."

DOJ_NMG_0090749

On April 18, about a month after the first documents were made public, Mr. Hoekstra issued a news release acknowledging "minimal risks," but saying the site "will enable us to better understand information such as Saddam's links to terrorism, weapons of mass destruction and violence against the Iraqi people." He added: "It will allow us to leverage the Internet to enable a mass examination as opposed to limiting it to a few exclusive elites."

Yesterday, before the site was shut down, Jamal Ware, a spokesman for Mr. Hoekstra, said the government had "developed a sound process to review the documents to ensure sensitive or dangerous information is not posted." Later, he said the complaints about the site "didn't sound like a big deal," adding, "We were a little surprised when they pulled the plug."

The precise review process that led to the posting of the nuclear and chemical-weapons documents is unclear. But in testimony before Congress last spring, a senior official from Mr. Negroponte's office, Daniel Butler, described a "triage" system used to sort out material that should remain classified. Even so, he said, the policy was to "be biased towards release if at all possible." Government officials say all the documents in Arabic have received at least a quick review by Arabic linguists.

Some of the first posted documents dealt with Iraq's program to make germ weapons, followed by a wave of papers on chemical arms.

At the United Nations in New York, the chemical papers raised alarms at the Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, which had been in charge of searching Iraq for all unconventional arms, save the nuclear ones.

In April, diplomats said, the commission's acting chief weapons inspector, Demetrius Perricos, lodged an objection with the United States mission to the United Nations over the document that dealt with the nerve agents tabun and sarin.

Soon, the document vanished from the Web site. On June 8, diplomats said, Mr. Perricos told the Security Council of how risky arms information had shown up on a public Web site and how his agency appreciated the American cooperation in resolving the matter.

In September, the Web site began posting the nuclear documents, and some soon raised concerns. On Sept. 12, it posted a document it called "Progress of Iraqi nuclear program circa 1995." That description is potentially misleading since the research occurred years earlier.

The Iraqi document is marked "Draft FFCD Version 3 (20.12.95)," meaning it was preparatory for the "Full, Final, Complete Disclosure" that Iraq made to United Nations inspectors in March 1996. The document carries three diagrams showing cross sections of bomb cores, and their diameters.

On Sept. 20, the site posted a much larger document, "Summary of technical achievements of Iraq's former nuclear program." It runs to 51 pages, 18 focusing on the development of Iraq's bomb design. Topics included physical theory, the atomic core and high-explosive experiments. By early October, diplomats and officials said, United Nations arms inspectors in New York and their counterparts in Vienna were alarmed and discussing what to do.

Last week in Vienna, Olli J. Heinonen, head of safeguards at the international atomic agency, expressed concern about the documents to the American ambassador, Gregory L. Schulte, diplomats said.

Calls to Mr. Schulte's spokesman yesterday were not returned.

U.S. Pulls Web Site Said To Reveal Nuclear Guide (AP)

AP, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's top intelligence official took down a government Web site with captured Saddam Hussein-era Iraqi documents, after questions were raised whether it provided too much information about making atomic bombs.

In a statement Thursday night, a spokesman for National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said his office has suspended public access to the Web site "pending a review to ensure its content is appropriate for public viewing."

The action came after The New York Times raised questions about the contents of the government site, called the "Operation Iraqi Freedom Document Portal." The Times' Web site reported Thursday night that weapons experts say documents posted on the government site in recent weeks provide dangerous detail about Iraq's covert nuclear research before the 1991 Persian Gulf war.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"While strict criteria had already been established to govern posted documents, the material currently on the Web site, as well as the procedures used to post new documents, will be carefully reviewed before the site becomes available again," said Negroponte's spokesman, Chad Kolton.

Pressed by Republican members of Congress, Negroponte's office last March ordered the unprecedented release of millions of pages of Iraqi documents, most of them in Arabic, collected by the U.S. government over more than a decade.

U.S. Shuts Web Site That Contained Nuclear Details (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence said yesterday that it shut down a public Web site after complaints from U.N. weapons inspectors that the site included sensitive details about constructing nuclear and chemical weapons. The documents were collected in Iraq after the March 2003 invasion but predate the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Intelligence officials said the documents do not indicate that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction when President Bush ordered U.S. troops to take over the country and depose Saddam Hussein.

Chad Kolton, spokesman for John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, said the office had "suspended access" to the site pending a review of the documents. "The material currently on the Web site as well as the procedures used to post new documents will be carefully reviewed before the site becomes available again," Kolton said.

The New York Times reported on its Web site last night, and in today's print edition, that the site had been shut down in response to concerns by the inspectors and other nuclear experts. Many of the documents were copies of information Iraq had repeatedly handed over to the United States and other U.N. Security Council members over more than a decade between the two wars.

Negroponte's office began posting thousands of captured Iraqi documents earlier this year at the insistence of Republican lawmakers, who hoped the documents could shed light on Iraq's prewar arsenal.

The documents were posted on a Web site administered by the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency. Kolton said his office will go over the documents with the DIA to determine what can be reposted on the site. U.N. weapons inspectors in New York and Vienna, Kolton said, had complained that some documents could reveal weapons secrets.

"We are confident the DNI is taking the appropriate steps to maintain the balance between public information and national strategy," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council.

Optimism Turns To Anxiety On Curbing Nuclear Arms (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

In the waning days of the 20th century, nearly a dozen countries abandoned nuclear weapons programs, betting on the promised security of a post-Cold War world.

But the trend toward disarmament seems to have tapered off almost as quickly as it began.

In the first six years of the 21st century, one country -- Libya -- agreed to give up the possibility of making a weapon. But North Korea accelerated its program, and many believe Iran is doing the same. More countries are exploring uranium enrichment and nuclear power programs that could be diverted to produce weapons.

Officials and nuclear experts who felt nothing but optimism in the early 1990s now see a world on the threshold of a dangerous arms race. Some fault the Bush administration for policies that rewarded nuclear-armed friends while denouncing foes accused of building the same weapons. Others say the current situation is a natural byproduct of a fragmented world in which countries no longer have to choose between the United States and the Soviet Union, but can go separate ways and build independent alliances.

"I think we are at a dangerous tipping point," said Sam Nunn, the former Democratic senator from Georgia who has devoted years of public service to stemming nuclear proliferation and is co-chairman of the Nuclear Threat Initiative. "One of the reasons we're in this predicament is that the United States government, which had been the main proponent of nonproliferation, appears not to have the clout to build the kind of broad international coalition that dissuades countries from going nuclear."

Since President Dwight D. Eisenhower began Atoms for Peace in 1953, the United States has been at the forefront of nonproliferation strategies, talking friend and adversary alike out of weapons that bring great power but carry the risk of deep isolation. "In the last two decades, the U.S. has successfully turned around a host of states -- Argentina, Brazil, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Belarus, South Africa, Taiwan and South Korea," said Ashton B. Carter, who was assistant secretary of defense for international security policy from 1993 to 1996. "But in the last few years," Carter said, Iran and North Korea "have been allowed to lurch forward."

President Bush in 2002 named Iran, North Korea and Iraq under Saddam Hussein as members of an "axis of evil" pursuing weapons of mass destruction that could be given to terrorists. The prospect of the most dangerous weapons getting into the hands of the most dangerous people led Bush to war in Iraq against a suspected arsenal he did not find.

Meanwhile, Iran and North Korea expanded their nuclear capabilities. Last month, North Korea officially became a nuclear weapons state when it detonated a small plutonium bomb during an underground test. It is Iran, however, that the Bush administration named earlier this year as posing the greatest challenge to the United States. It is a worry shared by many policymakers and politicians outside the government, but it is not the only nuclear concern.

DOJ_NMG_0090751

In the 1960s, nonproliferation was one of the few areas on which there was agreement between the United States and what was then the Soviet Union. France, Britain, China and, experts believe, Israel had joined the nuclear club, and while the Cold War rivals were in the midst of their own arms race, they were also eager to prevent more states from acquiring nuclear weapons.

President John F. Kennedy worried in 1963 that if U.S. efforts were unsuccessful, there could be as many as 10 nuclear weapons states within a decade and the number could double after that. Today there are nine such states. But there would have been more had South Africa, Kazakhstan, Ukraine and Belarus not been among the countries that gave up nuclear weapons after the breakup in 1991 of the Soviet Union.

Michael Levi, a nuclear scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations, said that the collapse of the Soviet Union was a unique moment for nonproliferation, but that "the Cold War isn't going to end every 10 years."

"If you focus on nuclear testing as a benchmark, then you've got three nuclear states in the last eight years -- India, Pakistan and North Korea. But if you go by acquiring nuclear weapons, it would be one a decade," Levi said, referring to North Korea.

North Korea's test has deepened worries of an Asian arms race, with Japan and South Korea among dozens of countries with the technical ability -- known as "breakout" capacity -- to quickly divert materials from their energy programs for bomb-making. Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, calls those countries "virtual" weapons states and noted during a recent talk in Washington that those with the know-how, including Japan and South Korea, could make nuclear devices "overnight" if they wanted to.

"When the Japanese, South Koreans and Taiwanese see North Korea go nuclear and nothing done, they will reconsider their decisions not to go nuclear," said Carter, now a Harvard University professor. Noting that Egypt and Saudi Arabia may change their postures too, Carter said the recent turn toward nuclear weapons presented "the biggest setback to American security in a decade. It doesn't get any bigger than this."

Jon Wolfsthal, a fellow at the International Security Program of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said that in the 1990s, "the pessimists used to be in the minority on nuclear issues, and now theirs is the dominant view."

"The long-term pessimists will tell you the good old days were never that good," he said. "North Korea's program was up and running in the '80s, Iran's program was up and running in the '80s, India's was up in the '60s and people didn't see it because the relative dangers had diminished. We went from a Cold War world where life could end in 30 minutes to one where we had serious but isolated challenges. But now that the dangers of the Cold War really are in the history books, isolated dangers seem much more acute."

Today, Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada and South Africa have begun or have expressed interest in enriching uranium to sell on the world market as nuclear power becomes more attractive to Third World countries. Iran has said repeatedly that its large-scale enrichment plans are designed solely for power generation. Uranium enriched to low levels, as the Iranians have done so far, can be used for fueling nuclear power plants, not for weapons. But the same process, if done at higher speeds for longer periods, can produce bomb-grade uranium. Egypt, Turkey and Algeria are all exploring nuclear power capabilities.

"In a way, it's a very bad time," said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security.

"Egypt and Turkey are already pushing for nuclear power while thinking in the back of their minds they may want the option of a nuclear capability, and all the weapons states seem to be retrenching with their nuclear weapons. But I think it can be reversed. Nuclear weapons are a deterrence but also a bargaining chip."

George Perkovich, a vice president at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said the rise in proliferation threats can only be turned back once the United States, Russia and China figure out a power balance that makes room for each country's interests.

"The one thing we agreed on once with the Russians was that we didn't want any other countries getting nuclear weapons," Perkovich said. "But once you have a unipolar system, does Russia really have the same incentive when countries that are interested in getting nuclear weapons are also interested in limiting U.S. power? Russia and China feel wary of U.S. intentions now, in China's neighborhood and Russia's, so they aren't going to help us on nonproliferation just because it's the right thing to do."

Man Jailed For 3 Years Cleared, Set Free Haroon (KMGH)

KMGH-TV, November 3, 2006

Rashid's Attorney Claims He's Victim Of Ethnic Profiling

DENVER -- He spent three years behind bars but on Thursday, the charges against him were dropped and he was set free.

The question is Haroon Rashid a potential terrorist or was he the victim of ethnic profiling?

DOJ_NMG_0090752

In 2003, Rashid's arrest was hailed by U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft hailed his arrest as a big step in the fight against terrorism.

But it's never been proven that he was a danger to the United States so he's being set free, but is still being deported to Pakistan. His young children are glad that they'll be out of jail, but to see him they'll have to travel to Pakistan.

"It's a happy day and a sad day at the same time," said Rima Barakat with the Muslim American Society.

The family maintains that Rashid, a U.S. citizen, was caught up in the post Sept. 11, 2001 fear about terrorism and targeted because of his name.

He was never charged with any terrorism related crimes but held on a relatively minor immigration violation instead.

"This is not right," said Barakat.

U.S. attorneys maintain that Rashid is dangerous.

"Mr. Rachid had attempted to purchase weapons. He had made statements to the effect of his desire to engage U.S. forces," said Troy Eid, U.S. attorney for Colorado.

Their is also a Haroon Rashid Aswat who was arrested last summer in South Africa. He is believed to be an Al -Quaida member responsible for the London bombings last summer. The family of the man in Denver believes the terrorism task force confused the two men and won't admit it.

"There was never any case of mistaken identity and the reports that you saw about that are absolutely false," Eid said.

The U.S. attorneys office said some of the records remain sealed so it's a matter of who you believed.

Haroon Rashid is actually being deported because of a low-level assault conviction when he said he was protecting his children. His deportation case is now being appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Haroon Rashid Aswat who is tied to the London bombings des have ties to the western united states. In 1999 he lived for a time in Seattle. Prosecutors also said he tried to set up a terrorist training camp in Oregon. The London bombing attack killed 56 people.

Terror Probe Target Set For Deportation (RMN)

By Sara Burnett, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, November 3, 2006

A U.S. District Court judge dismissed charges Thursday against a Lakewood man once targeted in a federal terrorism investigation, clearing the way for him to be deported.

Haroon Rashid, a native of Pakistan who has been a legal resident of the United States since 1995, was transferred to the custody of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement immediately after Judge Lewis Babcock dismissed charges of conspiracy and making false statements to government officials.

Outside the courthouse, family and friends decried the government investigation, saying Rashid was arrested in 2003 because of anti-Muslim sentiment fueled by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Rashid, 35, and several family members caught the attention of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force shortly after 9/11, records show.

After a period of surveillance, a Denver grand jury in March 2003 indicted Rashid and five other family members on charges of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. and making false statements in an immigration case.

The government alleged that the family lied to get another relative into the United States without a visa, then lied about his relationship to the family so he could remain here.

During a detention hearing, federal investigators revealed they had reason to think Rashid and other family members were a danger to the public.

Among their reasons was that Rashid traveled to the Pakistan-Afghanistan border shortly after the 9/11 attacks and may have participated in a terrorist training camp.

Rashid never was charged with anything terrorism-related, however, because doing so would have tipped the government's hand in other cases, authorities have said.

Shortly after his arrest, Rashid was released on bond. While out of jail, he was arrested again, this time for assaulting a 16-year-old boy in Arapahoe County.

A jury convicted Rashid of that crime in 2004 and an immigration judge later ruled that Rashid should be deported.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said Thursday his office chose to drop the charges of conspiracy and making false statements because Rashid already has served more time in jail than he would serve if he were convicted of those charges.

Family members and friends insisted the charges were trumped up and that the assault occurred because Rashid was protecting his children from gang members. They also said Rashid traveled to the Pakistan-Afghanistan border to visit his family, not to train to be a terrorist.

But Eid made no apologies. "Our office will pursue terrorism investigations wherever they lead," he said.

Muslim Defense Committee (WXXA)

WXXA-TV, November 3, 2006

A group of about 50-people have come together to form the Muslim Defense Committee.

They claim that the government's actions during the investigation into Yassin Aref and Mohammad Hossain were an attack on the Bill of Rights and the civil liberties of Americans. They're asking that the judge give the two men a light sentence.

Hossain and Aref were convicted last month of participating in a fake plot to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists during an FBI sting operation.

Britain Eases Carry-on Rules (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 3, 2006

LONDON — Passengers flying out of Britain will be able to carry small amounts of liquids, gels and lotions, including toothpaste and medicine, through airport security checkpoints starting Monday.

The British government said Thursday that it would ease a ban it imposed on carry-on liquids Aug. 10 after the discovery of an alleged terrorist plot to use liquid explosives to blow up airliners headed for the USA.

Starting Monday, each air passenger can carry on liquids in individual containers of up to 100 milliliters, about 3 ounces. All of a passenger's containers must be placed in a single, clear resealable bag no larger than a liter — just less than a quart — in capacity.

Britain's new rule covers products such as hair gel, sun cream, non-solid deodorant, toothpaste, Vaseline, shaving cream, lip gloss, mascara, nail polish and remover, and other items.

Limits on the size of carry-on bags remain in place, the Department for Transport said.

Passengers can continue to board planes with drinks and other liquids they buy after they've cleared security checks.

The change in Britain brings its rules in line with those at airports in 24 other European Union countries — and at airports in the USA. All 25 EU members have agreed to use a standard set of security rules starting Monday.

Carry-on baggage rules have varied from country to country in Europe. Britain's restrictions were the tightest.

The restrictions put in place after Aug. 10 snarled airports throughout Europe. Additional security measures and passenger confusion caused the cancellation of more than 2,000 flights, hundreds of flight delays and long security lines at British airports in the three weeks after Aug. 10.

British Airways said it lost about $75 million because of the disruptions. Discount airline Ryanair has sued the British government for $6.2 million in damages.

In the months since the alleged plot was foiled, Britain has gradually eased requirements, which prevented passengers from boarding planes carrying anything more than travel documents.

“The security measures introduced at (British) airports in August were in response to a very real and serious threat,” the Transport Department said Thursday. “We have always said that we would keep these measures under review.”

In September, Britain allowed passengers to board with larger carry-on bags and musical instruments. Each passenger flying out of Britain and Europe now can carry one bag no larger than: 22 inches long, 17.7 inches wide and 9.8 inches deep.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Many Fear FBI's Anthrax Case Is Cold (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five years after a series of deadly anthrax-laced letters rattled the nation, the FBI has offered no indication that it is any closer to solving the first major act of bioterrorism on U.S. soil, leading critics to speculate the probe has stalled and to question how well federal officials would handle future attacks.

Members of Congress and targets of the attacks — which killed five people between Oct. 5 and Nov. 21, 2001, sickened 17 and exposed thousands of others — increasingly are expressing concern that the FBI-led federal investigation, code-named Amerithrax, has been mismanaged.

FBI officials have stopped providing regular briefings to victims and lawmakers about the investigation. The federal task force leading the investigation has shrunk in half. And it is now on its third leader.

DOJ_NMG_0090754

The credentials of the latest chief may be telling: He has worked on complex international criminal cases that have run cold.

The reticence of the FBI is in sharp contrast to bold predictions the agency made about the investigation in its early days.

"Their public pronouncements about their confidence levels were obviously way off the mark all the way along," said Tom Daschle, the former Democratic senator from South Dakota whose Capitol Hill office was one of the targets of the attacks. "It has sort of been the domestic version of Iraq. They made a lot of assumptions that turned out not to be accurate."

Daschle, now a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, said he asked the FBI about a month ago for an update but was rebuffed.

"Clearly, this whole investigation has gone very cold," he said. "Because it has become so cold, they are all the more apprehensive about acknowledging that they do not have any real good evidence or leads."

A leading Republican, Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, also complained about the lack of new information on the investigation in a letter last month to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales. Grassley is threatening to subpoena FBI officials to testify before Congress or to hold up Justice Department nominations if the agency does not divulge more information soon.

The FBI says its investigation remains highly active. It has told lawmakers that it would not provide any more briefings on the case in part out of fear that sensitive information would be leaked to the media.

"We have a substantial number of agents continuing to work on that case, and my expectation is that it will be solved and that the person or persons responsible will be brought to justice," FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said in an interview in September. "Some cases take longer than others."

The unsolved mystery comes amid growing concern about federal efforts to detect and prevent even more catastrophic bioterrorist attacks. The government has set aside an estimated $18 billion for bio-defense research over the last five years, although it is far from clear what the nation has gotten for its money.

This week, citing the five-year anniversary of the anthrax attacks, a bipartisan group of senators asked the Government Accountability Office to conduct a wide-ranging assessment of the bio-defense program.

Huge investigation

The anthrax attacks triggered one of the costliest federal manhunts ever — starting a week after the Sept. 11 attacks, when letters containing anthrax began coursing through the mail, targeting members of the media and the Capitol Hill offices of Daschle and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.).

The FBI said it had conducted 9,100 interviews and obtained 6,000 subpoenas. It has hired psychologists, handwriting analysts and forensic analysts. It has spent millions on scientific studies to determine such information as the strain of the bacteria and the water used to prepare the lethal spores. And it has tracked a spate of anthrax "hoax" letters; one such letter was received last week by The Times.

Much of the initial public focus was on a medical doctor and virologist, Stephen J. Hatfill, who had worked for two years at an Army lab in Maryland, where the strain of anthrax used in the attacks was once studied.

FBI agents searched his home, took samples of his blood and put him on 24-hour surveillance. Then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft publicly declared him a "person of interest."

But Hatfill was never charged and says he is not responsible for the letters. Now he's fighting the Justice Department and FBI in a lawsuit claiming that they destroyed his reputation.

His lawyers have taken the sworn testimony of more than 30 journalists and investigators in an attempt to prove the FBI illegally leaked damaging information about him. Hatfill declined comment through his lawyer.

The public fingering of Hatfill was the first of many missteps that experts said had afflicted the probe.

"In how many investigations does the attorney general personally go out there and start talking about persons of interest? It should never happen," said Stephen Freccero, a former federal prosecutor. "That was a huge mistake. It was appalling. All the basic rules of a covert investigation were violated."

Freccero, who prosecuted Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski, said that centering the anthrax probe in Washington politicized the case, making it difficult for investigators to independently pursue leads.

The case also has been slowed by the bureau's changing understanding of the quality of the anthrax used. Investigators originally believed the powder was highly refined and could only have been produced by experts with state-of-the-art technology. But the FBI eventually abandoned that idea.

In the recent interview, Mueller said, "From the outset, we have been open to any and all theories, and the investigation continues on any and all theories." But some observers said that the incorrect assumptions about the anthrax may have led the FBI to adopt an unduly narrow focus on potential suspects. According to one former federal law enforcement official, no other clear suspects have emerged in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0090755

"The way they were thinking was that it had to be a scientist at one of these … laboratories," said the former official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he still works for the federal government and the investigation is ongoing. "Now, all of a sudden, you have people who may be hobbyists or … chemists who think they can do this stuff and might have done this stuff."

Some also have criticized the agency for not being more receptive to outside advice. Dr. Ken Alibek, a bio-weapons pioneer from the former Soviet Union, said he had written to Mueller to volunteer. "I said, 'Please keep in mind, I have expertise and I would like to help you resolve this case,' " he said. Alibek said he got a "thanks, but no thanks" letter from a top aide to Mueller. The bureau, he was told, already had "a big group of people working on this issue."

Leadership change

The new leader of that group, Edward Montooth, is the third to oversee the investigation. He declined to comment through an FBI spokesman.

People who have worked with Montooth said he had specialized in cases where Americans were killed overseas, trying to solve crimes in such places as Rwanda and Indonesia. He was on an FBI team that searched for mass graves in Kosovo and also helped investigate war crimes in the Balkans.

"Those cases get cold fast," said a law enforcement official who knows Montooth. "A lot of terror cases overseas can be 10 to 15 years before the case develops to the point where we can get the defendants."

Montooth replaced Richard Lambert, who headed the investigation from August 2002 through September 2006. Lambert said he decided to leave and called it a natural career progression. He now heads the FBI office in Knoxville, Tenn.

Lambert said he was "very confident" the case would be solved.

As the probe enters its sixth year, the FBI is urging patience, and notes that complex investigations often take years to resolve. It has compared the case to the Unabomber investigation, which took 17 years to solve, until the assailant renewed his campaign of terror and a relative turned him in.

On the anthrax section of its website, the FBI promises that its agents "continue to pursue each and every lead aggressively."

Search Begins Again At Trade Center (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, November 3, 2006

NEW YORK — A sad task thought to be long over is beginning again: the search for remains of those killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The city quickly launched the new search after the discovery Oct. 19 of nearly 200 fragments of remains, including a 12-inch bone, in a buried manhole at the edge of the World Trade Center site.

City workers now will sift gravel on rooftops, go down nearly 500 manholes, dig up roadways and explore underground vaults. The work could last up to a year.

The effort comes as remains of three people were identified this week from the initial search. They included flight attendant Karen Martin, who was on the jet that hijackers crashed into the north tower.

The recent discovery — the second time this year that remains were found — has shocked and angered families. More than 40% of the families of the 2,749 people who died have recovered nothing of the relative they lost.

“If this job was done correctly the first time, we'd have more than 2% of my brother,” said Jeanne Evans, sister of firefighter Robert Evans.

She joined about 100 people at a protest Thursday demanding the city turn over the search to the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, a military group that searches for remains of Americans overseas. Mayor Michael Bloomberg has said he will not do that.

Evans said the recent discovery brings hope that more of Robert might be identified. “It's almost an exciting anticipation, that you're going to get part of your murdered brother back.”

Marilyn Rocha, whose husband, Antonio, died in the attack, said she had received two sets of remains and had asked not to be notified of further identifications. “We were told this is it, there's nothing left. And now this comes up,” she said in a phone interview.

The initial search, run by the Fire Department, ended in May 2002. Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler, in charge of the new search, said the original effort will prove to have discovered “99.9% or 99.8%” of all remains. “Let's not forget how much was done right in that trying period. What we've done is to think about any other site we could have overlooked,” Skyler said. The city medical examiner told families in February 2005 that no more identifications could be made using existing DNA technology. In September, the city alerted families that a new technique would be tried.

DOJ_NMG_0090756

Jeanne Evans said her family has held a burial service for her brother but is waiting to bury the second set of remains and any others found.

"So the next time we do it will be the last time we do it,"' she said. "We don't want to keep digging."

Fresh Sorrows At Ground Zero (opinion) (NYT)

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

Finding more human remains at ground zero — five years after 9/11 — is what no one wanted. And yet it was almost inevitable, given the scale of the devastation when the towers collapsed. The grim discovery in recent days of human bones and bone fragments in an abandoned manhole at the edge of the disaster site does more than cause pain to the families who have never recovered a trace of their dead. It raises the very real and difficult question of how to proceed with the work under way at the site.

Some of the families have called for a complete halt to construction and a renewed search for remains, including federal assistance in the form of the Joint P.O.W.-M.I.A. Accounting Command, whose mission is to recover and identify the remains of American soldiers. Mayor Michael Bloomberg believes the city has already located the proper forensic experts. They are now being asked to start sifting, or resifting, any of the new material that could possibly contain DNA from victims.

The mayor has also found what appears to be the proper balance between pressing ahead with construction on the site itself and conducting renewed searches in those areas around the perimeter of ground zero where any further remains are most likely to be found.

There must be an accurate, detailed and comprehensive search. But there is no reason that construction and a renewed search cannot proceed together.

From the very first there were signs that the force of the World Trade Center's collapse had scattered body parts over a wider area than expected, well beyond the central core of the twin towers. By expanding the area to be searched and promising to search more thoroughly, Mr. Bloomberg has satisfied the needs of a city to have building at ground zero continue while still giving hope to those families looking for some certainty about a loved one's death five years ago.

U.S. Plans To Screen All Who Enter, Leave Country (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The federal government disclosed details yesterday of a border-security program to screen all people who enter and leave the United States, create a terrorism risk profile of each individual and retain that information for up to 40 years.

The details, released in a notice published yesterday in the Federal Register, open a new window on the government's broad and often controversial data-collection effort directed at American and foreign travelers, which was implemented after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

While long known to scrutinize air travelers, the Department of Homeland Security is seeking to apply new technology to perform similar checks on people who enter or leave the country "by automobile or on foot," the notice said.

The department intends to use a program called the Automated Targeting System, originally designed to screen shipping cargo, to store and analyze the data.

"We have been doing risk assessments of cargo and passengers coming into and out of the U.S.," DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen said. "We have the authority and the ability to do it for passengers coming by land and sea."

In practice, he said, the government has not conducted risk assessments on travelers at land crossings for logistical reasons.

"We gather, collect information that is needed to protect the borders," Agen said. "We store the information we see as pertinent to keeping Americans safe."

Civil libertarians expressed concern that risk profiling on such a scale would be intrusive and would not adequately protect citizens' privacy rights, issues similar to those that have surrounded systems profiling air passengers.

"They are assigning a suspicion level to millions of law-abiding citizens," said David Sobel, senior counsel of the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "This is about as Kafkaesque as you can get."

DHS officials said that by publishing the notice, they are simply providing "expanded notice and transparency" about an existing program disclosed in October 2001, the Treasury Enforcement Communications System.

But others said Congress has been unaware of the potential of the Automated Targeting System to assess non-aviation travelers.

DOJ_NMG_0090757

"ATS started as a tool to prevent the entry of drugs with cargo into the U.S.," said one aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. "We are not aware of Congress specifically legislating to make this expansion possible."

The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, chaired by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), yesterday asked Homeland Security to brief staff members on the program, Collins's spokeswoman, Jen Burita, said.

The notice comes as the department is tightening its ability to identify people at the borders. At the end of the year, for example, Homeland Security is expanding its Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, under which 32 million noncitizens entering the country annually are fingerprinted and photographed at 115 airports, 15 seaports and 154 land ports.

Stephen E. Flynn, senior fellow for national security studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, expressed doubts about the department's ability to conduct risk assessments of individuals on a wide scale.

He said customs investigators are so focused on finding drugs and weapons of mass destruction that it would be difficult to screen all individual border crossers, other than cargo-truck drivers and shipping crews.

"There is an ability in theory for government to cast a wider net," he said. "The reality of it is customs is barely able to manage the data they have."

The data-mining program stemmed from an effort in the early 1990s by customs officials to begin assessing the risk of cargo originating in certain countries and from certain shippers. Risk assessment turned more heavily to automated, computer-driven systems after the 2001 attacks.

The risk assessment is created by analysts at the National Targeting Center, a high-tech facility opened in November 2001 and now run by Customs and Border Protection.

In a round-the-clock operation, targeters match names against terrorist watch lists and a host of other data to determine whether a person's background or behavior indicates a terrorist threat, a risk to border security or the potential for illegal activity. They also assess cargo.

Each traveler assessed by the center is assigned a numeric score: The higher the score, the higher the risk. A certain number of points send the traveler back for a full interview.

The Automated Targeting System relies on government databases that include law enforcement data, shipping manifests, travel itineraries and airline passenger data, such as names, addresses, credit card details and phone numbers.

The parent program, Treasury Enforcement Communications System, houses "every possible type of information from a variety of federal, state and local sources," according to a 2001 Federal Register notice.

It includes arrest records, physical descriptions and "wanted" notices. The 5.3 billion-record database was accessed 766 million times a day to process 475 million travelers, according to a 2003 Transportation Research Board study.

In yesterday's Federal Register notice, Homeland Security said it will keep people's risk profiles for up to 40 years "to cover the potentially active lifespan of individuals associated with terrorism or other criminal activities," and because "the risk assessment for individuals who are deemed low risk will be relevant if their risk profile changes in the future, for example, if terrorist associations are identified."

DHS will keep a "pointer or reference" to the underlying records that resulted in the profile.

The DHS notice specified that the Automated Targeting System does not call for any new means of collecting information but rather for the use of existing systems. The notice did not spell out what will determine whether someone is high risk.

But documents and former officials say the system relies on hundreds of "rules" to factor a score for each individual, vehicle or piece of cargo.

According to yesterday's notice, the program is exempt from certain requirements of the Privacy Act of 1974 that allow, for instance, people to access records to determine "if the system contains a record pertaining to a particular individual" and "for the purpose of contesting the content of the record."

WAR NEWS:

Talks Underway For Release Of American Soldier (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — The American soldier captured by gunmen in the Iraqi capital last week remains alive as family members and others try to negotiate his release, a U.S. military official said today.

Ahmad Qusai Tai, a 41-year-old American of Iraqi descent, was visiting his Iraqi wife and other relatives in central Baghdad on Oct. 23 when kidnappers stormed the home, handcuffed the soldier and forced him into a vehicle at gunpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0090758

The kidnappers called his family with his cell phone, and talks over his release began.

"There is ongoing dialogue being done at different levels at this time," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad.

The kidnapping sparked a military crackdown involving 2,000 U.S. and 1,000 Iraqi forces on Shiite Muslim areas of Baghdad where they suspect he was being held. U.S.-led forces launched 37 missions to locate Tai, which led to the death of one U.S. soldier, the wounding of eight and the capture of 32 suspects.

"We do have credible intelligence that indicates who may have been responsible for his kidnapping," said Caldwell, declining to disclose further details. "We are using all of our assets to find him."

Tai, who moved to the United States as a teenager, joined the Army Reserves in December 2004 and was deployed to Iraq in November 2005. He married his wife in February 2005, Caldwell said.

The crackdown on Shiite neighborhoods proved unpopular with supporters of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who asked U.S. forces to remove checkpoints on key Shiite neighborhoods. But the crackdown, coming at the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, also coincided with a precipitous decline in insurgent attacks. Between Oct. 23 and Oct. 30, casualties among U.S.-led forces dropped 23% and the number of deadly roadside bombs fell to a seven-month low, Caldwell said.

The end of Ramadan usually heralds a drop in attacks, but Caldwell suggested that increased calls for calm by Iraqi religious and political leaders may have led to the drop. He also warned that the latest numbers may not yield any substantive lessons. "One week does not constitute a trend," he said.

Indeed, the number and ferocity of attacks in the days following the last week's Eid al-Fitr feast, which ends the annual month of fasting during Ramadan, appear to have increased in the past few days. At least a dozen explosions rocked Baghdad today, with gunfire rattling neighborhoods as the country's war raged unabated.

A motorcycle packed with explosives blew up in a busy Sadr City market, killing at least four people and injured 43. Another bomb in the Baghdad's Jadida neighborhood killed two and injured 25. A car bomb at a bus terminal in Mahmoudiya, a town south of Baghdad, injured four people.

Among those assassinated today were the dean of the University of Baghdad's College of Administration and Economy; a former member of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party; a spare car parts dealer; a bus driver; a Sunni cleric in the southern city of Basra; and a lawyer advising the Sunni religious endowment as well as his two daughters.

Three masked gunmen opened fire on a primary school in southern Baghdad, wounding the school's principal and three students, police and hospital officials said. Gunmen attacked a bakery in west Baghdad killing two people and injuring two.

Mortar rounds hit residential neighborhoods in south Baghdad and the southern city of Hillah, injuring 14. Mortars also struck central Basra, where British and Danish officials are about to evacuate to a better protected airbase on the city's outskirts.

The bodies of 11 Iraqi men were found in Baghdad this morning. Each had been bound, beaten, burned and shot at in the head at point blank range. More bodies generally show up as the day progresses.

Military: Talks Underway To Win Release Of Soldier (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Thursday that there is “an ongoing dialogue” to win the release of a kidnapped American soldier and that the captive is an Iraqi-American who married an Iraqi woman early last year.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the military spokesman, would not say with whom or at what level the dialogue was taking place. He said the United States believes the soldier is still in the custody of his abductors.

The military identified the servicemember as Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old reserve soldier from Ann Arbor, Mich. He was visiting his Iraqi wife Oct. 23 when he was kidnapped during a visit to the woman's family, Caldwell said.

Caldwell said the soldier and his wife were married in February 2005 and he didn't arrive in Iraq until November 2005. It could have been a violation of military rules if al-Taayie had married his wife while serving in the Army in Iraq.

A woman who claimed to be al-Taayie's mother-in-law, Latifah Isfieh Nasser, said last week that the soldier's in-laws tried to stop the abduction by men believed to be Mahdi Army militia fighters.

The Mahdi Army is a Shiite militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The soldier's religious affiliation was unknown; his wife's family is Shiite Muslim.

Meanwhile, aides to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki say he plans to reshuffle his Cabinet as early as this month. The decision comes after the United States recently demanded that al-Maliki set benchmarks to end violence and achieve reconciliation between the country's various religious and ethnic groups.

Aides said the move is an attempt to improve the performance of some ministries, especially the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry that oversees the police.

DOJ_NMG_0090759

"It will cover about a third of the serving ministers, including one with a security brief," Ali al-Adeeb, a lawmaker of al-Maliki's Dawa Party, told the Associated Press

The Iraqi parliament has been critical of al-Maliki's 5-month-old government for failure to crush a Sunni-led insurgency and disband Shiite militias. Al-Maliki has also been under fire for doing too little to improve services and create jobs. Aides say several ministers were given Cabinet posts without sufficient screening.

"We did not know their qualifications, and their performance in the past five months was modest," said Hassan al-Suneid, a Dawa lawmaker and a close al-Maliki aide.

In other Iraq news:

·Forty-nine people were killed or found dead in Iraq on Thursday, including seven killed when a motorcycle blew up in a crowded market in Baghdad's Sadr City district.

It was the first bombing in Sadr City since al-Maliki ordered the lifting Tuesday of a week-old U.S.-Iraqi army security blockade on the Shiite section of 2.5 million people.

·A former soldier in the 101st Airborne Division was indicted Thursday in Kentucky in the rape and death of a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and the slayings of three of her relatives in March. Former Army private Steven Green, 21, was charged with murder, aggravated sexual assault and conspiracy, among other offenses in the federal indictment. His attorney, Patrick Bouldin, said Green intends to plead not guilty.

Missing Soldier Believed Alive, U.S. Says (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Saad Al-Izzi

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Iraqi American's In-Laws Describe His Abduction

BAGHDAD, Nov. 2 -- A senior U.S. military spokesman said Thursday that an Iraqi American soldier kidnapped in Baghdad 10 days ago was believed to be alive and in the hands of his original captors.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell identified the soldier as 41-year-old reservist Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie and said that Taayie was visiting his in-laws and his wife on Oct. 23, the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr, when he was abducted by three carloads of armed men. Since then, the military has conducted intensive searches for the soldier, who moved to the United States as a teenager and returned to Iraq as a translator in the U.S. Army Reserve in November 2005, Caldwell said.

Members of Taayie's family said in interviews this week that they had warned him they were being watched and to be careful on his visits. They said his wife, Israa Abdul Satar, 26, a local science student whom Taayie married in February 2005, and two of her siblings had tried to fight off the abductors when they came to grab him.

"I told him that he should be careful and to watch out, because all eyes are on us," said Abdul Satar, Taayie's father-in-law, as he sat in the family's one-bedroom, second-floor apartment in the middle-class neighborhood of Karrada in central Baghdad.

Shaimaa Abdul Satar, Israa's younger sister, said she was walking with the couple and her brother Omar to Taayie's motorcycle a block from her parents' house at about 4:30 p.m. on Eid when two armed men pulled up and tried to force Taayie into a white Mercedes. They fought the men off and took shelter in an uncle's nearby apartment, Shaimaa said, but about five minutes later three cars with no license plates arrived, and armed men stormed the building and abducted Taayie.

Omar knew the leader of the group and initially went with them, she said. But after pleading with the men to release Taayie, she said, Omar was warned to get out of the car or they would kidnap him, too. He was released as the vehicle appeared to be heading to the Shiite slum of Sadr City in east Baghdad, Shaimaa said.

Shaimaa and others in her family identified the leader of the group that kidnapped Taayie as local gangster Abu Rami, whose real name, they said, is Majid al-Qaissy. They said he is a Sunni Arab, as is their family and Taayie's.

Caldwell, in a weekly press briefing, said that more than 2,000 U.S. troops and 1,000 Iraqi soldiers have conducted 37 missions in the capital searching for Taayie. He said one U.S. soldier has been killed and eight U.S. and two Iraqi soldiers wounded in the operations.

Most of the raids have been in the eastern parts of the capital, including Sadr City, where U.S. forces recently enforced a six-day closure that was lifted two days ago. At the time, the U.S. military said its mission was twofold: find the missing soldier, and capture a man named Abu Deraa, who is considered Iraq's most notorious Shiite death squad leader. U.S. officials have not said whether the two operations were related or if they believed Abu Deraa had custody of Taayie.

"At this point, we believe the ones who kidnapped Ahmed currently still have him," Caldwell said, but he would not identify who the U.S. military believes abducted the soldier.

Asked if the U.S. military had been in direct or indirect contact with the kidnappers, Caldwell said, "There is ongoing dialogue that is being done at different levels at this time, but it would be inappropriate for me to state with whom or at what level.

DOJ_NMG_0090760

"But there's also a tremendous amount of political activity ongoing to help secure the release of our soldier," he said. "We will never stop looking for our service members."

Caldwell said that casualties across Iraq declined by 23 percent last week, led by a 41 percent drop in sectarian killings in Baghdad, and that roadside bombings were at their lowest level in seven months. However, October was still a bloody month, he said, with casualty rates "higher than the levels seen in the months of August and September," which according to the Iraqi Health Ministry were the deadliest months of the 3 1/2 -year conflict.

October was also the fourth-deadliest month for U.S. troops. The U.S. military reported the noncombat death of a Marine that occurred on Tuesday, raising the number of U.S. fatalities in October to 105, the most since January 2005, when 106 U.S. troops were killed.

Nonetheless, Caldwell said that statistics from the last week were "promising, but as I've said before, one week does not constitute a trend."

Many Sunni leaders have credited the U.S. security cordon around Sadr City with helping to reduce violence by containing Shiite death squads blamed for kidnapping, torturing and killing thousands of Sunni Arabs around the capital.

Caldwell would not rule that out, but he also cited other causes: a traditional dip in violence following the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which ended about 10 days ago; "the increased calls for peace and reconciliation by Iraqi political leaders, clerics and sheiks"; and continuing U.S. and Iraqi military operations.

In a rare note of praise for someone often considered a U.S. enemy, Caldwell said that even anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr seemed to be pitching in. "From the comments he's made recently, he wants to see violence reduced, he wants to see greater peace and security for Iraqis," and he put out a statement saying "openly that he wants to see greater reconciliation and dialogue, and he is a part of the political process here," Caldwell said.

In violence Thursday, at least seven people were killed and 45 injured when a bomb rigged to a motorcycle exploded in a crowded market in Sadr City, local authorities said. A car bomb in south Baghdad killed 12 and wounded 23, and a roadside bomb in eastern Baghdad killed four people and injured 23, an Interior Ministry official said.

Congress Tells Auditor In Iraq To Close Office (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

Investigations led by a Republican lawyer named Stuart W. Bowen Jr. in Iraq have sent American occupation officials to jail on bribery and conspiracy charges, exposed disastrously poor construction work by well-connected companies like Halliburton and Parsons, and discovered that the military did not properly track hundreds of thousands of weapons it shipped to Iraqi security forces.

And tucked away in a huge military authorization bill that President Bush signed two weeks ago is what some of Mr. Bowen's supporters believe is his reward for repeatedly embarrassing the administration: a pink slip.

The order comes in the form of an obscure provision that terminates his federal oversight agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, on Oct. 1, 2007. The clause was inserted by the Republican side of the House Armed Services Committee over the objections of Democratic counterparts during a closed-door conference, and it has generated surprise and some outrage among lawmakers who say they had no idea it was in the final legislation.

Mr. Bowen's office, which began operation in January 2004 to examine reconstruction money spent in Iraq, was always envisioned as a temporary organization, permitted to continue its work only as long as Congress saw fit. Some advocates for the office, in fact, have regarded its lack of a permanent bureaucracy as the key to its aggressiveness and independence.

But as the implications of the provision in the new bill have become clear, opposition has been building on both sides of the political aisle. One point of contention is exactly when the office would have naturally run its course without a hard end date.

The bipartisan opposition may not be unexpected given Mr. Bowen's Republican credentials — he served under George W. Bush both in Texas and in the White House — and deep public skepticism on the Bush administration's conduct of the war.

Susan Collins, a Maine Republican who followed the bill closely as chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs, says that she still does not know how the provision made its way into what is called the conference report, which reconciles differences between House and Senate versions of a bill.

Neither the House nor the Senate version contained such a termination clause before the conference, all involved agree.

"It's truly a mystery to me," Ms. Collins said. "I looked at what I thought was the final version of the conference report and that provision was not in at that time."

"The one thing I can confirm is that this was a last-minute insertion," she said.

A Republican spokesman for the committee, Josh Holly, said lawmakers should not have been surprised by the provision closing the inspector general's office because it "was discussed very early in the conference process."

DOJ_NMG_0090761

But like several other members of the House and Senate who were contacted on the bill, Ms. Collins said that she feared the loss of oversight that could occur if the inspector general's office went out of business, adding that she was already working on legislation with several Democratic and Republican senators to reverse the termination.

One of those, John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is chairman of the powerful Senate Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that Mr. Bowen was "making a valuable contribution to the Congressional and public understanding of this very complex and ever-changing situation in Iraq."

"Given that his office has performed important work and that much remains to be done," Mr. Warner added, "I intend to join Senator Collins in consulting with our colleagues to extend his charter."

While Senators Collins and Warner said they had nothing more than hunches on where the impetus for setting a termination date had originated, Congressional Democrats were less reserved.

"It appears to me that the administration wants to silence the messenger that is giving us information about waste and fraud in Iraq," said Representative Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat who is the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform.

"I just can't see how one can look at this change without believing it's political," he said.

The termination language was inserted into the bill by Congressional staff members working for Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and who declared on Monday that he plans to run for president in 2008.

Mr. Holly, who is the House Armed Services spokesman as well as a member of Mr. Hunter's staff, said that politics played no role and that there had been no direction from the administration or lobbying from the companies whose work in Iraq Mr. Bowen's office has severely critiqued. Three of the companies that have been a particular focus of Mr. Bowen's investigations, Halliburton, Parsons and Bechtel, said that they had made no effort to lobby against his office.

The idea, Mr. Holly said, was simply to return to a non-wartime footing in which inspectors general in the State Department, the Pentagon and elsewhere would investigate American programs overseas. The definite termination date was also seen as helpful for planning future oversight efforts from Bush administration agencies, he said.

But in Congress, particularly on the Democratic side of the aisle, there have long been accusations that agencies controlled by the Bush administration are not inclined to unearth their own shortcomings in the first place.

The criticism came to a head in a hearing a year ago, when Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, an Ohio Democrat, induced the Pentagon's acting inspector general, Thomas Gimble, to concede that he had no agents deployed in Iraq, more than two years after the invasion.

A spokesman for the Pentagon inspector general said Thursday that Mr. Gimble had worked to improve that situation, and currently had seven auditors in Baghdad and others working on Iraq-related issues in the United States and elsewhere. Mr. Gimble was in Iraq on Thursday, the spokesman said.

Mr. Bowen's office has 55 auditors and inspectors in Iraq and about 300 reports and investigations already to its credit, far outstripping any other oversight agency in the country.

But Howard Krongard, the State Department inspector general, said that the comparison was misleading, because many of those resources would probably flow to State and the Pentagon if Congress shuts Mr. Bowen's office down.

"I think we are competitive to do what they ask us to do," Mr. Krongard said, referring to Congress.

Mr. Kucinich and other lawmakers said that Iraq oversight could also be hurt by the loss of Mr. Bowen's mandate, which allows him to cross institutional boundaries, while the other inspectors general have jurisdictions only within their own agencies. Mr. Krongard said that issue could be handled by cooperation among the inspectors general.

Officials at the State Department and the Pentagon made it clear that in general terms they supported Mr. Bowen's work and would abide by the wishes of Congress.

While the quality of Mr. Bowen's work is seldom questioned, he is sometimes accused of being a grandstander who is too friendly with the news media. Mr. Bowen has responded that it is standard procedure to publicize successful investigations as a way of discouraging other potential wrongdoers.

Among the disagreements on the termination language in the defense authorization bill was exactly how much it would have shortened Mr. Bowen's tenure. An amendment in the Senate version of the bill actually expanded the pot of reconstruction money his agents could examine.

Because the tenure of his office is calculated through a formula involving the amount of reconstruction money in that pot, the crafters of that amendment figured that it would have extended Mr. Bowen's work until well into 2008 — or longer if Congress granted further extensions.

DOJ_NMG_0090762

Mr. Holly agrees that the Senate language would have expanded that pot of money, but he says that in the Republican staff's interpretation of the formula, Mr. Bowen's tenure would have run out sometime in 2007 whether the money was added or not.

In any case, as the bill came out of conference, the termination date of Oct. 1, 2007, was inserted, effectively meaning that Mr. Bowen would have to start working on passing his responsibilities to other agencies by early next year.

Capitol Hill staff members said that after House Democratic objections were overridden, Senate conferees agreed to the provision in a bit of horse-trading: the amount of money Mr. Bowen could look at would be expanded, but only with the hard termination date.

Mr. Bowen himself declined to comment on the controversy surrounding his office, saying only that he was already working with the other inspectors general to develop a transition plan in accordance with the defense authorization act. "We will do what the Congress desires," Mr. Bowen said.

Bechtel Calls It Quits After More Than 3 Years In Iraq (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Bechtel Corp. helped build the Bay Area subway system, Hoover Dam and a city for 200,000 in the desert of Saudi Arabia. It likes to boast that it can go anywhere, under any conditions, and build anything.

In Iraq, Bechtel met its match.

A firm that prides itself on its safety record saw dozens of its workers killed. And a company that celebrates achievement won't know for a long time, if ever, exactly what it accomplished.

The assignment Bechtel won from the U.S. government in early 2003 was unique: Apply the brick and mortar needed to restart the long-starved and war-damaged Iraqi economy, allowing the country to blossom into a modern and free industrial state. Rarely had a single corporation been given so much power to affect so many so quickly.

More than three years later, Bechtel says its work on Iraq's water and electrical plants, its bridges, schools and port, is done.

The company said this week at its headquarters here that it had completed 97 of 99 projects for a total of $2.3 billion, a sum that included its undisclosed fee. Only two Bechtel employees are left in the country. At its peak, there were 200 people from Bechtel supervising tens of thousands of Iraqis.

If the story for Bechtel is drawing to a close, this isn't anything like the happy ending it once expected.

The company went to Iraq with a good deal of well-earned swagger. Chairman Riley Bechtel told the firm's employees in April 2003 that Bechtel's record was one "that few, if any, companies in the world can match." The tasks it would undertake in Iraq, he added, were "the kind of work we do best."

The company expected Iraq to develop from an aid recipient to a customer. The biggest U.S. engineering firm would help one of the world's most distressed countries into the 21st century.

That hope receded with each suicide bombing.

"We were told it would be a permissive environment. But to the horror of everyone, it never stabilized. It just went down, down, down, and to this day it continues to go down," said Cliff Mumm, who ran Bechtel's Iraq operation. "I'm proud of what we did, but had law and order prevailed, it would be a different situation."

At one Bechtel project, in the southern city of Basra, the company recorded this toll: the site security manager was murdered; the site manager resigned after receiving death threats; a senior engineer resigned after his daughter was kidnapped; 12 employees of the electrical-plumbing subcontractor were assassinated in their offices; and 11 employees of the concrete supplier were murdered.

All told, 52 workers associated with Bechtel projects were killed, most of them Iraqi. Forty-nine others were wounded.

Bechtel says it completed nearly all its assigned projects, but that doesn't mean they are necessarily operating as planned.

"Once projects were complete, the plant operating crews we trained often lacked the leadership, resources or motivation needed to run and maintain their facilities," Mumm noted in September testimony to the House committee on government reform.

If Bechtel gives itself high grades under the circumstances, others aren't so generous.

"They thought, 'We're the world's best, and we can go in and make this happen,' " said Rick Barton, a reconstruction specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

"After all the money that's been invested, the Iraqi people should be able to make it on their own. But we're nowhere near that, let alone creating a shining city on a hill," Barton added.

The looting and vandalism outpaced the rebuilding from the beginning.

DOJ_NMG_0090763

In May 2003, the supposed end of open warfare, a survey of Iraq's dilapidated electrical system showed 13 downed transmission towers. Four months later, the total had grown to 623.

"We were trying to hold the infrastructure together, and at the same time build a platform to go forward, and at the same time, cope with a deteriorating security situation," said Mumm, who recently returned to the U.S. "There were a lot of moving parts."

The company's critics give it points for remaining free of corruption, unlike some Iraq contractors. But they say it was too slow in restoring the power grid.

"In the critical years of 2003 and 2004, part of the growing sense in the Iraqi population that Americans were incompetent occupiers rather than effective liberators came because Bechtel hadn't gotten the power grid on in the scorching hot summers," said Charles Tiefer, a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law and an expert on government contracting.

"American corporate reconstruction efforts like Bechtel's failed worse in Iraq than American arms," Tiefer said.

The lack of an infrastructure fed the insurgency, which made its goal to destroy the infrastructure. As time went on, Bechtel spent increasing amounts not on rebuilding but on protecting its workers.

Now that the reconstruction funds are running out, the fate of the Iraq infrastructure, like so much else in the country, is uncertain.

"Bechtel is putting a 'Mission Accomplished' banner over their work in Iraq and then coming home," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a watchdog group. "But the mission has not been accomplished. Iraq still doesn't have enough power, hospitals, clean water."

Most of the bridges and roads and other projects built by Bechtel in the last century are still in use. Mumm hopes that the work the company did in Iraq will survive.

"All that stuff is there, and available, should the Iraqis find themselves in a stable enough position to use them and take advantage of them," he said. "I believe eventually that will happen."

As Bechtel Goes (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

Bechtel, the giant engineering company, is leaving Iraq. Its mission — to rebuild power, water and sewage plants — wasn't accomplished: Baghdad received less than six hours a day of electricity last month, and much of Iraq's population lives with untreated sewage and without clean water. But Bechtel, having received $2.3 billion of taxpayers' money and having lost the lives of 52 employees, has come to the end of its last government contract.

As Bechtel goes, so goes the whole reconstruction effort. Whatever our leaders may say about their determination to stay the course complete the mission, when it comes to rebuilding Iraq they've already cut and run. The $21 billion allocated for reconstruction over the last three years has been spent, much of it on security rather than its intended purpose, and there's no more money in the pipeline.

The failure of reconstruction in Iraq raises three questions. First, how much did that failure contribute to the overall failure of the war? Second, how was it that America, the great can-do nation, in this case couldn't and didn't? Finally, if we've given up on rebuilding Iraq, what are our troops dying for?

There's no definitive way to answer the first question. You can make a good case that the invasion of Iraq was doomed no matter what, because we never had enough military manpower to provide security. But the lack of electricity and clean water did a lot to dissipate any initial good will the Iraqis may have felt toward the occupation. And Iraqis are well aware that the billions squandered by American contractors included a lot of Iraqi oil revenue as well as U.S. taxpayers' dollars.

Consider the symbolism of Iraq's new police academy, which Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, has called "the most essential civil security project in the country." It was built at a cost of $75 million by Parsons Corporation, which received a total of about $1 billion for Iraq reconstruction projects. But the academy was so badly built that feces and urine leak from the ceilings in the student barracks.

Think about it. We want the Iraqis to stand up so we can stand down. But if they do stand up, we'll dump excrement on their heads.

As for how this could have happened, that's easy: major contractors believed, correctly, that their political connections insulated them from accountability. Halliburton and other companies with huge Iraq contracts were basically in the same position as Donald Rumsfeld: they were so closely identified with President Bush and, especially, Vice President Cheney that firing or even disciplining them would have been seen as an admission of personal failure on the part of top elected officials.

As a result, the administration and its allies in Congress fought accountability all the way. Administration officials have made repeated backdoor efforts to close the office of Mr. Bowen, whose job is to oversee the use of reconstruction money. Just this past May, with the failed reconstruction already winding down, the White House arranged for the last $1.5 billion of reconstruction money to be placed outside Mr. Bowen's jurisdiction. And now, finally, Congress has passed a bill whose provisions include the complete elimination of his agency next October.

DOJ_NMG_0090764

The bottom line is that those charged with rebuilding Iraq had no incentive to do the job right, so they didn't.

You can see, by the way, why a Democratic takeover of the House, if it happens next week, would be such a pivotal event: suddenly, committee chairmen with subpoena power would be in a position to investigate where all the Iraq money went.

But that's all in the past. What about the future?

Back in June, after a photo-op trip to Iraq, Mr. Bush said something I agree with. "You can measure progress in megawatts of electricity delivered," he declared. "You can measure progress in terms of oil sold on the market on behalf of the Iraqi people." But what those measures actually show is the absence of progress. By any material measure, Iraqis are worse off than they were under Saddam.

And we're not planning to do anything about it: the U.S.-led reconstruction effort in Iraq is basically over. I don't know whether the administration is afraid to ask U.S. voters for more money, or simply considers the situation hopeless. Either way, the United States has accepted defeat on reconstruction.

Yet Americans are still fighting and dying in Iraq. For what?

Iraqi Leaders Try To Keep US At Arm's Length (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

With friction between the US and Iraq's Shia-led government rising to new highs in the run-up to American elections next week, leaders in Baghdad are moving to extract concessions from Washington on the status of US forces in the country.

Iraqi parliamentarians are trying to change the guidelines that govern the US-led multinational force in Iraq – including lifting the immunity from prosecution in Iraq enjoyed by troops – when the United Nations resolution authorising its presence there comes up for renewal at the end of the year.

This development comes after Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, succeeded in pushing the US military to lift blockades surrounding the huge Shia slum of Sadr City on Tuesday. The clampdown had been imposed in an attempt to find a US soldier reported to be held hostage there. But it brought gridlock to several parts of the city, angered Sadr City residents and triggered criticism from members of the government.

The moves by Mr Maliki seem intended, at least in part, to show the Iraqi public that the government is not under American control. Mr Maliki is reported to have told Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador, on Friday that, while he was Washington's "friend", he was not "America's man in Iraq".

The tougher stance taken by Mr Maliki comes after a sustained period of US pressure to clamp down on sectarian violence blamed largely on Shia militia.

Haydar al-Ibadi, a lawmaker from Mr Maliki's Dawa party, said Iraqi politicians had in recent days made three main proposals to parliament: to pass primary responsibility for security issues in Iraq from the US-led multinational force to the Iraqi government, to allow the Iraqi government to make decisions regarding the training and arming of security forces, and to regulate the presence of the multinational force inside Iraqi cities.

He also said lawmakers wanted to make members of the multinational forces, who currently enjoy legal immunity in Iraq, "accountable for any breaking of the law, any killings of Iraqis".

However, he added that parliamentarians were not sure how to go about negotiating the issue, as they realised that the US would strongly resist such a proposal. The intention would be to have the force "backing up the Iraqi government when the Iraqi government wanted", said Mr Ibadi.

US military officers currently say they do await a green light from the Iraqi government before any major operations, but Iraqis including Mr Maliki have said that in practice Americans take key decisions without consulting them.

The move by parliamentarians follows the lifting of the blockade of Sadr City – an apparent capitulation by the US military. The crisis has been a particularly tense test of US-Iraqi relations, as the US military places heavy emphasis on doing whatever is necessary to recover missing personnel.

To the Iraqis it is equally sensitive, as the vast suburb is the support base of the radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Sadrist movement is perhaps the most important backer of Mr Maliki's parliamentary coalition while simultaneously one of the strongest critics of its policies.

Shortly after Mr Maliki called for the blockade to be lifted by the US, it was. Residents report that the popularity of Mr Maliki, who was previously seen as having sold out Shia interests to the Americans, has since surged.

DOJ_NMG_0090765

General Plays Down Discord Between U.S. And Iraqis (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 2 — The top American military spokesman here on Thursday played down recent discord between the American and Iraqi governments, saying that while there had been "disconnects," the leaders of both countries were working closely to achieve political stability in Iraq.

"A transition is not always a pleasant thing to watch as it happens," the spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said during a news briefing in Baghdad. "We need to have more dialogue, as was clearly evidenced by the fact that there have been some disconnects that have occurred in this transition period."

On Tuesday, in the latest public flare-up of tension, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, under pressure from Shiite political leaders and outraged Baghdad residents, demanded that American troops remove a week-old cordon that had been set up around the Shiite district of Sadr City as part of the search for a missing American soldier.

General Caldwell said Thursday that a "tremendous amount of political activity" was under way to secure the release of the soldier, who was reported taken on Oct. 23 after he left the fortified Green Zone, without permission, to visit relatives in central Baghdad.

"There is ongoing dialogue that is being done at different levels at this time," the general said, though he refused to provide any details of those conversations.

General Caldwell confirmed that the soldier was Specialist Ahmed Qusai al-Taie, a 41-year-old Iraqi-American reservist, and that he was married to an Iraqi woman. His wife was among the relatives Specialist Taie was visiting when he was abducted, the general said, adding that officials believed that the soldier was still alive and being held by his original captors.

The American command has dedicated more than 2,000 American troops and more than 1,000 members of Iraqi security forces to the search operation, which has focused on Sadr City and the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, where Specialist Taie was taken. The authorities suspect involvement by the Mahdi Army, a large Shiite militia that controls Sadr City and is loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

The manhunt has angered some American troops in Iraq, who have privately complained that the military should not expend any additional resources, or put any troops at further risk, to search for a soldier who had violated military rules and exposed himself to danger by leaving his post without military protection.

But on Thursday, perhaps addressing those complaints, General Caldwell said, "We never stop looking for our service members."

Prime Minister Maliki's demand to end the search cordon put additional strain on an increasingly fractious relationship between him and President Bush.

The Iraqi leader has wrestled for more independence from his American protectors, including greater control of Iraq's security, which is dominated by the Americans. According to General Caldwell, the prime minister announced an initiative this week to expand the Iraqi military by about 18,700 troops.

The top American military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said last week that Iraqi security forces still needed 12 to 18 months before they would be ready to take full control of the country's security. But Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, offered a more conservative prediction, saying during a speech in Paris on Thursday that Iraq's security forces would be ready to assume full responsibility in two to three years.

"Two to three years are needed to build our security forces and say goodbye to our friends," said Mr. Talabani, who is on a six-day visit to France.

General Caldwell said some measurements of violence in Iraq had indicated a decrease since the holy month of Ramadan ended early last week, including a 23 percent drop in casualties across the country from the week before.

"Those statistics are promising, but as I've said before, one week does not constitute a trend," he cautioned.

Indeed, a wide range of attacks on Thursday drew from the entire repertoire of tactics used by the country's death squads and criminal groups: vehicle bombs, mortar bomb attacks, bombs concealed along urban and rural roadways, ambushes, assassinations, drive-by shootings and kidnappings.

At least 37 people were killed, including civilians and security forces, and 97 wounded in more than two dozen incidents reported by the authorities in Baghdad, Baquba and Kirkuk, three of the country's largest cities.

In Baghdad at least five people were killed and 53 were wounded when a bomb hidden on a motorcycle exploded in a crowded marketplace in Sadr City.

Separately, attackers shot and killed the dean of Baghdad University's economics and management college, his wife and their son at the college's front gate, an Interior Ministry official said.

DOJ_NMG_0090766

An American military patrol opened fire on guards working at a building associated with the Supreme Judiciary Council, killing four and wounding one, the ministry official said. The circumstances of the shooting remained unclear. A bomb exploded in a crowded market in the New Baghdad neighborhood, killing one and wounding 22, the official said.

In Diyala Province, gunmen opened fire on two oil tanker trucks, igniting the trucks and killing five people inside, a provincial police official reported. Other gunmen killed a judge and his son in the provincial capital of Baquba, the police official said.

An American soldier died in what was called “a noncombat-related incident” north of Baghdad on Thursday, the American military said.

It said in another statement that Iraqi security forces operating about three miles from the Iranian border had “intercepted six heavily loaded donkeys.” The donkeys were hauling 53 Soviet- and Italian-made antitank landmines and one antitank projectile, which the troops confiscated and destroyed. No humans were captured, the statement said, and the donkeys were set free.

November Off To Bloody Start In Iraq (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 2, 2006

A blood-drenched October has passed into a violent early November as a motorcycle rigged with explosives ripped through a crowded Shiite market in Sadr City on Thursday and suspected Sunni insurgent gunmen killed a Shiite dean of Baghdad University.

The attacks showed no signs of abating after at least 1,272 Iraqis were killed in the first full month of autumn and the 43rd month of the U.S. bid to quell violence and build democracy in Iraq, according to an Associated Press count. The figure is a minimum since many deaths go unreported, but the total is higher than any other month since the AP began keeping track in May 2005.

AP statistics also showed nearly twice as many Iraqi security forces died last month as U.S. forces — 194 versus 106. The Interior Ministry said at least 119 Iraqi policemen were killed.

With shootings, bombings and abductions tearing apart Iraq three years after the U.S.-led invasion, the war in Iraq is the top issue for voters before next week's U.S. congressional elections.

The Iraqi president, visiting Paris, said Thursday all American forces could be gone from Iraq within three years.

"Two to three years are needed to build our security forces and say bye-bye to our friends," Jalal Talabani said. The president, a Kurd whose ethnic group owes its relative prosperity and independence in northern Iraq to the U.S. invasion, has repeatedly predicted an earlier departure for American forces than U.S. generals have.

Asked about Talabani's remarks, Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, said: "All parties agree on the desire to hand over control for security to the Iraqis as soon as possible."

Democratic Sens. Carl Levin and Jack Reed said their party will attempt to pass legislation to begin bringing some troops home immediately.

"We want to end the open-ended commitment of our troops, and we want to begin, at least by the end of the year, the reduction of American forces," Levin said.

At least 49 people were killed or found dead throughout Iraq on Thursday, including the seven killed when the motorcycle blew up in a crowded market in Baghdad's Sadr City district. At least 45 people were wounded in that attack, many of them seriously, police said.

It was the first bombing in Sadr City since Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered the lifting Tuesday of the week-old U.S.-Iraqi army security blockade on the sprawling Shiite slum of 2.5 million people.

Police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said the explosives went off at 4 p.m., usually the busiest time at Mereidi market, one of the neighborhood's most popular commercial centers.

The rigged motorcycle was left in a section of the market that specialized in the sales of secondhand motorbikes and spare parts. Videotape by Associated Press Television News in the aftermath of the bombing showed the mangled skeletons of scores of motorbikes and large pools of blood on the ground.

Gheith Jassim al-Saadi, a 36-year-old laborer, arrived at the scene shortly after the blast. He had planned to go to the market earlier to have two friends repair his motorbike.

"Motorcycles were scattered everywhere, blood was on the ground and crowds of people were looking for their relatives in panic," he said. "I do not know what happened to my two friends."

Mahdi Army militiamen, who control the district, arrived quickly to disperse a crowd of onlookers, fearing a second blast targeting rescuers and police as has repeatedly been the case in past bombings.

DOJ_NMG_0090767

The slain university dean, Jassim al-Asadi, a Shiite, was returning home after picking up his son from school and his wife from her teaching job, when gunmen drove alongside and sprayed his car with automatic weapons, police Lt. Ahmed Ibrahim said. Al-Asadi's wife and son also were killed, Ibrahim said.

With his death, at least 155 educators have perished since the war began. The academics apparently were singled out for their relatively high public stature, vulnerability and known views on controversial issues in a climate of deepening Islamic fundamentalism.

The savagery against professionals is robbing Iraq of much of its brain trust. The Health Ministry says at least 250 physicians and health workers have been killed since March 2003 and more than 6,000 doctors have fled the country.

As with most murders in Iraq, al-Asadi's killers were unlikely to be captured, leaving their motive a mystery. But he was slain four days after the assassination of a prominent Sunni academic, matching the pattern of tit-for-tat sectarian revenge killings that have shredded Iraqi society.

Geologist Essam al-Rawi, head of the University Professor's Union and a senior member of the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, was gunned down as he left his Baghdad home Monday. The scholars association has links to the Sunni insurgency.

Two Iraqi lawmakers, meanwhile, said the prime minister planned to reshuffle his 39-member Cabinet in a bid to salvage the government's faltering image and deflect criticism that it is ineffective in stopping the sectarian killing, providing services and creating jobs.

"It will cover about a third of the serving ministers, including one with a security brief," Ali al-Adeeb, a lawmaker of al-Maliki's Dawa Party and a close aide to the prime minister, told the AP.

Hassan al-Suneid, another Dawa lawmaker and al-Maliki confidant, said he expects the Cabinet changes within a month. "It will take place after consultations with the political blocs in parliament," he said.

The U.S. military said a Baghdad-based soldier was killed Wednesday in a roadside bombing, a second died Monday in a firefight in the capital and a third died Thursday from an unspecified non-combat incident north of the capital, raising to 2,820 the number of U.S. forces who have died in the war.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military identified a kidnapped soldier as Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, 41, of Ann Arbor, Mich. His identity had been widely published after an Iraqi woman, who said she was his mother-in-law, provided the name and said he was married three months ago to her daughter, a Baghdad college student.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell confirmed widely published reports that the reserve soldier was handcuffed and taken away by gunmen during a visit to his wife's family Oct. 23.

But Caldwell said that the soldier and his wife were "married in February 2005 and he didn't arrive in theater until November 2005. So he has every right, of course, as an American soldier to marry whomever he wants. ... At the time he was abducted his wife was in country here, in Baghdad."

The spokesman said the United States believed the soldier was still in the custody of his abductors and there was "an ongoing dialogue" to win the his release. He did not say with whom or at what level.

Baghdad University Shi'ite Dean Slain (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

AP, November 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Gunmen yesterday killed the Shi'ite dean of Baghdad University's school of administration and economics, the 155th Iraqi academic slain in sectarian violence and revenge attacks since the 2003 U.S. invasion.

In another attack against majority Shi'ites, a motorcycle bomb struck a crowded market in Sadr City, killing seven persons and wounding 45, police said, two days after the U.S. lifted a military blockade of the Baghdad district on the orders of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The rigged motorcycle was left in a section of the Mereidi market that specialized in the sales of secondhand motorbikes and spare parts. The attack raised the total number of people killed or found dead across Iraq yesterday to 49.

Sadr City is a stronghold of militia loyal to radical anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The U.S. military also confirmed yesterday that a kidnapped soldier was an Iraqi-American man who was married to an Iraqi woman. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell identified him as Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old reserve soldier.

The military spokesman said there was "an ongoing dialogue" in a bid to win the soldier's release, but he would not say with whom or at what level.

The statements coincided with sharp criticism of Mr. al-Maliki's five-month-old government for its perceived failure to make progress toward crushing the Sunni-led insurgency and disband Shi'ite militias blamed for much of the violence. Mr. al-Maliki also is under fire for doing too little to improve services and create jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0090768

The government's main backer, the United States, has added to the pressure, presenting Mr. al-Maliki last week with a timeline to end the violence and achieve reconciliation among the country's various religious and ethnic groups.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said yesterday that his country could send U.S.-led troops home in two to three years, once Iraq has set up its own domestic security forces.

"Two to three years are needed to build our security forces and say bye-bye to our friends," Mr. Talabani said at a conference during a visit to Paris.

The Shi'ite university dean, Jassim al-Asadi, was driving home after picking up his son from school and his wife from her teaching job when a group of armed men pulled alongside and sprayed his car with bullets, police Lt. Ahmed Ibrahim said. Mr. al-Asadi's wife and son also were killed in the attack.

Iraqi academics, along with doctors and other professionals, have become frequent targets of threats, kidnappings and slayings. At least 155 have been killed since April 9, 2003, when Saddam Hussein was ousted, according to Education Ministry statistics.

Thousands of others have fled the country, starving Iraq's education, legal and health care systems of much-needed expertise and deepening a pervasive sense of hopelessness.

A prominent Sunni academic was killed Monday as part of a pattern of tit-for-tat sectarian attacks since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shi'ite shrine in Samarra.

Hughes Stands By State's Man In The Mideast (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

If you make a serious blunder, seems it's much better to be a Republican than a Democrat.

Take, for example, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), the former -- and surely never again -- Democratic nominee for president. He botched a joke or insulted the troops, or both, and the Democrats cut and ran faster than an Olympic sprinter.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) promptly condemned the remarks as "inappropriate." Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr . (Tenn.) defected to the Republicans, saying Kerry "needs to apologize to our troops."

Compare that with the State Department's treatment of Alberto Fernandez , head of public diplomacy for the Mideast. Fernandez said the administration had been arrogant and stupid in its Iraq foray. He said this, in Arabic, in an Oct. 21 interview with al-Jazeera television. Then he apologized, saying he somehow misspoke.

So was he fired? Transferred? Hardly. His boss, Undersecretary Karen Hughes is backing him all the way, according to an e-mail circulated by Hughes's assistant, Adele E. Ruppe .

"We've received a number of calls and e-mails from people" asking about what's going to happen to Fernandez, Ruppe wrote. "I want to assure everyone" Hughes supports Fernandez, she added.

Hughes "called a public diplomacy staff meeting first thing Monday morning" two days after the al-Jazeera interview, "to express her strong support," said Ruppe's e-mail. "We have to back our people," Hughes said, according to the e-mail, "even if they occasionally make a mistake in their choice of words." Hughes "noted that Alberto is out there . . . every day, doing television, on some of the toughest media shows -- frequently in Arabic. . . . No one is perfect and all of us will occasionally make mistakes."

Hughes, according to Ruppe's meeting notes, said that "using the words 'arrogant' and 'stupid' was a mistake for which Alberto has apologized and it's important to remember those two words were in the midst of a lengthy television interview in Arabic."

So Hughes is staying the course with Fernandez. Probably helps that he's one of the few Arabic speakers she's got.Chertoff Honored and Dishonored

And now, a new feature, Loop Fan Forum.

This e-mail arrived Wednesday from Miles Swanson regarding an item about Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff 's selection as recipient of the Henry E. Petersen Award, usually given to a career member of the Justice Department's criminal division for his longtime achievements and contributions.

"My grandfather was Henry Petersen," Swanson writes. "I was horrified when I spoke to my mother this morning" and learned that Chertoff will be getting the award.

"I am an attorney working in the disaster area that is post-Katrina New Orleans," Swanson wrote. "I staff a free legal clinic in the 9th Ward. . . . As you can imagine, I am at a loss for words because every day I have to deal with the effects of his 'leadership.' Thank you."

Swanson sent us a forceful letter he'd written to Chertoff, whose agency oversees FEMA. It was "sad for the people of New Orleans and of all the Gulf Coast" that Chertoff is getting the award. "In closing," he said, "I want you to remember every single time your eyes peer at the Henry Petersen Award in whatever job you happen to be mucking up, that you do not deserve it."A Block of Endangered Incumbents

DOJ_NMG_0090769

Sign of the times? A "For Sale" sign went up yesterday on D Street SE at a house that belonged to a former Florida GOP representative, and more recently to former CIA director Porter Goss . There's been some renovating -- perhaps folks removing the spook gear -- and an open house is set for Sunday.

But you might want to wait to buy until after the election, when the selling could be more competitive. Loop Fans will recall that this Capitol Hill block is an enclave of several endangered Republicans. Also along the street we find Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.). Next door is the house of Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr . (Fla.), and two doors down from there the townhouse of Rep. Chris Chocola (Ind.). He lives next door to former representative Mark Foley (Fla.), and across the street there's Rep. Jim Ryun (Kan.) .The Price of Silencing a Mistress? $500,000

An update on another beleaguered Republican: Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.) agreed last year to pay his former mistress about $500,000 to settle her $5.5 million lawsuit alleging he had abused her, the Associated Press reported yesterday.

The AP, citing a "person familiar with the terms of the deal," reported that the settlement called for her to be paid in installments. She's gotten less than half the money and will not get the rest until after the election. Sherwood has acknowledged that the woman was his mistress but denied abusing her. A clause in the settlement requires her to forfeit some of the money if she talks publicly about the case.

Abu Ghraib Ended Career, A Top General Says (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — A former commander of U.S. troops in Iraq retired from the Army this week and said the Abu Ghraib prisoner-abuse scandal effectively ended his career.

Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez called the scandal “the sole reason I was forced to retire” in an interview published Thursday in The Monitor newspaper in McAllen, Texas. Sanchez commanded U.S. ground forces in Iraq during the months in 2003 when American troops at Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad beat, humiliated and sexually assaulted prisoners.

Sanchez, who retired Wednesday, is the third and highest-ranking general to have a career ended by the outcry over the mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners. Eleven enlisted soldiers have been found guilty of crimes in connection with the abuse at Abu Ghraib, which burst into public view in April 2004.

Sanchez could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Critics of the Pentagon's handling of the case, such as Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., say more senior officers and civilian leaders need to be punished. Levin, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, says forced retirement is “not much in the way of accountability.”

In response to questions Thursday about Sanchez, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said only that he “retired after a long, professional career of public service to the U.S. Army and our nation.” In May 2004, shortly before Sanchez turned his Iraq command over to Gen. George Casey, President Bush said, “Rick Sanchez has done a fabulous job.”

Sanchez approved some harsh interrogation tactics for use at Abu Ghraib in fall 2003, when he and other military commanders were concerned about rising violence. Those tactics included using military dogs to frighten detainees, although the orders required Sanchez's approval in each instance.

An Army report released in 2004 faulted Sanchez for failing to properly oversee prison operations and said he indirectly contributed to some of the abuses. But the Army said in April 2005 that an inspector general's investigation cleared Sanchez of accusations of dereliction of duty in his oversight of prison operations in Iraq.

During a retirement ceremony at Fort Sam Houston in Texas on Wednesday, Sanchez's colleagues praised his tenure. Gen. John Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command, said, “I've never stood by a better soldier in tougher times.”

Sanchez's former commander in Europe, retired general Wesley Clark, told the San Antonio Express- News that Sanchez was “a fine officer.” Clark sought the 2004 Democratic presidential nomination.

The taint of Abu Ghraib would have made it difficult for Sanchez to win the necessary Senate approval for a promotion, said Lawrence Korb, an assistant Defense secretary in the Reagan administration.

“The (Bush) administration didn't want to send his name to Congress because they were afraid he would be asked embarrassing questions about Abu Ghraib,” Korb said. He said that while in Iraq, Sanchez had been under pressure from Washington to get better information from prisoners.

Pentagon Widens Its Battle To Shape News Of Iraq War (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0090770

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 — The Pentagon is reorganizing its public affairs operation in an attempt to influence news coverage, amid internal frustration at the tone and substance of reporting on Iraq and on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The expanded office, which was first described by department officials in an informal press briefing on Monday, features a "rapid response unit" to react to news reports. It is also stepping up efforts to arrange appearances by department officials on talk radio and cable television, and to recruit "surrogates" who are not on the department's payroll to defend its policies.

A dozen new staff members have started to work behind a newly installed wall in the Pentagon's press office.

Officials involved say the new effort, which was conceived by Assistant Secretary of Defense Dorrance Smith, is not primarily a response to negative coverage but rather is aimed at more aggressively challenging articles and broadcasts deemed inaccurate and at making better use of podcasts, blogs and other new outlets.

"This is about the Department of Defense keeping the American people better informed about the nature of its operations, its activities, and its policies," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. "We would have to do this even if we were not nation at war."

But officials also concede that much of the effort so far has focused on disputing stories about the war in Iraq and about Mr. Rumsfeld that they deem to be inaccurate. Pentagon officials in recent months have issued a flood of letters to the editor taking issue with accounts of Mr. Rumsfeld's role in setting Iraq strategy, the content of his speeches and other matters of fact and interpretation in newspapers and magazine articles.

They have also begun responding within minutes to live television reports, calling reporters and producers to challenge their accuracy.

The overhaul of the public affairs operation, has received a mixed response among some senior military officials at the department, who say it reflects frustration at coverage of the Iraq war.

"They are completely consumed with trying to control the message on Iraq," said a senior military officer. "This is an attempt to communicate directly with the American people without having to go through the traditional media. I don't know if that's possible."

Though some of the techniques have been employed at the Pentagon for years, the new plan expands and formalizes their use.

In so doing, the Pentagon is adopting tactics more often associated with a political campaign, rather than the military, according to current and former officials familiar with the plan.

Among those hired recently is Erin Healy, a former White House press spokeswoman, who has been brought on as a consultant to improve the department's booking of radio and television appearances, according to Ms. Healy and Mr. Whitman. She began working for President Bush during his first campaign, in 2000, she said.

Mr. Smith is a former ABC News television producer who also worked in Baghdad as a media adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Barbara Starr, a veteran Pentagon correspondent for CNN, said she was surprised last month to be challenged by press officers within minutes after completing a report on a Baghdad briefing where the military's top spokesman called the results of recent security operations "disheartening." Ms. Starr said she had called it a "stunning development" on the air.

"They objected to the tone during my live shot," she said. "My view is that if a general says things are disheartening, that is news."

Mr. Whitman said he was not aware of the incident but said that he had challenged the content of television broadcasts before and that it had nothing to do with the reorganization of the press office.

Initial plans and goals for the new public affairs organizations were spelled out in documents dated in August, including a set of slides for Mr. Smith to use in briefing Mr. Rumsfeld on the proposed operation.

As described by a Defense Department official who had access to the briefing slides, four new public affairs groups were to be organized, with a roster of about 27 people, including political appointees and contractors.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said Thursday that he was not familiar with specifics of the Pentagon public affairs reorganization. But Mr. Levin said he was not surprised by what he termed "an effort to turn around their message delivery."

"I don't think anything is going to work except changing the facts," he said.

Mr. Rumsfeld has long been critical of the government's efforts to respond to information disseminated by people sympathetic to Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups, who make use of the Internet and other technology networks and, as Mr. Rumsfeld often says, are not bound by rules of accuracy.

Some elements of the operation, like letter-writing campaigns and demands for corrections, are increasingly commonplace in organized efforts to sway the press.

The Pentagon operation would go a step further, sometimes posting the correspondence on Defense Department Web sites.

In a sign that the department is having at least some success at bypassing traditional news media, Mr. Whitman said more people every month were downloading podcasts produced by the department about military affairs. Last month, the number of downloads was 219,000, up from 103,000 in April.

Seeking Options On Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Following Tuesday's elections, President Bush will face some of the most difficult decisions of his presidency as he struggles to craft a strategy for dealing with the ruinous mess in Iraq. He will have to do what he has sometimes found hardest: make a decisive choice among conflicting recommendations from his advisers.

The coming policy debate will be shaped by the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton. But it will also involve basic conflicts that have emerged in the past year over Middle East strategy -- for which the rough Beltway shorthand would be Condoleezza Rice's State Department vs. the office of Vice President Cheney.

The central question for Bush is the one that's likely to be at the center of the Baker-Hamilton recommendations: Is America's best hope for stabilizing Iraq a broad effort to resolve tensions in the Middle East, including the Arab-Israeli dispute? This comprehensive regional approach to Iraq is controversial for two reasons: The United States would have to engage Iraq's troublesome neighbors, Iran and Syria; and it would have to push Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians as part of a broader peace deal.

A hint that the administration (or at least a faction of it) is considering such an approach came in a Sept. 15 speech by Philip Zelikow, counselor to Rice, at a gathering of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. He talked about the need to maintain a coalition of Europeans and moderate Arabs to solve problems such as Iraq and Iran, and then argued: "What would bind that coalition and help keep them together is a sense that the Arab-Israeli issues are being addressed." His speech led Shmuel Rosner, the chief U.S. correspondent for the Israeli daily Haaretz, to wonder in his blog: "Does it really mean a major shift in U.S. policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict?"

Baker would be an ideal catalyst for such a regional approach, in part because he traveled that road once before with the 1991 Madrid peace conference. That meeting brought together all the major global and regional powers to support a round of peacemaking that led to a treaty between Israel and Jordan, negotiations between Israel and the Syrians, and, eventually, the Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization. To begin exploring the possibility of a new regional dialogue, Baker has already met privately with Iranian and Syrian diplomats.

Some hard-liners are nervous about Baker. A National Security Council staffer commented tartly a few weeks ago that Baker isn't secretary of state and doesn't speak for Bush. And the president himself, though he admires Baker's negotiating skills, worries that an overeager former secretary of state might hop on a plane for Tehran tomorrow if he had his way.

Britain has been testing the waters for a regional approach. Sir Nigel Sheinwald, the top foreign policy adviser to Prime Minister Tony Blair, visited Damascus this week for talks with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and his intelligence chiefs. Sheinwald had visited Washington a week before to plan the trip with senior administration officials who, though skeptical about whether the mission would accomplish much, gave it their blessing.

Sheinwald presented a series of British-U.S. concerns, including Syria's role in providing a base for Iraqi insurgents and recent Syrian threats to destabilize the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. Though the meeting didn't produce any breakthroughs, the atmospherics were said to have been better than expected, and there are hopes for further discussions about security issues.

Administration officials are mum about plans for contacts with Iran. But it's clear they are looking for ways to engage the Iranian regime and explore issues of mutual concern, starting with the deteriorating situation in Baghdad.

The hornet's nest at the center of the Middle East is Iraq. On this core issue, the administration is exploring a wide range of options, from changes in basic military strategy to whom to pick as the next Centcom commander. The administration had hoped to persuade Marine Gen. James Jones, the retiring NATO commander, to take the job. He would be a popular choice inside and outside the military, but he is said to be wary.

Israelis are watching the Washington policy debate carefully. There is concern that the administration might try to make Israel the "fall guy" for America's problems with Iraq and Iran. But several of the Israelis who are closest to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert say privately that the current power vacuum in the region hurts Israel most of all and that America must regain the strategic momentum, even if that means talking to its adversaries. Stay tuned to see if Bush opts for a "November surprise."

DOJ_NMG_0090772

Afghan Farmers Likely To Match Harvest (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, November 2, 2006

Afghan farmers now planting opium poppies will probably reap a harvest comparable to this year's record crop, in part because insurgents are preventing effective counter-narcotics work, officials said Thursday.

Planting is under way in southern regions responsible for the bulk of the estimated 6,100 tons of Afghan opium produced in the 2005-06 growing season. Anti-drug officials say that despite anti-cultivation campaigns, they foresee little improvement by harvest time next spring.

Drug production has skyrocketed since a U.S.-led offensive toppled the Taliban regime five years ago for giving refuge to Osama bin Laden and al-Qaida camps. Last spring's poppy harvest accounted for 92 percent of the global opium supply and was enough to make 610 tons of heroin — more than all the world's addicts consume in a year.

Police and government officials are deeply implicated in the trade, which adds to the corruption and lawlessness threatening Afghanistan's fledgling democracy. Taliban militiamen had all but eradicated opium cultivation by 2000 but now profit from it, protecting poppy farmers.

Deteriorating security in the countryside makes it difficult to monitor how much poppy has been planted, a senior U.S. official said. Taliban-led militants have increased attacks this year, particularly in Afghanistan's southern opium heartland.

Gen. Khodaidad, a deputy minister in Afghanistan's Ministry of Counter-Narcotics, said some provincial governors and police chiefs have been doing effective anti-drug work.

"But unfortunately, in some provinces, especially in the south and southwest, we haven't been doing as well," said Khodaidad, who like many Afghans uses one name. "The reason is very clear — fighting. Some of the districts are under the influence of the Taliban or al-Qaida."

Khodaidad said he hoped for a successful anti-cultivation campaign this fall followed by an eradication campaign in the new year, but he said he couldn't promise a reduction in the harvest. "I can tell you there will be no increase," he said.

However, the senior U.S. official said the new poppy crop probably will be similar to the one planted a year ago, "maybe a little under — we were so high last year." He spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak on the record.

The United Nations' anti-drug chief said recently that proceeds from Afghan opium production are being used to finance terrorist groups. The U.S. official said the country's drug trade was a $3.1 billion business this year and it doesn't "take much of that to fund terrorism."

Seeking to counter corruption that hinders anti-drug efforts, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency is training special units of Afghan policemen who must pass polygraph exams and investigations of their backgrounds, Karen P. Tandy, the DEA administrator, said during a visit Sunday.

"DEA is very accustomed to working in countries where corruption is rampant," she said. "We have a method that has been extremely successful. ... You have patriots in every country who care about the future of their country, and that is no less true here in Afghanistan."

Khodaidad said President Hamid Karzai has warned government officials they will be removed if they help drug trafficking. He said a district chief and an administrator from the same district in Badakhshan, a remote and rugged northern province favored by drug producers, were recently fired.

The U.S. official said if there is no reduction in the opium harvest this year, Afghanistan would come under strong U.S. pressure to start spraying poppy fields with herbicide, an idea that Afghans, including Karzai, deeply oppose because of fears the chemicals could harm people.

U.S. Warhead Testing Behind Schedule, IG Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

"Significant backlogs" in surveillance testing of several types of nuclear warheads in the aging U.S. stockpile have created gaps in information needed to ensure that the weapons remain reliable, a report released yesterday by the Energy Department's inspector general said.

Every year, a small number of missile warheads and bombs from the nine U.S. nuclear weapons systems are dismantled. Parts are subjected to laboratory and flight tests to verify they are safe, secure and reliable.

DOJ_NMG_0090773

"The surveillance program's role in assessing and ensuring confidence in the reliability of the weapons stockpile is increasingly important as the nuclear weapons stockpile ages," Inspector General Gregory H. Friedman wrote to Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman.

But Friedman added: "As a result of the continuing backlog of surveillance tests, the department lacks vital information about the reliability of the stockpile . . . [and] as a result of testing delays, important operating anomalies or other defects could go undetected."

Friedman said the department is "committed" to eliminating most of the testing backlog by September 2007, in part by upgrading facilities, updating safety studies and perhaps eliminating some test requirements. In one case, surveillance activities were delayed for six to seven months in 2004 because operations were halted over the loss of a computer disk containing classified materials.

Last year, the report said, laboratory tests were behind schedule for seven of the nine weapons systems and flight tests for six. Charts contained in the report show the greatest laboratory backlog was in the oldest warhead, the W-62, which was used on the Minuteman III intercontinental ballistic missile and is due for retirement. Of 36 lab tests planned, 13 had been completed by Sept. 30, 2005, the report said.

Of the more modern warheads, the W-88, the newest U.S. warhead found on the Trident submarine-launched ICBM, was scheduled for 29 lab tests -- of which 23 were completed on schedule. The largest gap in flight tests was for the W-87, the warhead that is to replace the W-62 and the Minuteman III. Of eight tests planned for fiscal 2005, three had been completed.

Some Opt Out Of Military Options (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, November 3, 2006

LINCOLNSHIRE, Ill. — Brian Berman, a senior at Stevenson High School, doesn't want to join the military, doesn't want calls from recruiters, doesn't want them at his door.

So his parents signed a form that prevents the school from giving his contact information to recruiters. A provision of the No Child Left Behind law requires high schools to share students' names, phone numbers and addresses with military recruiters unless students or their parents choose to opt out.

Recruiters still come to school, he says, and “try to act all friendly.” Berman, 18, doesn't buy their pitches about career and educational opportunities. “It's ridiculous,” he says. “They're trying to bribe you to enlist.”

Pentagon officials say recruiters just want the same information that goes to colleges and companies to make career pitches to students.

If Berman's parents had not signed the form, the school would be required to share his contact information with military recruiters under the 2001 law.

More than half of the nearly 4,500 students at Stevenson in this north Chicago suburb have submitted the forms. Schools that don't comply risk losing federal funds. None have so far.

The Pentagon and the Education Department don't track how many students ask not to be contacted by military recruiters. Opponents of the practice are spreading the word that parents must take action if they object:

·A conference called “Education Not Militarization!” will be held Saturday in Los Angeles. Arlene Inouye, a high-school teacher and founder of the Coalition Against Militarism in Our Schools, says the group has members in 50 schools who make sure parents and students know their rights.

Lupe Lujan of San Gabriel, Calif., got involved in the group after her son Samuel, then 17, showed up at home a couple years ago with a military recruiter to get Samuel's Social Security card, needed to take a military aptitude test. “I was very happy to tell the recruiter, ‘You're not taking my son,' ” Lujan says.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed a bill this fall that would have required schools to include an opt-out box to check on student emergency-contact cards. Some schools mail notices about opting out to parents, others send them home with students.

·Parents and peace activists in Montgomery County, Md., distributed opt-out forms to parents at back-to-school nights this fall.

·In Duluth, Minn., the Parent Teacher Student Association Council persuaded high schools to push back the deadline to turn in the forms from Oct. 1 to Nov. 1 and stepped up efforts to make parents aware of the requirement.

·The National PTA supports changing the federal law so recruiters could not approach students unless their parents “opt in” and request such contact.

DOJ_NMG_0090774

Marine Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, says the law doesn't give the military an edge over other institutions interested in giving students career choices. It requires schools to "provide military recruiters the same access that's provided to colleges and other prospective employers," he says.

Douglas Smith, a spokesman for the Army Recruiting Command at Fort Knox in Kentucky, says recruiters want to work with the schools. "The idea is to have a strong personal and professional relationship with your schools," he says.

Students who submit the opt-out forms, Smith says, aren't necessarily precluding all contact. "It means that the school isn't going to give us that student contact information," he says. "It doesn't mean the recruiter might not contact the student anyway."

Recruiters can get students' names from other sources, such as career days at schools. If a student calls a military branch's toll-free number, responds to a letter or asks for information online, recruiters can make contact, Smith says.

Juniors and seniors are the focus of recruiters from all military branches. At Stevenson, recruiters organize exercise competitions and give prizes such as key chains and T-shirts.

That doesn't bother Kris Ozga, 17, a senior. His parents didn't sign the opt-out form, and he gets calls from recruiters, even on his cellphone. "They're like, 'Oh, have you even thought about enlisting?' " he says. He did think about it, but he's pursuing a college baseball scholarship.

He didn't like some recruiters' style. "Sometimes they don't back off," he says.

Kareem Miller, 17, didn't opt out and sometimes gets three or four calls a month. "It doesn't really bother anybody," he says. "It might make people worry, though, if there's a draft."

Recruiting high school students isn't new. Pam Polakow, whose son attended Stevenson before the law took effect in 2002, says military recruiters were "extremely persistent" when he was in school, calling at least once a week. "I was very uncomfortable," she says.

Daniel Mater, 17, a Stevenson senior, says his parents signed the form. "They made the decision, but I never had any interest in the military," he says. "It saves me time."

Senior Gino Ciarroni, 18, has been talking to recruiters from the Army, Marines and Navy. "I'm interested in serving my country," he says, "and getting help with college." He's had trouble, though, getting answers about what military job he would qualify for and how much money he'd get for college.

Recruiters gave him their cellphone numbers and seem to be "there to help," he says. He's considering joining the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Senior Robert Warren, 17, doesn't mind the calls. "They're very respectful," he says. "When I told them I'm not interested, they stopped calling."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-CEO Gets 12 Years (AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press

AP, November 3, 2006

Judge Also Fines Former Computer Associates Leader $8 Million In Fraud Scandal

NEW YORK -- The former chief executive of Computer Associates International Inc. was sentenced to 12 years in prison and fined $8 million on Thursday in an accounting fraud scandal estimated to have cost investors $400 million at one of the world's largest software companies.

Sanjay Kumar, 44, had pleaded guilty in April to obstruction of justice and securities fraud charges at the company, which since has been renamed CA Inc.

"I know that I was wrong and there was no excuse for my conduct," Kumar told the judge while reading impassively from a statement at his sentencing at federal court in Brooklyn. "I do apologize for my mistakes and ask for forgiveness from all involved."

Under federal sentencing guidelines, Kumar could have faced life in prison, but the judge called that punishment unreasonable.

Prosecutor Eric Komitee argued that Kumar should be severely punished as the architect of an elaborate cover-up that was "the most brazen in the modern era of corporate crime."

The defense sought leniency by detailing Kumar's "meteoric" rise from Sri Lankan immigrant to one of the "great minds" of the software industry, and by emphasizing his philanthropic efforts, including a "Save the Elephants" campaign in Kenya.

DOJ_NMG_0090775

U.S. District Judge Leo Glasser scolded the defendant for not fully acknowledging that the conspiracy cost shareholders an estimated $400 million. Though not a violent criminal, Kumar "did violence to the legitimate expectations of shareholders," the judge said.

Kumar was ordered to surrender on Feb. 27. He left the courthouse without speaking to reporters.

According to a 2004 indictment, Kumar orchestrated a plot to report more than $2 billion in false revenue between 1999 and 2000.

Prosecutors said he was so involved in the scheme, he once flew on a corporate jet to Paris in July 1999 to finalize a $19 million deal and signed a contract that had been backdated.

The indictment also charged that Kumar and other executives instructed salespeople to complete deals after the quarter had closed - a practice known within the company as the "35-day month" - and "cleaned up" contracts by removing time stamps from faxes.

After the FBI began investigating the company in 2002, Kumar orchestrated a cover-up that involved lying under oath about the "35-day month" and trying to buy the silence of a potential witness, authorities said.

With 15,000 employees worldwide, CA Inc. is now the world's fifth-largest software provider.

"The sentencing of Sanjay Kumar today is another step in putting the past of Computer Associates further behind the new CA," company spokeswoman Jennifer Hallahan said.

"We are a dramatically different organization than we were more than two years ago, when Mr. Kumar left the company."

Former CA CEO Sanjay Kumar Gets 12 Years In Prison (COMPW)

Computerworld, November 3, 2006

Sanjay Kumar, the former CEO of CA, has been sentenced to 12 years in federal prison for his role in a financial scandal at the company that prematurely reported $US2.2 billion in software licensing revenue between 1999 to 2000.

Kumar, who resigned from CA in June 2004 after the scandal unfolded, was also hit with an $US8 million fine by Judge I. Leo Grasser in US District Court in Brooklyn, NY, at his sentencing.

Kumar would remain free on bond until Grasser decides the issue of restitution to the victims of the accounting scandal, a spokesperson in the US Attorney's Office in Brooklyn said.

The prison where Kumar will serve his sentence has not yet been announced. A recommendation will be made by the court and a final decision will be made by the US Bureau of Prisons.

"The integrity of US financial markets depends on corporate executives accurately reporting their companies' performance to the investing public," US Attorney, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, said in a statement. "In violation of the shareholders' trust and the federal securities laws, [Kumar] persistently misrepresented the company's financial position and orchestrated a pervasive cover-up scheme. The sentence imposed today sends the message that accounting fraud is a serious crime and that obstructing justice will inevitably make things worse, not better, for defendants under investigation."

Assistant director-in-charge of the FBI's New York Field Office, which assisted in the CA accounting investigation, Mark J. Mershon, said in a statement that the sentence fit Kumar's crimes.

"Today, justice looked Mr. Kumar in the face and held him accountable for presiding over one of the largest accounting fraud schemes on record," Mershon said. "His deliberate misstatements of over $US2 billion of Computer Associates' revenue caused an elevation of the company's stock price, but when the scheme collapsed, no one fell harder than the investors who made good faith purchases of the company's stock."

The losses to CA's shareholders from the illegal accounting actions amounted to more than $US400 million, according to the government. The defendants admitted that they inflated the quarterly revenue and earnings of the company by keeping its books open past their normal quarterly ending dates. That made it look like the company had met or exceeded its quarterly revenue projections, when in fact the revenue had actually fallen short of those targets. Kumar pleaded guilty in April to all eight federal charges against him, including securities fraud, obstruction of justice and perjury.

He could have received a maximum of 90 years in prison based on the statutory maximums under the law, the US Attorney's Office spokesperson said. CA's former worldwide sales chief, Stephen Richards, also pleaded guilty to identical charges in April and is still awaiting sentencing. His sentence date had yet to be set, the spokesperson said.

Kumar and Richards were charged with prematurely reporting $US2.2 billion in revenue for licensing agreements during fiscal quarters in which the deals had not yet been finalised, according to the government. The government's indictment asserted that the two men knowingly distorted CA's accounting and took steps to hide their actions.

In early 2000, for instance, CA signed a $US44.5 million license deal with a "nearly insolvent" customer in which it also had an ownership stake. It then back-dated the contract so it could be recorded in the prior quarter, according to the indictment. In the next quarter, expecting that it would not be able to collect on the contract, CA reversed the revenue in its internal records but did not publicly restate its results.

DOJ_NMG_0090776

Kumar was also accused of authorising a $US3.7 million consulting contract in early 2003 that essentially amounted to hush money for an unnamed executive at a CA customer company who knew of CA's accounting improprieties. According to the indictment, this executive had arranged a $US27 million license contract with CA in March 2000, but as part of the deal, CA spent a similar amount on software from the executive's company. Neither software package was ever used, making the deal a "revenue swap" that can't legally be treated as a sale.

When the unidentified executive threatened to alert government investigators to the arrangement, Kumar conspired with CA's general counsel to arrange the consulting payoff, the indictment said.

Former CA Chief Gets 12 Years In Jail (FT)

By Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

Sanjay Kumar, the former chief executive of Computer Associates, was sentenced to 12 years in federal prison and fined $8m on Thursday for his role in a $2.2bn accounting fraud at the New York-based business software firm.

Kumar, aged 44, had faced up to life in prison after pleading guilty in April to charges including conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice at the company, which since has been renamed CA.

The sentence was imposed after Assistant US Attorney Eric Komitee told Judge Leo Glasser that Kumar's actions represented "the most brazen and comprehensive obstruction in the modern era of corporate crime."

Judge Glasser said though Kumar was not a violent criminal, he "did violence to the legitimate expectations of shareholders."

As part of the accounting scheme, Kumar improperly booked software license revenue from 1999 to 2000 in order to meet Wall Street analysts' profit expectations and then lied to investigators about it, investigators said.

According to the indictment, the former CA chief executive was so involved with adding false revenue to a financial quarter after it closed that he flew on a corporate jet to Paris in July 1999 to finalize a $19 million deal and signed a contract that had been backdated.

The indictment also charged that Kumar and other executives instructed salespeople to complete deals after the quarter had closed - a practice known within the company as the '35-day month' – and then 'cleaned up' contracts by removing time stamps from faxes.

After the US Federal Bureau of Investigations began investigating the company in 2002, prosecutors said Kumar orchestrated a cover-up that involved lying under oath about the '35-day month' and other frauds and trying to buy the silence of a potential witness, authorities said.

Kumar, who stepped down as chairman and chief executive of Computer Associates in April 2004 after the full scale of the fraud became apparent, told the judge at his sentencing, "I know that I was wrong and there was no excuse for my conduct." He was ordered to surrender on February 27.

After the fraud was discovered Computer Associates restated its results for fiscal 2001 through 2004, agreed to pay $225m in shareholder restitution and continues to cooperate with the government as part of a deferred prosecution agreement.

Lawyers for Kumar, who is also a former co-owner of the New York Islanders hockey team, described him as one of the "great minds" of the software industry who turned Computer Associates into a thriving enterprise. "I hope the court will not lose sight of the good he did for that company," said attorney John Cooney.

¦William Sorin, the former general counsel of Comverse, the voicemail software group, yesterday became the company's second top executive to plead guilty to charges stemming from options backdating, Kevin Allison reports from San Francisco.

He faces up to five years in jail. Last week, Daniel Kreinberg, Comverse's former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty to backdating charges as part of a plea deal. Authorities are seeking custody of Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, Comverse's founder and former chief executive, who is also facing fraud charges.

Mr Sorin will be sentenced in February.

Former Tech Exec To Serve 12 Years (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 3, 2006

In yet another sign that the court system has little mercy for executives who've done wrong, a federal judge imposed a 12-year prison sentence on Sanjay Kumar, the former CEO of Computer Associates, who pleaded guilty in April to manipulating CA's earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0090777

In addition to the prison sentence, U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser ordered Kumar to pay an $8 million fine.

While Kumar's sentence is less than half of the terms doled out to former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers (25 years) and former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling (24 years, 4 months), it struck some observers as harsh because:

·Kumar pleaded guilty without putting the government through a trial, which was not the case with Ebbers and Skilling.

·CA executives padded the company's quarterly earnings by tapping into future earnings but never fabricated income out of whole cloth.

"That's a huge sentence," says David Gourevitch, a Manhattan attorney. "A few short years ago, conduct like this might barely have merited a regulatory sanction, if that. It's a reflection of how far the pendulum has swung against corporate executives."

Even though Kumar pleaded guilty, he fought the government for years and obstructed a criminal investigation into accounting practices at CA. He pleaded guilty only two weeks before his trial was scheduled to begin. If he'd been convicted at trial, Kumar easily could have faced more than 20 years in prison.

"If you don't cooperate with the government, the government will be punitive," says Jack Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University. "If you take the court's time, the court will take your time."

Kumar, an immigrant from Sri Lanka, joined CA in 1987 and rose to CEO in 2000. Prosecutors from the U.S. Attorney's office in Brooklyn accused him of ordering his subordinates to keep the company's quarterly books open even after the particular quarter had closed. Prosecutors said the bogus accounting cost investors more than $3 billion.

Former CA Chief Is Sentenced To 12-Year Prison Term, Fined (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Former Computer Associates International Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar, who helped build a software powerhouse only to embroil it in one of the biggest accounting scandals of the decade, was sentenced to 12 years in prison and fined $8 million for securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

The sentencing is the latest in a string of lengthy prison terms for white-collar criminals partly spurred by a spate of accounting scandals that lost investors billions of dollars in stock-market value earlier in the decade. Last month, former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison, while former WorldCom Inc. chief Bernard Ebbers is serving 25 years in prison.

Still, the judge overseeing the case in a Brooklyn, N.Y., court had the option of sentencing him to up to a lifetime in prison. Attorneys for Mr. Kumar didn't say whether they would try to appeal the sentence.

Mr. Kumar's former company, now known as CA Inc., continues to grapple with the fallout from the accounting scandal. Late yesterday afternoon, CA said it expects earnings per share to be below its original outlook as a result of restructuring costs. CA shares fell 7.4% in after-hours trading.

Mr. Kumar pleaded guilty in April to charges that he created what prosecutors called "35-day months" to book extra revenue after a quarter ended and a subsequent cover-up that included offering a no-work contract to a potential witness to keep him quiet. Under the fraud, the company misreported some $2.2 billion in revenue, according to federal securities officials.

"I stand before your honor today to take full responsibility for my actions," Mr. Kumar, who is 44 years old, told U.S. District Court Judge I. Leo Glasser. "I know that I was wrong and there's no excuse for my conduct." Mr. Kumar declined to comment after the sentencing, except to say he was "ready to move on."

COURT DOCUMENTS

1

Read Sanjay Kumar's original indictment (pdf file)2, by arrangement with FindLaw3.

Born in poverty in Sri Lanka, Mr. Kumar emigrated to the U.S. with his family and by the age of 38 rose to chief executive of the world's second-biggest maker of mainframe-computer software, getting stock awards that were worth hundreds of millions of dollars at one time.

Judge Glasser said that under federal sentencing guidelines he could have given Mr. Kumar a lifetime sentence. But he said such a long sentence would "shock the conscience of this court." Sentencing factors included the eight-count indictment to which he pleaded guilty and the economic harm of his actions, which Judge Glasser said exceeded $400 million.

Mr. Kumar will be eligible for time off for good behavior that could reduce his sentence by 15%, meaning that he will serve a minimum of just over 10 years. Parole isn't a part of the federal penal system.

EXECUTIVES ON TRIAL

· Legal Banter: Has Government Gone too Far in the War on Corporate Crime?4

11/01/06

DOJ_NMG_0090778

· Sanjay Kumar Awaits His Sentence5
10/28/06
· White-Collar Crime: Who's Doing Time6
· Complete Coverage: Skilling, Ebbers, Scrushy and More7

Judge Glasser postponed sending Mr. Kumar to a minimum-security federal prison until the end of February. He said he wants to rule first on the amount of restitution shareholders and other victims should get from Mr. Kumar. Judge Glasser said he might change the fine depending on whether funds are needed for restitution. It isn't clear what Mr. Kumar's current financial situation is.

Mr. Kumar's attorneys had argued for a more lenient sentence on the grounds that CA, based in Islandia, N.Y., is still in business, unlike Enron and WorldCom, which filed for bankruptcy protection. CA agreed in 2004 to pay $225 million in restitution and operate under a special examiner's supervision to avoid prosecution

The defense said that almost all the revenue that CA booked early was real revenue that should have been accounted for a few weeks later. They noted that Mr. Kumar had shown contrition by pleading guilty before a trial started.

U.S. prosecutor Eric Komitee said CA represented the "most blatant example" among recent corporate scandals of "a sitting CEO directing a comprehensive scheme" to obstruct justice.

Judge Glasser said "securities fraud...did violence to the legitimate expectation of investors." He said it was clear that Mr. Kumar had falsified results to fulfill Wall Street expectations for earnings and that the stock would have plunged if the bookings had been delayed to the next quarter.

Several other executives, who pleaded guilty and cooperated with prosecutors, await sentencing. Among them are CA's former general counsel and its former chief financial officer.

CA Inc. said net income for its second quarter ended Sept. 30 rose to $53 million, or nine cents a share, from $46 million, or eight cents a share, from a year earlier. The company said its earnings excluding restructuring costs remained flat at 25 cents a share.

CA said revenue rose to $996 million from $950 million.

CA sees total restructuring charges of $150 million, most of which are to be recognized in fiscal 2007, and a reduction in work force of 1,400 positions, including 300 related to divestiture of a joint venture. The company also expects to eliminate an additional 300 positions through attrition.

Ex-Leader Of Computer Associates Gets 12-Year Sentence And Fine (NYT)

By Michael J. De La Merced
The New York Times, November 3, 2006

The former chief executive of Computer Associates International, Sanjay Kumar, was sentenced yesterday to 12 years in prison for orchestrating a $2.2 billion accounting fraud at the software company. He was also fined $8 million.

Because he pleaded guilty in April to securities fraud and obstruction of justice charges, Mr. Kumar, 44, had faced a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

The judge, I. Leo Glasser, of the Federal District Court in Brooklyn, described such a punishment as excessive. But he repeatedly rebuked Mr. Kumar for helping inflate the company's sales figures in 1999 and 2000, as well as lying to federal investigators and authorizing a bribe to a potential witness.

"This shocked the conscience of this court, and I dare believe it shocked the conscience of any reasonable person," Judge Glasser said.

The sentence came down after a nearly two-hour hearing in which Mr. Kumar again apologized to the court.

"I stand before the court today to accept full responsibility for my actions," said Mr. Kumar, wearing a tie and charcoal gray suit. "I deeply regret the actions I took."

Joining Mr. Kumar in the courtroom were his wife, father and two sisters, as well as a phalanx of lawyers. His two daughters stayed home. Upon hearing the verdict, neither Mr. Kumar nor his family betrayed any emotion.

Kirby D. Behre, a partner at the law firm of Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker and a former federal prosecutor, said he considered Mr. Kumar's sentence stiff but just. "It's a far cry from a life sentence, but it's still a decade behind bars," Mr. Behre said.

Mr. Kumar is the latest convicted chief executive to receive a lengthy prison sentence in recent years.

Jeffrey K. Skilling, the former chief executive of Enron, was sentenced last week to 24 years and four months in prison, while Bernard J. Ebbers last year received 25 years in prison.

Mr. Kumar's fine, the judge said, has been deferred until restitution is determined next year. Mr. Kumar is scheduled to report to prison on Feb. 27.

DOJ_NMG_0090779

At the hearing, his main lawyer, John P. Cooney Jr., requested that Mr. Kumar serve his prison term at the Federal Correctional Institution in Fairton, N.J., a medium- and minimum-security prison 40 miles west of Atlantic City. After the hearing, Mr. Cooney said his client had not yet decided whether to appeal the sentence.

The four-year investigation of Computer Associates, now CA, centered on backdated contracts that artificially inflated profits. Computer Associates, based in Islandia, N.Y., entered into a deferred prosecution agreement to avoid indictment in 2004; in it, the company agreed to pay $225 million to a shareholder restitution fund and agreed to government monitoring for two years.

Seven other Computer Associates executives have pleaded guilty to fraud charges. Stephen Richards, the company's former top salesman, pleaded guilty in April alongside Mr. Kumar; he is to be sentenced on Nov. 14.

The second-largest provider of software for mainframe computers, Computer Associates had tremendous success during the 1990s, largely under the leadership of Mr. Kumar and the company's founder, Charles B. Wang.

Mr. Kumar was compensated handsomely in return: in 1998, he netted a $330 million bonus, one of the largest paydays of any American executive.

Once hailed as a Horatio Alger success story, Mr. Kumar arrived in the United States at the age of 14 after his family fled Sri Lanka. Joining Computer Associates in 1987 at the age of 25, Mr. Kumar earned promotions quickly: he became president and chief operating officer in 1994, and in 2000 he assumed the role of chief executive. Two years later, he added the title of chairman after Mr. Wang resigned.

But as the government's investigation stepped up, Mr. Kumar came under scrutiny. He stepped down as chairman in April 2004, taking the title of chief software architect, until he finally severed all ties to the company two months later.

Details have since emerged of the dubious accounting practices that helped fuel Computer Associates' once-soaring stock price. For instance, the company rolled sales figures from new quarters into previous earnings figures, a practice employees called the 35-day month. Prosecutors also said that Mr. Kumar repeatedly lied to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and his own lawyers, and that he approved a $3.7 million payment to silence a potential witness.

"This was the most brazen and comprehensive obstruction in the modern era of corporate crime," said Eric Komitee, the assistant United States attorney in charge of the case.

At the sentencing, Mr. Cooney detailed Mr. Kumar's philanthropic efforts as he sought to win leniency for his client: donations to tsunami relief in Sri Lanka; girls' education programs in Kenya; emergency medical support to victims of the 1998 embassy bombings, also in Kenya; and programs to help scientists track elephant herds in Africa.

But Judge Glasser said that federal sentencing guidelines did not permit him to consider charity work in determining punishment.

The judge also questioned several statements by Mr. Kumar and his lawyer that suggested the former executive had fully accepted responsibility for his actions. The judge cited the timing of Mr. Kumar's guilty plea — two weeks before his trial was to have begun — as well as Mr. Kumar's continued denial that he erased potentially incriminating data from a laptop computer.

Jennifer Hallahan, a spokeswoman for Computer Associates, said the company sought to move beyond the Kumar era.

"We are a dramatically different organization than we were more than two years ago, when Mr. Kumar left the company," she said.

She added that the company was still seeking to obtain any "ill-gotten gains" from former executives.

Kumar Gets 12 Years In CA Fraud Case (NSDY)

By Bob Kessler, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, November 3, 2006

Saying that Sanjay Kumar's initial rise to prominence because of his talent had been "the embodiment of the American dream," a judge Thursday sentenced the former Computer Associates chairman and chief executive to 12 years in prison for then allowing his "cupidity" to lead him to mastermind and then cover up a massive accounting fraud.

Kumar, 44, who pleaded guilty in April to conspiracy, fraud, obstruction of justice, lying in filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and lying to FBI agents, also was ordered by U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser in the U.S. District Court in Brooklyn to pay an $8 million fine and pay restitution to be determined later that could run into the hundreds of millions of dollars. Federal prosecutors say the fraud cost stockholders over $3 billion.

Before he was sentenced, Kumar told the judge, "I stand before you today to take full responsibility for my actions. I know that I was wrong."

Kumar had asked for a lenient sentence because, he has claimed, the fraud amounted essentially to moving around legitimate sales, and that he had a long history of philanthropies on Long Island, and in Africa, India, and his native Sri Lanka.

But the lead federal prosecutor in the case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Komitee, called Kumar's attempt to cover up his actions by lying, getting other employees to lie and bribing one possible witness "the most brazen and comprehensive obstruction of justice in the modern era of corporate crime."

Glasser noted the recommended federal sentencing guidelines called for a sentence of life in prison, because of the nature of the scheme, the extent of the attempt to cover it up, and the amount of the losses.

Glasser approvingly outlined Kumar's rise from being a poor Sri Lankan immigrant to the head of Islandia-based Computer Associates, one of the Fortune 500 companies, by the age of 40. But in the end, Glasser said that Kumar only had his greed to blame for his crimes.

Glasser disputed Kumar's claim that the loss at the company, now known as CA, was negligible, saying he found "persuasively cogent" a government economist's testimony that the loss was at least in "the hundreds of millions of dollars." The judge also said that he found convincing a government expert's testimony that part of the cover-up involved Kumar deleting files in his own computer and then denying he had done so.

But in the end Glasser said that although he could theoretically impose a life sentence, he found it too harsh and "would shock the conscience of this court and shock the conscience ... of a reasonable person." He did not further explain the precise reason for the actual jail time imposed.

But the 12-year sentence was in the range that a number of lawyers who had followed the case had predicted.

George Stamboulidis, one former federal prosecutor, who is now a prominent defense lawyer, called the sentence "just right." Stamboulidis noted that executives of Enron, WorldCom and Tyco who had been sentenced recently for similar white-collar crimes got what he termed "barbaric sentences" of more than 20 years.

Kumar has until Feb. 27 to surrender to begin serving his sentence. It is unclear where he will be incarcerated.

Two Bond Traders To Leave UBS Amid SEC Probe (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Two senior bond traders are negotiating the terms of their departures from the Wall Street arm of UBS AG amid an unfolding investigation by regulators into possible manipulation of Treasury-securities prices, according to people familiar with the matter.

The UBS traders -- who focus on the so-called repurchase-agreement, or repo market, in which bonds are used as collateral for short-term loans -- are no longer working on the trading desk, according to a person close to the matter. They worked in a Stamford, Conn., office of the U.S. securities arm of the Swiss bank.

The departures are related to a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation into possible improper trading in the Treasury markets at UBS. The investigators are focusing on trading that took place in February, according to a person close to the matter.

One of the traders, Phillip B. Smith, a managing director, has been at UBS for nine years. The other trader, Robert T. Fischetti, an executive director, has been at the bank for six years. It isn't clear precisely what events led to their expected departures. Calls to the residences of each individual weren't returned.

No regulator has alleged wrongdoing by any individual or at any specific bank.

UBS wouldn't comment "on the details of personnel matters at the bank," said a spokesman. The firm declined to provide contact information for the traders or the names of their attorneys.

Investment banks, hedge funds, mutual funds and other investors use the repo market to borrow large sums of cash, sometimes at low rates, and the Federal Reserve uses the market to help manage short-term interest rates.

Regulators are concerned that Treasury-securities prices were possibly being manipulated. The activity allegedly involved traders controlling the supply of certain Treasury issues, making it hard for others to obtain them, and then profiting by lending out those securities in the repo market at favorable interest rates.

In September, a Treasury Department official publicly warned dealers about market manipulation. On Monday, officials from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York will meet with 22 bond dealers to discuss their concerns about activity in this market.

The focus by regulators has already had an impact on the bond market. For the first time in many months, very few bonds are hard to locate, or trade "special."

That means that those interested in lending out bonds through the repo market can no longer do so and receive cash at super-slim interest rates.

"The scrutiny has had a chilling effect on the repo specials market," said David Boberski, an analyst at Bear Stearns, in a report Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0090781

Write to Gregory Zuckerman at gregory.zuckerman@wsj.com1 and Serena Ng at serena.ng@wsj.com2

A Second Comverse Ex-Executive Pleads Guilty (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

The former general counsel of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty in federal court to a criminal conspiracy charge in connection with backdating stock options, and implicated the former chief executive as the mastermind of the scheme.

William F. Sorin, a Harvard Law School graduate, is the second former executive at the New York telecommunications-software firm to plead guilty. The company's former chief financial officer, David Kreinberg, 41 years old, pleaded guilty to securities fraud and conspiracy last week in U.S. District Court.

Messrs. Kreinberg and Sorin are the first two executives to plead guilty in the stock-options backdating scandal that has ensnared more than 130 companies in federal probes. Dozens of executives have lost their jobs.

Mr. Sorin, who turns 58 tomorrow, told Judge Nicholas Garaufis that former Comverse Chief Executive Kobi Alexander first informed him of the backdating plan sometime in the late 1990s. Mr. Sorin said Mr. Alexander told him that he retroactively selected a grant date for stock options by choosing the lowest price of the prior quarter. Mr. Sorin added that the backdating continued to 2002.

"I knew what [Mr. Alexander] was doing was wrong and did not challenge his conduct or share my knowledge with the board of directors and auditors of the company," Mr. Sorin said in court. He said he went along with the scheme out of "the respect I had felt for Mr. Alexander" and "my belief in his importance to the success of the company."

Federal prosecutors in Brooklyn claimed that Mr. Sorin helped with the scheme by, in effect, tricking Comverse board members into approving the backdated grants, by getting them to sign documents with the bogus grant dates already filled in.

Mr. Sorin said that he had earned a reputation for integrity in more than 30 years of legal practice, but in this case "I failed as a lawyer and disserved our shareholders." Mr. Sorin also told the judge that he was seeing a psychiatrist and was taking sleep and anti-anxiety drugs.

Mr. Sorin pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud. He is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 9 and faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Prosecutors are also seeking $51 million in restitution.

In pleading guilty last week, Mr. Kreinberg also pointed the finger at Mr. Alexander, who fled the country ahead of the charges and was arrested in September in Namibia after an international manhunt. Now out on bail, Mr. Alexander is facing an extradition request by the U.S., which has charged him in a 35-count indictment with securities fraud, bribery and other crimes. Mr. Alexander's attorneys have said he will contest the charges if and when he returns to the U.S. An attorney for Mr. Alexander declined to comment regarding the claim that the former chief executive orchestrated the scheme.

Options allow recipients to buy stock at a preset exercise price, generally set at the market price on the day they were granted. Backdating involves pretending that an option was granted on an earlier date when the market price was lower.

Spiegel Ex-Officers Settle SEC Charges In Accounting Case (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Eight former officers and directors of Spiegel Inc. have settled Securities and Exchange Commission charges they helped the catalog retailer conceal deteriorating performance from investors and outside auditors.

The SEC said the company's accounting problems occurred over a two-year period, starting in April 2001. At the time, Spiegel owned retail outlets including Eddie Bauer and Newport News. The former executives settled without admitting or denying the claims and will pay penalties ranging from $100,000 to $170,000 each.

Spiegel itself won't be fined in the matter. The company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in March 2003, soon after the SEC charged it with delaying financial results for nearly a year to conceal financial problems. A partial settlement had left open the question of fines. Spiegel emerged from bankruptcy reorganized around its Eddie Bauer division and is now known as Eddie Bauer Holdings Inc.

"The Spiegel that existed then no longer exists," so the SEC has decided not to pursue claims against the company now, said Peter Chan, assistant regional director in the SEC's office in Chicago.

The SEC said former Spiegel co-presidents Michael Moran and James Sievers, former Chief Executive Martin Zaepfel, former Chief Financial Officer James Cannataro and former Treasurer John Steele authorized higher fees paid from Spiegel retailing subsidiaries to the firm's banking unit, which the SEC said hid weaker performance in Spiegel's credit-card receivables.

DOJ_NMG_0090782

Mr. Zaepfel "is pleased to resolve the matter," said his attorney, Robert Knuts. An attorney for Mr. Cannataro declined to comment. Attorneys for Messrs. Moran, Sievers and Steele couldn't be reached for comment.

SEC Enforcement Cases Decline 9% (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Staff Reduced Because of Budget Crunch

The number of new enforcement cases brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission fell by 9 percent last year as the agency grappled with staffing cuts brought on by a recent budget crunch, according to figures released yesterday.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in a statement that the agency's work in the fiscal year ended Sept. 30 had produced "solid results for investors," including settlements of $800 million with insurance firm American International Group Inc. and $400 million with District mortgage giant Fannie Mae.

The agency's reduced tally of 574 enforcement actions included 91 cases against shell companies that failed to file regular financial reports. That issue has become an SEC priority of late, but pursuing those cases takes less time and fewer resources than most other actions. Former agency lawyers said such cases amount to going after low-hanging fruit.

Cox attributed the decline to temporarily reduced staff levels. The SEC as a whole lost 155 employees last year -- including 43 in the enforcement unit -- compared with fiscal 2005. A total of 3,696 people worked at the agency in 2006, with 1,189 in the enforcement division. The agency is reviewing its staffing levels and plans to restore some of the unfilled positions, officials said.

In recent years, the SEC has faced criticism for failing to uncover widespread accounting fraud at such companies as Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. as well as trading abuses at mutual funds. Those scandals prompted Congress to pour hundreds of millions of dollars into the agency's coffers.

But more recent financial difficulties, including construction overruns on its new headquarters near Union Station, led to a budget shortfall last year and a hiring freeze that only recently has been lifted, officials said.

Law professors and former agency officials who follow the SEC's work said they are closely watching the agency's budget, which held relatively steady at $888 million last year. They said they are hoping it does not suffer further cuts and would prefer to see it grow modestly to accommodate merit raises for current staff members.

Cox told the Senate Banking Committee last summer that the agency did not need more resources to handle the 130 stock option backdating cases it is investigating, a stance that some analysts have questioned.

"Given the budget cutbacks in the number of people in the SEC's enforcement arm, and the ongoing corporate scandals, all investors should be worried," said Lynn E. Turner, a former chief accountant at the agency who is now director of research at the proxy advisory firm Glass, Lewis & Co. "It will put much of the enforcement burden on the shoulders of investors, just as existed before Enron was exposed, contributing to investors losing tens of billions of dollars."

Duke University law professor James D. Cox, who is no relation to the SEC leader, said: "You get what you pay for. It's been clear in the history of the SEC that as the budget goes, so goes enforcement."

Starving the agency throughout the 1990s meant that SEC officials did not have enough people to review the financial reports of the nation's largest companies every three years, an issue that came to light only after Enron collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001 and investors learned that its books had not been examined by regulators.

Joel Seligman, author of a history of the SEC and the president of the University of Rochester, said he is not surprised that the enforcement figures have leveled off given the burst of activity following accounting frauds and mutual fund trading scandals in the past few years.

"I do not have the sense that the SEC is pulling its punches," Seligman said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Questions Two More Former Aides To Harris (SPT)

By Anita Kumar, Times Staff Writer

St Petersburg Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators have interviewed at least two more former chiefs of staff to U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris as part of a federal inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor.

Dan Berger and Ben McKay, who both worked for Harris in her first term and are now lobbyists in Washington, confirmed the interviews this week and said it was their understanding all congressional staff would likely be questioned. The two spoke separately to three investigators from the FBI and the Defense Department in Washington several weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0090783

The Justice and Defense departments are examining Harris' dealings with Mitchell Wade, who made illegal campaign contributions to Harris and paid for at least two dinners with her at a tony Georgetown restaurant that totaled about $6,000. Later Wade asked Harris to help secure $10-million in federal money for a company project in Sarasota.

Federal authorities have subpoenaed records from Harris' U.S. Senate campaign office and have interviewed several former staffers, including senior campaign consultant Ed Rollins, campaign manager Jim Dornan and Mona Tate Yost, a congressional aide who later went to work for Wade.

Harris, a two-term Republican from Longboat Key who has served in Congress since 2002, is running an uphill battle to unseat Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson in Tuesday's election.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra declined to comment this week.

Fred Asbell, who was chief of staff for Harris for about 10 months before leaving in June, was interviewed. Dan Horowitz, who held that position for four months at the end of 2004, said he has not been contacted and does not expect to be.

Horowitz works for the House Small Business Committee.

Calls to Christopher Battle, who worked for Harris for about six months until this spring, were not returned.

Harris' staff did not return messages this week.

Times researcher Angie Drobnic Holan contributed to this report. Anita Kumar can be reached at akumar@sptimes.com or 202 463-0576.

Former Federal Prosecutor Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering, Conspiracy (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 3, 2006

(AP) - RALEIGH, North Carolina-A former U.S. attorney, judge and state Republican chairman pleaded guilty Thursday to charges related to a tax fraud conspiracy.

Sam Currin could face 43 years in prison. He pleading guilty to conspiring to launder more than $1 million (â,¬780,000) through his law firm's client trust account and to lying on his taxes by failing to report an offshore debit card account.

Currin, 57, also pleaded guilty in a related case to obstructing a grand jury investigation into securities fraud by conspiring to withhold documents and provide false testimony.

Prosecutors said Currin and his conspirators sent out fraudulent promotional materials on several publicly traded Nevada companies. When stock prices and trading volumes increased, those participating in the scheme profited on the sale of the securities. Prosecutors said Currin received more than $240,000 (â,¬187,985).

Currin was an aide to U.S. Sen. Jesse Helms; U.S. attorney for eastern North Carolina from 1981-87; state Republican Party chairman from 1996-99; and a Superior Court judge until 1990.

Also charged in the case were tax attorney Ricky Graves; Howell Way Woltz, president of Sterling Trust in the Bahamas; and his wife, Vernice Woltz, a director of Sterling Trust.

Currin Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges (RN&O)

By Andrea Weigl, Staff Writer

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, November 3, 2006

Former U.S. Attorney Sam Currin pleaded guilty today to three federal charges ranging from conspiracy to commit money laundering to obstruction of justice.

During the 40-minute hearing at Raleigh's federal courthouse, prosecutors did not reveal any new details about the case against Currin.

But in an unusual move last month, Currin filed a 16-page affidavit detailing his role in the crimes -- a filing which U.S. District Judge Earl Britt noted was the first he had ever seen as a judge.

Currin admitted lying to a grand jury and laundering $1.3 million on behalf of a client, a prolific spammer who faced his own criminal charges. Currin admitted knowing his client's money was the proceeds of criminal activity, according to his affidavit.

After Currin pleaded guilty, his wife, Margaret Currin, a law professor at Campbell University's law school, wiped away tears. Her son put his arm around her.

Currin was a protege of former U.S. Senator Jesse Helms, who helped Currin be appointed as the top federal prosecutor in eastern North Carolina. Currin held that position from 1981 until 1987.

Staff writer Andrea Weigl can be reached at (919)829-4848 or aweigl@newsobserver.com.

Ex-Fort Campbell Soldier Indicted (LCJ)

By Charlie White

Louisville Courier-Journal, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090784

A former Fort Campbell soldier was indicted by a federal grand jury in Louisville on Thursday on charges that include the rape of an Iraqi girl and the deaths of the girl and members of her family in Iraq.

Steven D. Green, 21, was charged with conduct that would constitute conspiracy to commit murder, conspiracy to commit aggravated sexual abuse, premeditated murder, murder in perpetration of aggravated sexual abuse, aggravated sexual abuse on a person less than 16 years of age, use of firearms during the commission of violent crimes and obstruction of justice.

The indictment charges Green with crimes from an incident that occurred on March 12 near Mahmoudiyah, Iraq.

If convicted, he could receive the death sentence, according to a release from the Justice Department.

The indictment alleges that during the incident Green and others committed aggravated sexual abuse against a 14-year-old Iraqi girl, whose body was burned after the attack.

The indictment also alleges that Green and others killed the girl, her father, mother, and 6-year-old sister.

Green, a member of the 101st Airborne, was discharged from the U.S. Army in May 2006 and is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, a statute that gives U.S. courts jurisdiction to prosecute crimes committed outside the United States by persons who served with the Armed Forces but are no longer subject to military prosecution.

The Army has charged other soldiers who have not been discharged with taking part in the incident.

Santa Monica Police, FBI Raid Homes In Probe Of Animal Liberation Front (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Santa Monica police and FBI agents raided the homes of several controversial animal rights activists this week as part of an investigation into the underground Animal Liberation Front.

Among the targets were Dr. Jerry Vlasak and his wife, Pamelyn Ferdin, two well-known activists who regularly protest against Los Angeles animal services officials. They were not at their Agoura Hills home when police conducted the search. Vlasak said an officer had to enter through a pet door to get inside.

Santa Monica Police Capt. Alex Padilla said officers served search warrants in Los Angeles, Ventura and Orange counties on Tuesday. He would not provide details of the probe beyond saying that it was "an ongoing criminal stalking and conspiracy investigation involving members of the Animal Liberation Front."

An activist involved in protesting animal testing by the Santa Monica-based POM Wonderful company, the world's largest producer of pomegranate juice, said his home and those of others involved in the animal rights cause were raided.

The activists say the company has funded cruel experiments on mice and rabbits to prove the health benefits of the juice. They have said they have no affiliation with Vlasak and are in no way terrorists.

The search warrant for Vlasak's home authorized the seizure of any evidence of affiliation with the Animal Liberation Front, as well as evidence pertaining to POM Wonderful.

According to the search warrant, police seized computer equipment, animal rights books, pamphlets, T-shirts, fliers, a stuffed animal and "duffel bags w/ wrist rocket, 3/8" shot," an apparent reference to a type of slingshot. The FBI would not comment on the case.

The Animal Liberation Front is a shadowy network that has sabotaged animal research labs, vandalized homes of researchers, firebombed properties and made numerous death threats. Because it has no known leadership structure or membership, anyone can strike under the group's name. The FBI has called it a domestic terror threat.

Vlasak, a trauma surgeon, runs a website called the Animal Liberation Press Office that publishes "communiques" from people claiming to have committed sabotage or other acts on behalf of the Animal Liberation Front and other underground groups. He says he does not know who any members of the front are, but simply receives their messages anonymously and publishes them.

"I don't do anything illegal," he said. "We're just press officers. It seems like this is just an attack on above-ground people because they don't know who the underground people are."

joe.mozingo@latimes.com

No Ethics Panel Report Before Election (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP, November 3, 2006

The House ethics committee has been working hard to determine if Republicans covered up ex-Rep. Mark Foley's come-ons to former male pages, but even 12-hour work days won't bring conclusions by Election Day.

The lack of a report leaves voters to sort through conflicting Republican accounts in deciding whether GOP leaders failed to protect teenagers in their care.

Foley became overly friendly with male pages when they served as errand-runners for lawmakers and — after they left Congress — sent some of them inappropriate e-mails and lurid instant messages.

It won't be easy for voters to find answers without the ethics committee's help.

Speaker Dennis Hastert's staff could have learned of inappropriate e-mails as early as 2002 and as late as 2005, depending on whose statements voters believe. The salacious instant messages didn't surface until a month ago.

Also, two House leaders said they told Hastert about Foley's questionable e-mails last spring, but the speaker said he didn't learn of them until late September.

A four-member investigative subcommittee interviewed some two dozen witnesses in closed sessions. Witnesses were still being questioned earlier this week, leaving no time for the panel to digest hours of interviews and write a report by Election Day.

Foley, R-Fla., who is in an alcohol treatment program, resigned in late September after he was confronted with some of his lurid messages.

While the Iraq war has dominated newscasts, headlines and talk shows, recent polls indicate that many voters also consider the Foley issue important. A majority say they believe Republican leaders were involved in a cover-up.

For instance, more than half, 55 percent, in a CNN poll taken last month said the Foley scandal would be very or extremely important in their vote. And about the same number in that poll, 57 percent, said they thought Republican leaders covered up Foley's behavior.

Academic experts said the Foley scandal was never a more important issue than the Iraq war — even when it momentarily dominated the headlines as September ended. Nonetheless, they said there was an adverse effect on Republican campaigns.

"It demoralized Republicans and threw them off message," said John Pitney, Jr., a professor of politics at Claremont McKenna College in California.

"They wanted desperately to talk about Osama Bin Laden and had to talk about Mark Foley. It may add to the sense that Republicans aren't managing the House very well."

But Pitney predicted that most voters concerned about Foley already "made up their minds that Republicans messed up. I'm not sure a report might make much difference. The damage has been done."

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, said the timing of the scandal — becoming public about five weeks before the election — may have lessened the impact for Republicans.

"The hypocrisy is obvious. The family values party always is vulnerable to any kind of scandal involving sexual issues. There has been some hangover. But, as expected, a month later it wasn't going to be that dominant," Sabato said.

"It's juicy, but not that juicy."

Ross Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, said the Foley matter is much worse for Republicans as part of the overall corruption issue.

Republicans have had to cope with corruption cases against Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio and imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California.

In addition, Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., admitted to an extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior and settled a lawsuit she brought that claimed he had choked her. He has denied abuse.

More recently, Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., a 10-term lawmaker, is being investigated by the FBI over allegations that he used his influence to help his daughter's lobbying firm get $1 million in contracts from foreign clients.

Other ethics probes are dogging Reps. Jerry Lewis and John Doolittle, both R-Calif. and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont.

Far fewer investigations involve Democrats. Authorities are conducting a bribery probe of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. Authorities also are investigating Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., who steered federal money to nonprofit groups that contributed to his campaigns.

Baker, the Rutgers professor, said the Democratic cases will have less of an impact on Tuesday than the large number of probes focused on Republicans — including the Foley case.

The Foley case and the other investigations, he said, "tells people there's insincerity and that family values issues are a lot of puffery on the part of Republicans. Republicans are no better in protecting family values than the Democrats."

___

On the Net:

House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct: http://www.house.gov/ethics/

No Memory Expert For Former White House Aide In CIA Leak Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0090786

AP, November 3, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby will not be allowed to use a memory expert at his perjury and obstruction trial, a federal judge ruled Thursday, blocking a key tactic in Libby's defense strategy.

Libby, who is accused of lying to investigators in the CIA leak case, wanted an expert to testify that memory is unreliable, especially during times of stress. Libby says he had national security issues on his mind and any misstatements he made about the leak of Central Intelligence Agency officer Valerie Plame's name were mistakes, not lies.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said allowing a memory expert would be a waste of time and would only confuse the jury. Walton said jurors, like everyone else, understand that memory sometimes falters and can judge for themselves whether witnesses are reliable.

The issue provided the case's first courtroom drama last week when Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald spent hours questioning the research of memory expert Elizabeth Loftus. Fitzgerald picked apart the psychologist's testimony until she acknowledged errors and misstatements in her findings.

The trial is set to begin in January. Libby's lawyers have said the former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney will testify.

Plame's CIA status was leaked in 2003 as her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq. Plame believes she was outed as retribution, a claim Fitzgerald spent three years investigating. Nobody has been charged with violating a law by discussing Plame.

Case Against Arson-murder Suspect Called 'Overwhelming' (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Jonathan Abrams And Sara Lin, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

A 'consistency' in a string of fires persuaded prosecutors to charge Raymond Lee Oyler in the Esperanza blaze that killed five firefighters.

A 36-year-old auto mechanic from Beaumont was charged Thursday with arson and five counts of murder for allegedly setting last week's Esperanza fire, which killed five U.S. Forest Service firefighters and destroyed 34 homes in a remote mountain area of Riverside County.

Convicted felon Raymond Lee Oyler has been in custody since Tuesday, when authorities arrested him on suspicion of setting two smaller blazes in June and announced that he was a "person of interest" in the fatal arson fire. If convicted, Oyler could face the death penalty.

Authorities provided little information about what led them to Oyler. Prosecutors said they found "a consistency" to the string of fires set in the San Gorgonio Pass from early June through October.

"We had 30-plus people in one room reviewing every bit of evidence. It becomes a cross-examination by the most experienced prosecutors in the state of California," said Riverside County Dist. Atty.-elect Rod Pacheco, an assistant district attorney who takes over the top office in January. "We came to a unanimous conclusion."

Along with murder, Oyler was charged with 11 counts of arson and 10 counts of possession of materials to commit arson.

Oyler's attorney, Mark R. McDonald, said his client "adamantly denies" any involvement in the deadly Esperanza fire or the other fires he is accused of setting.

At his arraignment in Riverside County Superior Court on Thursday afternoon, a heavily tattooed Oyler stood handcuffed in an orange jumpsuit, staring at the floor. He entered a plea of not guilty on all 26 counts.

Asked about Pacheco's characterization of the evidence against Oyler as "overwhelming," McDonald expressed skepticism.

"If it was overwhelming," Oyler would have been charged with the crimes much sooner, McDonald said.

U.S. Forest Service spokesman John Miller, who has spent the last week shuttling between the dead firefighters' families and the hospital where one firefighter lost a six-day fight to survive, had tears in his eyes Thursday as law enforcement officials announced the charges against Oyler.

"Are things OK? No, things are not OK. It will not bring them back," Miller said of Oyler's arrest. "We appreciate everything our friends in the Forest Service community have done for us, and the county of Riverside. But the emotions aren't over yet."

Authorities would not comment on whether they believe Oyler acted alone.

Edith Bowers, who lives in the Cabazon neighborhood near where the Esperanza fire started, told The Times that when she saw Oyler's face on a news website, she recognized him as one of two men she saw at the scene shortly after the blaze began.

"As soon as I saw his picture, it blew me away," said Bowers, adding that she was interviewed by sheriff's detectives last week. "Put a hat on him and stick him in a lineup and I'll pick him out." She said she had not talked with authorities since Oyler's arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0090787

Oyler had previous run-ins with the law, court documents show. In 1995, he pleaded guilty to auto theft in San Bernardino County. Six years later, he pleaded guilty to possession of a controlled substance there.

A mixed reputation

Oyler's former father-in-law, Kenneth Bond, described Oyler as a "lowlife." Bond's daughter, Christy, married Oyler in the Bond family's backyard in Chino Hills in 1997. They moved to Joplin, Mo., and separated in 1999, shortly after she obtained a restraining order against him, saying he was a violent man who sold drugs.

"[He] verbally harassed me, there is so much drug trafficking going on, I said I will not tolerate it in my home because of me and my child," she stated in the March 30, 1999, petition in the circuit court of Jasper County, Mo. "I do not want that. He is so paranoid, it scares me. He is very unpredictable and hits walls."

The couple divorced in 2001, and she was killed in a traffic accident last year.

"Maybe he's changed since then, but I doubt it," Bond said from his home in Rogers, Ark. "Ray was pretty worthless. That's as nice as I can be about him."

Riverside County birth records also show that Oyler fathered a daughter in 1987, when he was 16. The mother was 15 when the baby was born at Riverside Community Hospital.

Oyler's co-workers at Highland Springs Automotive in Beaumont, where Oyler has worked for the last few months, had a much more favorable impression of the man and said they believed authorities had the wrong person.

Mechanic Jason King, 23, said Oyler kept pictures of his girlfriend and their 7-month-old daughter in his toolbox, which was confiscated by authorities.

"It was obvious that they were what he was living for," King said. "This guy, he wanted to change his life. He didn't do something like this."

General manager Jason Walden described Oyler as "a very good guy" who let homeless people sleep in his cars and would rush home to care for his daughter when his girlfriend, a waitress, worked the night shift.

"If Ray's guilty, he should be punished," Walden said. "But we work with fire torches, and it's not like he stands there and glares at it."

Walden added that Oyler had told him Monday that investigators wanted him to take a polygraph test, and when he refused, "detectives told him they were going to make his life a living hell."

Authorities refused to comment on their contacts with Oyler.

As news spread, neighbors of Oyler's parents in Banning expressed disbelief. Neighbor Eddie Lyon said Oyler, known for working on his cars at odd hours of the night, helped him work on one of his trucks.

"If he did do it, I guarantee it was an accident," he said. "He probably dropped a cigarette or something. He's a chain smoker."

Most of Oyler's family declined to talk about Thursday's charges. His uncle Charles Oyler of Banning said he was stunned by the news.

"I'm just as shocked as anyone," he said. "He was a pretty nice guy, from what I saw."

William "Billy" Hutson, who said sheriff's officials had accused him of being the arsonist when he was questioned Monday, said Thursday evening that he was relieved he was no longer under scrutiny.

"They already had tried, convicted and sentenced me," said Hutson, who was convicted of an arson in Texas 10 years ago and, after the Esperanza fire, had his home searched by sheriff's officials. "I knew I was innocent and the truth would eventually come out."

Weekend surveillance

Authorities questioned Oyler on Friday and put him under surveillance throughout the weekend, arresting him at 3 p.m. Tuesday during a traffic stop in Beaumont.

Authorities charged him with five counts of first-degree murder with special circumstances. The Riverside County district attorney's office will decide in the next 60 days whether to pursue the death penalty.

The firefighters killed in the Oct. 26 blaze were Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto; and Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley, who succumbed to his injuries Tuesday.

The men were overrun by flames while defending a home. The blaze was the deadliest in the nation for firefighters since July 1994, when 14 were killed in Colorado.

McDonald, Oyler's attorney, said he had not seen police reports and had "no idea what the allegations are and their truth." He said he worried that his client would not get a fair trial in Riverside because of "the emotionally charged nature of the case," adding that he may seek to shift the court case elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0090788

Oyler is being held without bail in a seventh-floor jail ward at the Robert Presley Detention Center in Riverside, McDonald said, where he is isolated from the general population because of the publicity surrounding the case.

McDonald said he found his client "almost catatonic" and "scared to death" when he visited him in jail for 20 minutes Wednesday. His parents and girlfriend, meanwhile, remained "in shock."

"They all say he could never have done it," McDonald said. "They're completely in the dark right now."

Oyler's next court hearing is scheduled for Dec. 15.

At the news conference in Riverside when Oyler's arrest was announced, Riverside County Supervisor Jeff Stone called Oyler a "pyromaniacal murderer."

"The perpetrator believes that he has seen the fire of all fires. I disagree with his fantasy," Stone said. "As a person of strong faith, I believe that this perpetrator will see a firestorm bigger than he's ever imagined when he meets his ultimate fate at the conclusion of his shameful life."

Firefighters said they got some measure of closure from the charges against Oyler.

"I would say it is excellent work by the teams put together to investigate this tragedy, and we expect that justice will be done," said Pat Boss, a U.S. Forest Service spokesman and longtime friend of Loutzenhiser.

Boss and his family have been helping Loutzenhiser's wife, Maria, and her five children since his death last week. She declined to comment Thursday.

"It's rough for her," Boss said. "And it's getting rougher as we get closer to the memorial this Sunday. She is getting her thoughts together for the service."

The public memorial for the firefighters will be held at 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in Devore.

Efren Ayala, stepfather of deceased firefighter Daniel Hoover-Najera of San Jacinto, likewise declined to comment except to say he was glad an arrest had been made.

maeve.reston@latimes.com
jonathan.abrams@latimes.com
sara.lin@latimes.com

*

Times staff writers Christopher Goffard and David Kelly contributed to this report.

Suspect Charged In California Wildfire Deaths (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 2 -- A man already in jail on suspicion of starting several small wildfires was charged Thursday with multiple counts of first-degree murder and arson for setting a blaze that killed five firefighters in Southern California.

Police and fire investigators have been working for months to find those responsible for starting at least 40 small fires this year in the Banning Pass area 90 miles east of Los Angeles, in the desert and mountains west of Palm Springs. They arrested a local man Tuesday on suspicion of starting two of those fires. Thursday, authorities said that same man will face five murder counts, 11 counts of arson and 10 counts of use of an incendiary device for setting the deadly Esperanza fire last week as well as 11 fires this summer. The charges could carry the death penalty.

Riverside County District Attorney-elect Rod Pacheco said his office has not decided whether to seek capital punishment for Raymond Lee Oyler, 36. "The lives and tragic deaths of the five-man fire crew, Engine 57, will be considered" in that decision, Pacheco said at a news conference, "and the impact of their deaths on their families, friends, loved ones and their children."

At his arraignment Thursday in Riverside County Superior Court, Oyler pleaded not guilty to all charges. He was jailed without bond.

Oyler, a car mechanic, was arrested at his mother's house in the small town of Beaumont, Calif., a day after police searched the home. In an interview with a local newspaper Thursday, he declared his innocence.

The firefighters' deaths horrified residents of Riverside County, where blazes fed by hot Santa Ana winds burn through wild desert scrub every year, but fatalities are rare. All five members of a U.S. Forest Service crew -- one of them with more than 20 years of experience -- were suddenly caught in a wall of flames as they tried to protect a remote canyon home. They were running for their engine when the fire overtook them.

The fire scorched more than 60 square miles and destroyed 34 houses before it was put out Monday. State and local officials had offered a $550,000 reward to find the person responsible and set up a tip line, which yielded hundreds of calls. Agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Federal Bureau of Investigation; and the U.S. attorney's office worked on the case with local investigators.

A public memorial service for the firefighters is scheduled for Monday at a 65,000-seat arena.

DOJ_NMG_0090789

"The days have been consumed with grieving," said Jeanne Wade Evans, the San Bernardino National Forest supervisor, where the fallen firefighters were based. "This arrest really does help with some of the closure, the healing, that some of us in the Forest Service and their families need."

Suspect Pleads Not Guilty In Calif. Blaze That Killed 5 (USAT)

By Maggie Downs, Keith Matheny And Erica Solvig

USA Today, November 3, 2006

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — As firefighters prepared to remember five of their own in a memorial service Sunday, an auto mechanic pleaded not guilty Thursday to setting the blaze that killed the men.

"The evidence is overwhelming" against Raymond Oyler, a resident of nearby Beaumont, Riverside County District Attorney-elect Rod Pacheco told reporters Thursday.

Oyler, 36, faces five counts of first-degree murder and 21 arson-related charges following the Esperanza fire, which investigators say was set Oct. 26. The wind-whipped fire blackened 40,200 acres and destroyed 34 homes in five days in dry, mountainous terrain about 20 miles west of Palm Springs.

The five U.S. Forest Service firefighters died from injuries suffered on the day the fire started. They were trying to protect a mountain home surrounded by steep gullies, the Forest Service says.

The five — Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto; and Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley — will be honored in a public memorial service at 1 p.m. Sunday at the Hyundai Pavilion in San Bernardino.

Oyler stood slumped over and appeared reserved in handcuffs and an orange jumpsuit before Judge Janice McIntyre in Riverside County Superior Court on Thursday as he was formally charged. He is being held without bail at a county jail in Riverside. If convicted, he could face the death penalty.

The district attorney's office said in court documents that Oyler is suspected of having set as many as 10 additional fires in the area dating back to June.

Mark McDonald, a San Bernardino attorney hired by Oyler's family to represent him, said he may ask that any trial be moved, citing the "highly emotionally charged case."

Oyler "adamantly denies any involvement" in the Esperanza or other fires, McDonald said.

"He is distraught, scared … almost catatonic," McDonald said after the hearing.

Authorities would not discuss what evidence they have against Oyler, who was identified as a "person of interest" in the Esperanza fire when apprehended Tuesday.

Staci Burger, 23, whose fiancé, McKay, was among the five firefighters who died, selected photographs of him to run in a slide show at Sunday's service.

"To be honest, I don't know how I'm going to make it through the day," Burger said.

Burger had had her mind on different plans before the fire — wedding plans.

She said that she had the ring picked out and that McKay had wanted to wait until Christmas to propose properly, after asking for her father's permission.

Now she pores through photos. She wants McKay's favorite song, Alan Jackson's Like Red on a Rose, to accompany them.

She wants her boyfriend to be remembered as someone who loved the people he worked with as much as he loved his job. "That crew was a family. They adored each other," she said. "And I've discovered a brotherhood of firefighters I never knew existed before."

Tomas Patlan, a U.S. Forest Service spokesman, said fire departments from all over the country have expressed interest in participating in the service.

"A lot of fire service agencies will send equipment to represent their departments," he said. "A procession like that can go on for miles — and this one probably will."

As planning for the memorial service continues, details about it will be added to an Internet site: www.engine57memorial.org.

The five deaths are the greatest loss of firefighters in a single wildfire since 14 were killed in the Storm King Mountain fire near Glenwood Springs, Colo., in 1994, according to statistics from the National Interagency Fire Center.

Man Is Charged With Murder In Wildfire (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090790

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 2 —A Californian already accused in two brush fires was charged on Thursday with murder and other crimes in connection with a wildfire last week that killed five United States Forest Service firefighters.

The man, Raymond L. Oyler, who lives in Beaumont near the origin of the fatal fire, pleaded not guilty to multiple counts of murder, arson and related charges a week after the wildfire started, on Oct. 26.

The five-day fire, called the Esperanza fire, blackened 40,200 acres and destroyed 34 houses.

Because of the deaths and their stemming from arson, Mr. Oyler, who is being held without bail, is eligible for the death penalty. The Riverside County district attorney-elect, Rod Pacheco, said he would decide within 60 days whether to pursue it.

Mr. Oyler's lawyer, Mark R. McDonald, said in an interview after the court hearing that the haste of Mr. Oyler's arrest "raises eyebrows." In two days, Mr. McDonald said, Mr. Oyler went from being arrested as a suspect in unrelated fires and a "person of interest" in the deadly blaze to being accused of setting it.

In the wake of the firefighters' deaths, Mr. McDonald said, "emotion tends to drive everything, and they needed to find somebody."

Mr. Oyler, he said, is terrified, adding: "He really just looks like he is in a fog. He is in shock. He has no clue why they picked him."

Mr. Oyler has worked in an automotive oil-change store and has a girlfriend and a baby daughter who appears to be younger than 6 months old, the lawyer said.

The criminal complaint charges Mr. Oyler with setting unrelated brush fires in the summer and fall.

The police said they found evidence linking him to the Esperanza fire but declined to give details. He used an unspecified incendiary device, the complaint says.

In an interview on KCAL-TV, Neil Lingle, the Riverside County under sheriff, said that "tips and outstanding police work" led to the arrest but that it had not been determined whether anyone would claim the $500,000 reward offered for information leading to an arrest.

The five firefighters died when a burst of fire, fed by fierce winds, blasted up a hill and overwhelmed them and the house they were trying to save, the authorities said. Three died at the scene, and two died later in a hospital.

Janis Oyler, an aunt of Mr. Oyler, said in a brief telephone interview that the news of the arrest "shocked me as a relative of his."

"I never knew him to be like that, in fires or anything," Ms. Oyler said, adding that she had lost touch with his side of the family in recent years.

Jean Wade Evans, supervisor of the San Bernardino National Forest, where the firefighters worked, said in a statement that the Forest Service continued to grieve but that "this arrest helps with some of the closure, the healing, we need in the Forest Service community and in the families."

Charges Filed In Deadly Calif. Wildfire (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus

AP, November 3, 2006

RIVERSIDE, Calif. (AP) — As families planned funerals for five firefighters killed by a wind-swept wildfire a week ago, authorities marched a suspect into a courtroom to charge him with murder and arson — crimes that carry a possible death sentence.

Friends and family of the fallen firefighters said news of the arrest brought some relief.

"This arrest really does help with some of the closure, the healing that we in the Forest Service community, and in the families, need," said Jeanne Wade Evans, the San Bernardino National Forest supervisor.

The first in a series of funerals was planned for Friday.

Raymond Lee Oyler was charged Thursday with five counts of murder, 11 counts of arson and 10 counts of use of an incendiary device. The charges include seven fires in June, one in July, one in September and two in October.

Last week's blaze was the deadliest for firefighters since July 1994, when 14 were killed near Glenwood Springs, Colo., according to the National Interagency Fire Center.

In a jailhouse interview, Oyler told The Press-Enterprise of Riverside he had "no idea why they came to me."

"All I know is I didn't do this and they're trying to pin this on me," Oyler said, adding that he was home with his baby girl when the fire broke out. "They need to find the real person."

District Attorney-elect Rod Pacheco said the evidence against Oyler was "overwhelming," but he did not disclose a motive and would not say what led investigators to Oyler.

The 36-year-old auto mechanic with tattoos on his neck and forearms appeared in court in handcuffs and a jail jumpsuit as his attorney entered a not guilty plea on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0090791

Oyler "adamantly denies involvement in this fire and in any of these fires," attorney Mark McDonald said outside court. "He's very distraught and scared ... The finger is pointing at him."

Oyler, who said nothing during the brief hearing, was held without bail.

Authorities were trying to determine whether Oyler has any links to at least 40 fires in the area since May, according to an official involved in the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is continuing.

Investigators were also looking at a 1998 fire in which the pilot of a firefighting aircraft died in a crash. That blaze burned more than 24,000 acres in the San Jacinto Mountains and had a burn pattern similar to last week's fire, the official said.

The charges are punishable by life in prison without parole or the death penalty. Prosecutors will decide in the next 60 days which sentence to seek.

"The feelings of the surviving family members of the victims will be consulted and be given great weight by our office in what is always a difficult decision," Pacheco said.

A woman who answered the phone at the home of Oyler's mother said she had no comment.

Last week's fire was stoked by Santa Ana winds as it swept southwest through the San Jacinto Mountains about 90 miles east of Los Angeles. The flames overran the fire crew, destroyed 34 homes and charred more than 60 square miles before being contained Monday.

Three firefighters died at the scene, and a fourth died soon after at a hospital. A fifth was taken off life support and died this week.

A funeral service was planned Friday for Jason McKay, 27, of Apple Valley.

McKay, whose family moved to the Victorville area from Minnesota when he was a boy, worked for the U.S. Forest Service for five years and was the assistant engine operator on the Engine 57 crew.

"He loved being a firefighter," Staci Burger, McKay's fiance, told the Riverside Press Enterprise. "It was what he wanted to do since he was born."

Funeral services were also scheduled over the next several days for firefighters Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto; Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, of Idyllwild; and Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley.

A public memorial service was planned for Sunday.

Associated Press Writer Andrew Glazer contributed to this report.

Charges Filed In Deadly Calif. Wildfire (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 3, 2006

(AP) - RIVERSIDE, Calif.-Authorities on Thursday filed murder and arson charges carrying the death penalty against a man suspected of setting a Southern California wildfire last week that killed five firefighters.

The suspect, Raymond Lee Oyler, 36, was already under arrest on suspicion of setting two other wildfires over the summer.

The blaze was the deadliest for firefighters since July 1994, when 14 were killed near Glenwood Springs, Colo., according to the National Interagency Fire Center statistics.

Prosecutors charged Oyler with five counts of murder, 11 counts of arson and 10 counts of use of an incendiary device.

District Attorney-elect Rod Pacheco said Oyler will also face two so-called special circumstances, one alleging murders committed during arson and another alleging multiple murders.

A court appearance was set for later Thursday.

The charges are punishable by life in prison without parole or the death penalty. Authorities will decide in the next 60 days which sentence to seek, Pacheco said.

"The feelings of the surviving family members of the victims will be consulted and be given great weight by our office in what is always a difficult decision," he said.

A woman who answered the phone at the home of Oyler's mother said she had no comment.

The fire was stoked by Santa Ana winds as it swept southwest through the San Jacinto Mountains west of Palm Springs. The flames overran the fire crew, destroyed 34 homes and charred more than 60 square miles before being contained Monday.

Three firefighters died at the scene, and a fourth died soon after at a hospital. A fifth was taken off life support and died this week.

Investigators interviewed Oyler on Oct. 27, served a search warrant on his residence Monday, then arrested him Tuesday. Authorities did not immediately identify the other fires Oyler was suspected of starting.

"This arrest really does help with some of the closure, the healing that we in the Forest Service community, and in the families, need," said Jeanne Wade Evans, the San Bernardino National Forest supervisor.

DOJ_NMG_0090792

In Joplin, Mo., police and court records show Oyler had mostly minor run-ins with the law from 1997 through 1999. The most severe was a 1999 misdemeanor charge of violating a protection order by entering his wife's apartment while she was out. The couple divorced in 2001.

'They Need To Find The Real Person' (RPE)

By LISA O'NEILL HILL, BEN GOAD And ADAM HARTMANN

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, November 3, 2006

JAIL INTERVIEW: Suspect Raymond Lee Oyler denies any role in the fire that claimed five lives.

Raymond Lee Oyler once tried to volunteer with a local fire department. He's a mechanic and a father, with tattoos of flames and skulls on his arms and braces on his teeth.

On Thursday morning, an anxious and tearful Oyler -- jailed as a suspect in two arson fires -- maintained from the Robert Presley Detention Center that he did not start those fires or last week's wildfire, which killed five U.S. Forest Service firefighters. He expressed sympathy for the loss of life.

Two hours later, Riverside County authorities charged Oyler, 36, with five counts of murder and alleged that he had set the Esperanza Fire.

"I haven't done anything with any fires," Oyler said, talking from a visiting area of the seventh floor of the jail in downtown Riverside. He spoke slowly into a telephone, staring intently at a visitor from behind thick glass. "Fires hurt people."

In a 20-minute interview -- his first public comments since his arrest Tuesday night -- Oyler said he did not know why detectives had zeroed in on him.

He said detectives have trailed him at home and at work, taken a swab of DNA from his cheek and asked him to take a polygraph exam, which he refused. They asked whether he had lent his Ford Taurus to anyone and, while serving a search warrant, took boots and other items from his home, Oyler said.

"All I know is, I didn't do this and they're trying to pin this on me. They need to find the real person," he said.

"Obviously they didn't mean for anybody to get killed," Oyler said of whoever started the fire that burned 34 homes.

Home With His Baby

Oyler said he had been at home with his baby when the fire broke out at 1:12 a.m. Oct. 26.

"I really feel bad for those people who lost their lives up there on that hill," said Oyler, who has had run-ins with the law in California and Missouri and has served time in prison.

Authorities dismissed Oyler's assertion that he is innocent, saying that more than 30 representatives of multiple law enforcement agencies who reviewed the case at the district attorney's office Wednesday afternoon were unanimous: Oyler was responsible for the crimes.

Riverside County Supervisor Jeff Stone lashed out at Oyler during a televised news conference Thursday calling him a "sick individual" and "pyro-maniacal murderer."

A more complete picture of Oyler -- that of a nice, hard-working kid who gradually fell into a life of drugs and crime -- emerges in court documents and interviews with some of those who have known him through the years.

At the home of Oyler's parents on Banning's Eighth Street on Thursday, people hunkered down inside, watching a televised news conference announcing the murder charges. No one came to the door.

Later, sheriff's homicide investigators arrived at the home, where pit bulls have roamed the yard.

Neighbors said they were amazed that someone from their area had been charged, and they expressed sympathy for Oyler's parents.

"It's extremely horrible," said neighbor Arlene Wade. "Basically, they're going to lose a son."

Oyler, who said he smokes cigarettes, said he had not talked to his family since his arrest Tuesday night.

He said he has been with his girlfriend for the past two years, and he shares an apartment in Beaumont with her and their daughter, Diamond. Oyler's girlfriend declined to comment when she was reached Thursday.

"It just tears me apart inside," Oyler said of being away from home. "I'm hurt in the fact that I'm not with my family."

At times, Oyler appeared stunned that he was in jail at all. The mechanic's brown hair was closely cropped, and what appeared to be oil or grease was underneath his short fingernails.

'Wrong Dog'

For four or five months, Oyler had been working at Highland Springs Automotive, a few hundred yards from a Beaumont fire station. Jason Walden, the general manager, called him "one of the nicest guys you'd ever want to meet" and said Oyler still has a job, pending the outcome of the case.

"They're hunting the wrong dog," Walden said of Oyler, who he said would let homeless people sleep in one of his cars and who would come in on his days off to service cars for free.

DOJ_NMG_0090793

Walden portrayed Oyler as a homebody who watched his daughter while his girlfriend worked nights.

He said Oyler told him Monday that authorities had impounded his cars and ransacked his apartment.

Told Thursday that authorities had filed murder and arson charges against Oyler, Walden sighed and said he didn't know what to say.

"You can never tell, but I still believe in him," Walden said. "I don't have all the evidence in front of me to check it myself ... just wait and see what really happens."

"If it (turns) out that he's guilty, he'll have to pay his dues," he said. "Even nice guys do bad things."

Not everyone who has employed Oyler recalls him fondly.

Charley Price, owner of Price's Auto Parts in Banning, said Oyler had a three- to four- month stint as a part-time auto repairman at his business about a year ago. He said Oyler had worked for him previously several years earlier and called him looking for work last year after getting out of jail. Oyler told him his girlfriend was pregnant and he needed "a car, a job and some help," Price said.

"I felt sorry for him," said Price, who sold Oyler a Ford Taurus for $100. "For the first month, he worked out pretty good," he said, but after that, his workmanship went downhill.

Price never saw Oyler outside of work, he said, adding, "It's a shame I even saw him at work."

Moreno Valley Childhood

Oyler was born in El Monte and attended Moreno Valley's Edgemont Elementary School and Canyon Springs High School, according to a job application he filled out in 1998. School officials said they had no record of his graduating. He wrote on the application that he liked football and was proud of his ability as a house painter.

In 1992, he began a three-year stint painting houses for a company in Rosemead. In the mid-'90s, he went to work for Rex Taylor Painting in Ontario.

On Thursday, Taylor said he was shocked to learn of Oyler's arrest.

"I'm floored," he said, adding that Oyler had been a good painter and expressing hope that he had not been involved.

Taylor recalled Oyler as the the kind of guy who would walk away from a fight.

"He isn't the vindictive type," Taylor said.

Inland Arrests

In the past decade, Oyler has racked up multiple convictions in Riverside and San Bernardino counties.

He was arrested in April 1995 for taking a vehicle without the owner's consent in the Redlands area, San Bernardino County records show.

He pleaded guilty in August of that year but failed to appear for sentencing the next month, records show. An arrest warrant was issued.

Oyler moved to Joplin, Mo., in the late 1990s, where he again sought work as a house painter. Several outfits hired him for short stints, said one-time boss Marty Coss.

"He had a little old patch of hair on his bottom lip," Coss said by telephone from Joplin. "He seemed like a good kid. Wasn't an ornery kid."

Oyler said he moved briefly to Missouri "for a change" and worked in a machine shop.

He married a woman named Christy, but he is no longer with her, he said. She could not be reached. Oyler said he has children other than the baby but declined to elaborate.

Between May 1997 and April 1999, he was arrested several times in Missouri in cases involving stolen cars, a hit-and-run and domestic-violence calls.

His wife called Joplin police in January 1999, saying that she believed Oyler was using methamphetamine and possibly cooking it in their home.

A few months later, she accused him of entering the home in violation of a court order and taking several items, including a pit bull puppy and, possibly, a sawed-off shotgun.

Later that year, Oyler was back in California and back in jail. He got probation for the 1995 auto-theft conviction. But a conviction two years later for drug possession constituted a violation of the probation, and he was sentenced in 2001 to a year and four months in state prison, court records show.

In January of this year, he was cited for having three dogs off leashes. Records show that Oyler was ordered in June to begin paying $683 in fines stemming from traffic violations. In August, a failure-to-pay warrant was issued.

Back at the Presley Detention Center, Oyler expressed nervousness about his future.

"I think that's terrible that life was lost," he said. "I think it's terrible that the fire was started. I just want you to know that they have the wrong guy. I really didn't do it."

DOJ_NMG_0090794

He wiped tears from his eyes with his sleeve and hung his head. "I probably should go now," he said before hanging up the phone.

He got up and lumbered back to his cell.

Staff writers Sean Nealon, Kimberly Trone, Sarah Burge, John Asbury, Lora Hines and Melissa Eiselein contributed to this report.

Foreign Lobbies Took The Guise Of Nonprofits (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Early last year, two little-known nonprofit groups paid for Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and his 12-year-old daughter to travel to South Korea and Malaysia. Their last stop was the Berjaya Beach & Spa Resort on the Malaysian island of Langkawi, where they bunked at an oceanfront chalet staffed with a personal butler, got massages and rode water scooters on Burau Bay.

Doolittle's junket, which cost $29,400, was among the most expensive privately sponsored trips by members of Congress in recent years. The two groups that split the bills were not ordinary nonprofits. They were fronts for vigorous lobbying campaigns bankrolled by foreign entities and were operated by a Washington lobbying firm, Alexander Strategy Group, according to public records and people who worked with the firm.

For five years beginning in 2001, the Korea-U.S. Exchange Council and the U.S.-Malaysia Exchange Association treated 12 members of Congress and 31 Capitol Hill staffers and their relatives to nearly $500,000 in trips that included stops at U.S. and overseas resorts, records show.

The two nonprofits and the lobbying firm behind them have drawn the attention of the FBI. People associated with Alexander Strategy, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said federal investigators have asked them whether the groups were conduits for a foreign government and a foreign corporation to finance congressional junkets.

Records show that the Korea-U.S. Exchange Council was funded by the Hanwha Group, a South Korean conglomerate. The stated goal was to enhance the influence of Hanwha's chairman, Seung Youn Kim, a controversial figure once jailed for violating Korean financial law in his purchase of Sylvester Stallone's Hollywood mansion. Lobbyists for the U.S.-Malaysia Exchange Association filed reports stating that their funds came from a Malaysian energy firm and that the work was "on behalf of the government of Malaysia."

Federal law prohibits members of Congress from knowingly accepting overseas travel from foreign governments except as part of a cultural interchange program approved by the State Department. The travel in this case was not part of such a program, government officials said. House rules ban members from taking trips paid for by lobbyists or foreign agents. Nonprofits and their officers are prohibited under federal tax law from using a charitable organization for private commercial gain.

Once a major lobbying firm, Alexander Strategy Group closed down early this year. Its owner, Edwin A. Buckham, former chief of staff to now-departed House majority leader Tom DeLay, is under investigation in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, according to lawyers and witnesses with knowledge of the probe. Authorities are also reviewing Buckham's use in the 1990s of another nonprofit, the U.S. Family Network, the sources said.

The Korean and Malaysian nonprofits were created in 2001. Their combined budgets of more than $2.5 million, as well as their checkbooks and operations, were controlled by Alexander Strategy, according to people affiliated with the firm at the time. Records show that Alexander Strategy took in $620,000 in fees for its work on the Malaysia account. A Hanwha subsidiary in the United States, Universal Bearings Inc., paid the lobbyists $940,000 for the Korea work.

The nonprofit groups, on the strength of Buckham's GOP connections, sponsored trips for Republican House members DeLay; Doolittle; Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Ander Crenshaw and Tom Feeney of Florida; John Carter of Texas; Scott Garrett of New Jersey; and Roger Wicker of Mississippi.

Buckham had a strategic alliance with a Democratic lobbying firm, the Harbour Group, located in the same building on K Street. Harbour received about $500,000 in fees from the two nonprofits, according to tax and lobbying disclosure records. The firm arranged for trips taken by Democrats including Rep. Earl Pomeroy of North Dakota, Rep. Jim McDermott of Washington, Rep. Mike Honda of California and Del. Eni F. H. Faleomavaega of American Samoa. Harbour also arranged for former president Bill Clinton, who was on his own Asian trip, to meet with Hanwha officials in Seoul and Beijing.

Some of the lawmakers on the trips were in positions to help other Alexander Strategy clients. Doolittle, who serves on the House Appropriations Committee, told The Washington Post this year that from 2002 to 2005 he sponsored $37 million in spending-bill earmarks that went to a firm controlled by a key Alexander Strategy client. The client, Brent R. Wilkes, is a target of the federal investigation stemming from the bribery case and guilty plea of former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, was hired by Alexander Strategy to help keep the books for the Korean nonprofit.

DOJ_NMG_0090795

Buckham and Edward Stewart, who had been his top associate at Alexander Strategy, declined to be interviewed for this article.

Joel Johnson, a former senior adviser in the Clinton White House who ran Harbour Group at the time, said he was a subcontractor to Buckham's firm and thought of the work as lobbying for business interests behind the nonprofits.

Johnson said he relied on Buckham's assurance that the groups were proper. "This did not look like a fly-by-night operation, because it had very respected, prominent people on board," he said.

Doolittle spokeswoman Laura Blackann said last week that the congressman believed that his trip to Asia, in February 2005, was proper and that it had nothing to do with the earmarks. He said he paid out of his own pocket for some of the activities on Langkawi, such as the massages and watercraft rentals.

Other members of Congress said they did not know the source of funding for the nonprofits. Said Mike DeCesare, spokesman for McDermott, "Obviously if Congressman McDermott knew, he wouldn't have taken the trip."Helping Chairman Kim

During its five years of existence, the Korea-U.S. Exchange Council described itself in its tax returns as an educational group that spent nothing on lobbying.

But its filings with the Justice Department contradicted those returns. The council registered with Justice as a foreign agent, saying that it was financed by Hanwha Group and that Kim chaired its board of directors. It filed a plan detailing Alexander Strategy's lobbying campaign for Kim, which promised him extensive contacts with Washington lawmakers and policymakers.

The plan stated that the purpose was "to define Chairman Kim of the Hanwha Group as the leading Korean business statesman in U.S.-Korea relations" and to strengthen "Hanwha's global position." A 2002 audit of the nonprofit by the accounting firm Gelman, Rosenberg and Freedman said "approximately 99.9 percent" of its revenue came from one organization.

While the Korea council was filing as a foreign agent with the Justice Department, its lobbyists were declaring in their filings to Congress that the nonprofit had no significant foreign ownership.

"What they were telling the Department of Justice and what they were telling the IRS suggests you can't trust either set of documents," said Marcus Owens, a Washington tax lawyer and former Internal Revenue Service nonprofit chief who reviewed hundreds of the group's records compiled by The Post. "The reality is the organization was designed to provide a conduit for influence."

Alexander Strategy and Harbour lobbyists directed a steady stream of U.S. lawmakers and staffers of both parties to Seoul, where Kim squired them to meetings with top government officials. Kim traveled several times to Washington, where, according to the reports to the Justice Department, he met with prominent politicians and lawmakers.

Former president Clinton traveled to Beijing and Seoul at the invitation of the Korea council in November 2003. He appeared with Kim at the opening of the Beijing office of Korea Life Insurance Co., a Hanwha subsidiary, then traveled to Seoul for golf with Kim and meetings with political leaders.

Clinton's representatives did not respond to requests for comment on the visit.

The publicity provided a counterweight to Kim's troubles at home. He and other executives at Hanwha were under criminal investigation for allegedly bribing politicians in the company's 2002 takeover of state-controlled Korea Life. Within weeks of Clinton's visit, Kim and other Hanwha executives were barred from leaving Korea. One was later convicted in a bribery scheme. In February 2005, Kim was questioned by prosecutors but not charged.

The fact that the Korea council was a registered foreign agent was revealed in a March 2005 Post article. Some Congress members and aides who went on the trips said they had not known about the registration.

Former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger, the best-known member of the Korea council's board, resigned, telling aides he had not known it was a lobbying operation.A Scant Paper Trail

Like the Korea council, the U.S.-Malaysia Exchange Association sponsored trips by members of Congress and staffers. Some began with a meeting with Kim in Korea and finished with beach time in Langkawi courtesy of the Malaysia association.

The lawmakers and aides said they believed their travel was a legitimate function of a nonprofit group. In fact, the group's work was carried out on behalf of the Malaysian government and was funded by Malaysian business interests, both of which sought to improve the Islamic nation's image with U.S. politicians, according to public records and people familiar with the operation of the lobbying firms.

Much remains unknown about the U.S.-Malaysia Exchange Association because the only public documents are its incorporation papers and the biannual reports it filed with the District. On its board of directors were two Malaysian ruling-party officials, Jamaludin Jarjis and Megat Junid; former Wyoming senator Malcolm Wallop (R); and Stewart of Alexander Strategy.

According to the IRS, the group never filed a tax return. The IRS said the association was granted nonprofit status, but the agency could not locate the application.

The congressional trips were organized by and billed to Alexander Strategy, according to people familiar with the operation of the lobbying firm. Alexander Strategy received $620,000 in fees that originated with Malaysian business interests and was routed through a Hong Kong firm called Belle Haven Consultants, according to documents filed by Alexander Strategy with the Justice Department. Belle Haven also paid the Harbour Group $240,000, records show.

DOJ_NMG_0090796

Wallop, who was hired to lobby for Belle Haven, said in an interview this summer that the Hong Kong firm got its money from P.K. Baru Energy in Malaysia. That company, he said, was one of the businesses that wanted to improve the nation's image in the United States after a disastrous 1998 visit by Vice President Al Gore, who walked out of a banquet to protest alleged human rights violations and anti-Semitic comments by Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad.

"They wanted to make it known that it was a more civilized and courtly place than that," Wallop said. "A way to achieve that was to meet members of Congress." Some lawmakers who went on the trips received briefings from Belle Haven executives about Malaysia's strategic importance.

In their last two years of filings, Belle Haven's U.S. lobbyists reported that the Hong Kong firm was doing its work on behalf of the Malaysian government.

In 2002, the lobbyists took large delegations to Malaysia and Langkawi, including staffers to Rep. J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), Rep. Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.) and Rep. Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.). Meeks himself and Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Tex.), both on the House Financial Services Committee, went on one of the trips and met with officials of Malaysia's Islamic banks; the lawmakers' expenses were paid by a Malaysian think tank.

When Mahathir arrived that spring for a visit with President Bush, he was welcomed on Capitol Hill. The prime minister met with then-Senate Majority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), DeLay and Hastert, among others. And Meeks and Sessions announced the creation of a congressional caucus on Malaysia Trade, Security and Economic Cooperation.Amid Scandal, One Last Trip

By the beginning of 2006, Alexander Strategy Group had shut down the Korea and Malaysia nonprofits -- just before the lobbying firm itself went out of business because of its links to the Abramoff scandal. Buckham is referenced in the plea agreement of his former colleague, Tony Rudy, who admitted to corruption charges stemming from his work as a lobbyist and as deputy chief of staff to DeLay.

The FBI has questioned witnesses in recent months about Alexander Strategy's use of nonprofits and its hiring of congressional spouses, including Julie Doolittle and Christine DeLay, wife of the former House majority leader.

Alexander Strategy paid Julie Doolittle about $30,000 to do bookkeeping for the Korea nonprofit. Other contracting work by Julie Doolittle, for one of Abramoff's charities, has led investigators in the Abramoff probe to scrutinize John Doolittle's activities, sources have told The Post.

Blackann, John Doolittle's spokeswoman, did not respond to a question about whether the congressman knew that the Korea nonprofit, which helped pay for his February 2005 trip to Asia, was funded by a foreign corporation.

The Doolittle trip was the last one sponsored by the nonprofits as a wave of controversy about overseas junkets and lobbying abuses swept the Capitol. Also on the trip, which cost more than $80,000, were congressmen Wicker and Pomeroy, Wicker's wife, and a Wicker aide.

The contingent spent four days in Korea before flying to Kuala Lumpur for two days, where they met the Malaysian prime minister. Pomeroy flew home, and Doolittle and his daughter, Wicker and his wife, and the aide spent three days at a resort hotel in Langkawi, an island whose beaches are rated among the world's 10 best by a National Geographic Society publication.

Accompanying the congressmen were three Belle Haven representatives, Malaysia politician Jarjis and three lobbyists -- Wallop, Alexander Strategy's Stewart and Johnson, who by then had moved from the Harbour Group to the Glover Park Group.

Doolittle, Wicker and Pomeroy said the trip had been approved in advance by the ethics committee. But House ethics rules leave it up to individual members to determine whether a trip meets the standard of official duties.

"I was disappointed to learn -- upon returning -- that the groups in question had failed to properly file their status," Pomeroy said in a statement. "Knowing what I know now, I would not have gone on these trips."

Doolittle spokeswoman Blackann said that the first six days involved official meetings and briefings and that Doolittle paid for the recreational activities, which took place on the weekend. Doolittle declined to make available the receipts, kept in Washington, because he was campaigning in California.

Blackann also said Doolittle returned gifts received on the trip, which people familiar with the details of the trip said included a hand-tailored Korean suit for the congressman and a stylish equestrian outfit for his daughter from the Royal Polo Club in Kuala Lampur.

The spokeswoman said the congressmen also took a boat ride "to visit areas that had been ravaged by the tsunami" that had hit the South Pacific two months earlier.

A news report days after the tidal wave said Langkawi received comparatively minimal damage and "remained normal with hordes of tourists going about their holiday without any worry."

DOJ_NMG_0090797

Wicker, in an interview, acknowledged that the island visit was meant for relaxation. He said he and his wife also got massages.

The itinerary for Langkawi was to look at tsunami damage and "to have a little downtime," Wicker said. "But the logistics of getting to the tsunami became a problem. It did become a couple of days of downtime."

Credit Card Scam Alleged At Joliet-area Hotels (CHIT)

By Hal Dardick, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

Police charged 10 owners, managers and employees of seven Joliet-area hotels Thursday with selling credit card numbers of guests in a scam that authorities said could be going on across the country.

The arrests were made as about 50 officers, including FBI forensic computer experts, executed search warrants at the hotels, all part of national chains, though their corporate parents were not implicated.

In some cases, the forensic experts copied hard drives. In others, they took the computers.

The arrests were part of Operation Sleep Over, an ongoing investigation that began four months ago when police arrested a man involved in the scam who then became an informant for the Will County Sheriff's Department, officials said.

"Anyone who stayed there was a potential victim," State's Atty. James Glasgow said of the seven hotels. "And it looks like it was open season."

The informant, who has a gambling problem, bought about 10,000 credit card numbers from one Joliet-area hotel and thousands from others in the six years before his arrest, Sheriff Paul Kaupas said.

After his arrest, he went to work for detectives, buying about 150 credit card numbers while wearing a wire, Kaupas said.

"It is stunning how easily this informant was able to steal the financial identities of consumers from across the country simply by cultivating relationships in the hospitality industry," Glasgow said. "From what we have learned here, this criminal scheme can easily be repeated anywhere in the country."

The informant knew of similar scams in other cities and states and learned the theft technique from someone outside the area, Kaupas said.

Authorities declined to describe it as a ring. The hotel owners "didn't necessarily know what the others were doing," Glasgow said.

The state's attorney said he hoped the arrests would get the attention of consumers, credit card companies and the hospitality industry. He stressed those arrested were franchise owners and no one working for the corporations has been implicated. "I have not heard of hotels selling credit card numbers," said Assistant Illinois Atty. Gen. Deborah Hagan, who heads the Consumer Protection Division but was not involved in Thursday's operation. She found the arrests of hotel owners particularly troubling. "If the owner is in on it, there's no safeguarding in the world that is going to work," she said.

In 2005, nearly 256,000 Americans reported being the victims of identity theft, according to the Federal Trade Commission. Of those, 26 percent were the victims of credit card fraud, either because their accounts were "taken over" or, more frequently, because personal information was used to open a new account.

In Illinois, there were 11,137 identity theft victims. At a rate of 87.3 victims per 100,000 people, Illinois ranked 10th in the nation.

As identity theft has grown in recent years, legislators have passed laws at the state and federal levels that call for more time behind bars for offenders.

In Will County, the credit card numbers—along with names and toll-free numbers used to determine how much credit was left on each card—were sold in batches of 10 for between $1,000 and $5,000, officials said.

In some cases, the sellers gave the buyers extra credit card numbers in exchange for plasma TVs for hotel rooms, bought on credit through fraud, officials said.

Buying from stores, via telephone and through the Internet, the informant purchased items valued at between $500 and $15,000 on each card, Kaupas said. He sometimes used credit to buy the numbers, the sheriff said.

Typically, he would sell items he purchased at steep discounts to finance his gambling, authorities said.

"He couldn't make enough money or get enough money because of his gambling," said Sheriff's Detective Edward Hayes, who helped lead the investigation.

Those who sold the numbers relied on "time lapse and geographic distance" to avoid detection, Glasgow said.

The numbers they sold often belonged to people who lived in another state, and the numbers were sold as long as a year after they were used at the hotels. "To track them became next to impossible," he said.

Among the hotels searched was a Holiday Inn Express, 411 S. Larkin Ave., Joliet, where two owners and two employees were arrested.

Owners John Rhee, 62, of the 8600 block of Timber Ridge Drive, Burr Ridge, and John Seo, 54, of the 500 block of Sheridan Road, Glencoe, were each charged with multiple counts of identity theft, unlawful use of an account number with intent to defraud and computer fraud.

Rhee denied the charges against him.

"I did my best with my work," he said. "I'm not sure what happened here."

Police were armed with 12 arrest warrants and executed 10. An 11th defendant was expected to turn herself in Thursday night, and the 12th remained at large. All face the same charges and, if convicted, could be sentenced to 7 years in prison.

Police arrested the owners of two Super 8 hotels. Suresh Shah, 54, of the 100 block of Pelican Bay, Roselle, owns the Super 8 at 3401 Mall Loop Drive, Joliet; and Virendra Patel, 55, apparently lived at his Super 8 at 1730 McDonough St., Joliet.

hdardick@tribune.com

Officer Denies Having Sex With Inmates (TALLDEM)

By Chitra Subramanyam, DEMOCRAT STAFF WRITER

Tallahassee Democrat, November 3, 2006

One of two correctional officers charged in connection with a sex-with-prisoners conspiracy testified in federal court Thursday.

He denied the allegations against him and said female inmates had lied about having sex with him. Federal Correctional Institution officer Alan Moore said, "They are lying ... Didn't have sex with any of those inmates ... I never touched any of the inmates."

Moore and Gregory Dixon are two of five FCI officers arrested June 21. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout at FCI Tallahassee after he opened fire on federal agents. The other officers, Alfred Barnes, Vincent Johnson and E. Lavon Spence, have pleaded guilty to mail fraud.

Moore's attorney, Robert Harper, asked his client if he had sex with an inmate in her room while her roommate was sleeping. Moore replied, "It doesn't make any sense ... Why would I have sex with an inmate while there was another inmate in that room?"

There were other places to have sex, he said. Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls asked him for examples of those places. Moore told jurors the encounters could have taken place in the TV room, on the stairs, in the bathrooms and in closets.

Moore also refuted statements a former inmate made Tuesday. She said Moore let her go to a different housing unit several times to have sex with Barnes. Moore said he never let her out, "not one time, not any time, never."

Barnes also testified Thursday. He said he had sex with three inmates in 2004 and gave them banned items.

"I would watch them," he said, responding to a question from prosecutors about how he would choose the inmates. He said he would "watch their demeanor" and how "individuals handled themselves" before approaching or propositioning them.

Responding to questions from defense attorneys, Barnes said that there was no agreement between the officers to have sex with, intimidate or sell contraband to inmates. Later, responding to questions from Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Davis, he said he knew the defendants were having sex with inmates but didn't report the matter.

"What was the point of reporting it when I was doing wrong myself?" he said.

Closing arguments are expected today.

Contact reporter Chitra Subramanyam at (850) 599-2304 or csubramanyam@tallahassee.com."I never touched any of the inmates."

16 Arrested In Sweep Of Townsend Street (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Sixteen alleged members or associates of a Santa Ana street gang were arrested Thursday following a yearlong undercover investigation into drug sales in their neighborhood, police said.

Three of them — Juan Verdin, 28, Adrian Nava, 24, and Jesus Vasquez, 41 — were charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana today, according to a statement by the FBI, which acted jointly with the Santa Ana Police Department.

Those arrested are believed to be associated with the Townsend Street gang operating roughly in the 800 and 900 blocks of South Townsend Street, authorities said.

"They were intimidating local residents," police spokesman Cmdr. Baltazar De La Riva said of the suspects.

LI Gang Member Guilty Of Murder (NSDY)

DOJ_NMG_0090799

By Zachary R. Dowdy, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 3, 2006

Federal jurors convicted a Central Islip gang member yesterday of plotting and carrying out the murder of a man partly because the victim wore yellow, a color preferred by a rival street gang.

Josue Otoniel Rubi-Gonzalez, 26, of Central Islip, who federal prosecutors say is a member of La Mara Salvatrucha or MS-13, was found guilty after a two-week trial in federal court in Central Islip of conspiracy and murder in aid of racketeering, more than three years after the June 2003 slaying of Jesus Valentin, 22, of Central Islip.

Rubi-Gonzalez will receive a mandatory life sentence from U.S. District Judge Leonard D. Wexler.

Valentin met Rubi-Gonzalez and two other men by chance on Lowell Avenue in Central Islip when the three began to suspect Valentin was a member of the Latin Kings gang because he was wearing a yellow shirt, prosecutors said.

They lured Valentin into a nearby patch of woods on the grounds of the former Central Islip Psychiatric Center with the ruse of offering him marijuana.

They then beat him with a fire extinguisher and a piece of lumber. Rubi-Gonzalez delivered a fatal stab wound with a pocketknife, prosecutors said.

The two stuffed Valentin's body into a drainpipe where it lay until Nov. 15, 2003.

"This conviction marks the latest success in a series of prosecutions to dismantle street gangs on Long Island and free our communities from the indiscriminate violence they unleash," said U.S. Attorney Roslynn R. Mauskopf. "Gang members who attempt to treat our communities as war zones will continue to face the full force of federal prosecution."

Rubi-Gonzalez' attorney could not be reached for comment yesterday. The case was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys Richard P. Donoghue and James McGovern.

Information about the status of the cases against the two alleged accomplices in the killing was not available yesterday.

LI Gang Member Convicted Of Murdering Suspected Rival (AP)

AP, November 3, 2006

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. (AP) — A man identified as a member of the Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, street gang was convicted Tuesday of conspiracy and murder in aid of racketeering following a two-week trial in federal court on Long Island.

Josue Otoniel Rubi-Gonzalez, 21, faces up to life in prison when he is sentenced for the killing of Jesus Valentin in Central Islip on June 30, 2003. A sentencing date was not immediately announced.

Prosecutors said Rubi-Gonzalez and two other suspected MS-13 gang members met Valentin during a chance encounter more than three years ago. Valentin was suspected of being a member of the rival Latin Kings street gang, in part because he was wearing a yellow shirt, a color frequently worn by the Latin Kings, prosecutors said.

He was lured into the woods, where he was brutally beaten with a fire extinguisher and a piece of lumber before Rubi-Gonzalez fatally stabbed him with a pocket knife, prosecutors said. The victim's body was hidden in a drain pipe, where it wasn't discovered until Nov. 15, 2003. It was not immediately clear what happened to the two accomplices.

Rubi-Gonzalez and 29 other suspected members of three gangs — MS-13, the Bloods, and Murder Unit — were named in a Feb. 4, 2004, indictment, charging them with five murders, a firebombing, multiple assaults, robbery and drug distribution across Long Island. Since then more than 20 members of the MS-13 gang have either pleaded guilty or been convicted at trial.

"This conviction marks the latest success in a series of prosecutions to dismantle street gangs on Long Island and free our communities from the indiscriminate violence they unleash," U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said in a statement.

FBI Cyber Crackdown Leads To 16 Arrests (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, November 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — In its latest crackdown on cybercrime, the FBI planned to announce Friday the arrests of 16 people in the USA and Poland suspected of participating in a website where stolen personal data were traded and phishing attacks were launched.

Individuals were arrested in Atlanta and Columbus, Ohio. Raids were conducted in New York, Texas, Tennessee, Nebraska, Georgia and Ohio, the FBI said.

Search warrants on three individuals in Romania also were performed this week as part of the ongoing investigation.

The actions against the Cardkeeper forum are the highest-profile since the Richmond, Va., division of the bureau started investigating the phishing attack on a bank in mid-2004. More than 100,000 credit and debit cards from more than 1,000 individuals were compromised.

DOJ_NMG_0090800

It is the federal government's latest salvo in a battle against online crooks dealing in stolen credit and debit cards and online bank accounts. In 2004, the FBI and Secret Service briefly disrupted growth of such forums with the bust-up of Shadowcrew, a forum of more than 4,000 members. Since then, other forums have formed or resurfaced with new security measures to avoid detection, security experts and law enforcement officials say.

The arrests are the latest indication that federal officials are serious about tamping down online credit card fraud and deterring 12 to 20 carding forums worldwide, says Dan Clements, CEO of CardCops, an identity-theft-prevention company.

The FBI says it is working with local law enforcement officials in the USA and Eastern Europe.

"Cybercriminals will no longer be able to hide behind borders to conduct their illicit business," James Finch, assistant director of the FBI's Cyber Division, said in a statement.

Still, unless U.S. officials have success extraditing suspects from such locales as Romania, Clements is unsure how effective the crackdowns will be: "This is a small dent in the problem, if (computer) servers continue to run in Romania."

3 Americans Arrested By F.B.I. In Identity Thefts (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

At least three Americans and 11 Polish nationals have been arrested in the last month in a crackdown on an online black market in which users buy and sell credit card numbers, bank account log-ins and other personal information, federal investigators say.

The three Americans have been identified as Dana Carlotta Warren, 29, of Atlanta and Zanadu Lyons, 24, and Frederick T. Hale, both of Columbus, Ohio. The charges included conspiracy to commit bank fraud, identification fraud, identity theft and other violations in what the F.B.I. described as a plot linking those arrested in the United States and those in Poland.

The F.B.I. and federal prosecutors are expected to announce the arrests of two more Americans today.

The arrests follow a two-year operation in which the F.B.I. worked with Polish investigators to identify suspects trading in or enabling the use of stolen consumer information.

Warrants were also being served in Romania as part of a continuing investigation, an F.B.I. spokesman, Paul Bresson, said.

The proliferation and sale of stolen consumer data on the international black market, particularly through online forums, has been a nagging problem for law enforcement, given the restrictions in national legal systems.

But the assistant director of the F.B.I.'s Cyber Division, James Finch, suggested that this was slowly changing.

"We are sharing evidence and using sophisticated techniques like never before," Mr. Finch said in a statement. "Cybercriminals will no longer be able to hide behind borders to conduct their illicit business. There will be no safe haven for cybercrime."

FBI Nabs Phishers In U.S., Eastern Europe (CNET)

By Tom Krazit, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, November 3, 2006

With help from local authorities, the agency has arrested more than a dozen individuals connected with a global scam. Details due Friday.

The FBI plans on Friday to announce the arrest of at least 16 individuals in connection with a global cybercrime investigation.

More than 20 FBI offices participated in the probe into a series of phishing attacks against a "major financial institution" that occurred in 2004 between August and October, according to materials provided by the FBI ahead of the announcement. Agents conducted investigations inside the U.S. and other countries to identify a ring of identity thieves who were acquiring and trading stolen credit and debit card numbers through an online forum.

The investigation targeted both hackers, who compromised about 50 servers in order to launch the phishing attacks, and those who sought to acquire stolen financial data. Phishing is an online scam in which individuals are tricked into providing personal information in response to e-mails that appear to be coming from legitimate sources.

Three arrests have been made inside the U.S., and 11 were made in Poland. Additional arrests are expected to come out of an investigation in Romania, where FBI agents are still monitoring suspects.

"Cybercriminals will no longer be able to hide behind borders to conduct their illicit business. There will be no safe haven for cybercrime," James Finch, assistant director of the FBI's Cyber Division, said in a statement. Several spin-off investigations have resulted from the initial inquiry, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090801

FBI Tightens Net Around Identity Theft Operations (WP)

By Brian Krebs

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The FBI is cracking down on an international identity theft operation that involves the trading of social security numbers; the sale of stolen credit card account information; and phishing, the practice of using e-mail to trick consumers into handing over personal information, authorities said yesterday.

Called Operation Cardkeeper, the investigation has brought about the arrests of more than a dozen people in the United States and other countries who are members of online communities that specialize in "carding," the trafficking of stolen identities and credit card and bank account information.

"We are sharing evidence and using sophisticated techniques like never before," said James E. Finch, assistant director of the FBI's Cyber Division. "Cyber criminals will no longer be able to hide behind borders to conduct their illicit business."

Investigators said some members of the criminal rings purchased data that was electronically copied from the magnetic strip on the back of credit or debit cards and used the information to create counterfeit cards for cash withdrawals and retail purchases. Others sold Social Security numbers and other personal data through online carder forums. That data was later used to obtain credit cards in the victims' names, investigators said.

Facing charges in the United States are Frederick T. Hale, 27, and Zanadu Lyons, 24, both of Columbus, Ohio, and Dana Carlotta Warren, 29, of Ellenwood, Ga. Authorities have also served search warrants in Albany, N.Y.; Atlanta; Dallas; Knoxville, Tenn.; Memphis; and Omaha.

Working with international authorities, the FBI also assisted in the arrests of 11 people in Poland believed to be connected to a network of online fraud forums. The FBI said it had traced a series of phishing attacks from late 2004 back to members of the Polish ring.

Phishing involves the use of e-mail messages that impersonate those from a financial institution and urge recipients to update their account information. Recipients who comply typically are directed to bogus look-alike bank sites designed to steal customer information.

The Anti-Phishing Working Group, an industry consortium, said more than 10,000 phishing Web sites were active on the Internet in August, about double the number of sites in January.

In 2004, the FBI and U.S. Secret Service infiltrated and dismantled the Shadowcrew and Carderplanet fraud forums, arresting 28 individuals who collectively traded more than 1.7 million stolen credit card numbers.

Deception Charge Leveled On Defense (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

Federal prosecutors have accused the defense team for a D.C. man in an upcoming death-penalty trial of using private investigators posing as government employees to interview a victim's family.

"The defense employed tactics clearly designed to deceive witnesses and victims into thinking that they were granting interviews to victim-witness advocates," prosecutors wrote in an Oct. 31 memo filed in federal court in the District.

Attorneys for Larry Gooch, charged with killing five persons as an enforcer for the so-called M Street Crew in Northeast, sharply disputed the memo.

Defense attorney Jensen E. Barber II wrote in a memo filed yesterday that the government was making "baseless claims" and a "blatant misstatement." Mr. Barber could not be reached by deadline, but has previously declined to comment on the case.

Last year, prosecutors filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty if Mr. Gooch is convicted. Family members of victims likely would be called to testify during the sentencing phase in the case of a guilty verdict.

Prosecutors became concerned about how the defense was trying to interview family members of victims after a phone call from Barbara Cooper, the mother of Calvin Cooper, whom authorities say was fatally shot by Mr. Gooch, according to court records.

Mrs. Cooper told prosecutors she consented to an interview last week after two persons she thought were victim-witness advocates working for the prosecution visited her home.

"During the interview, they began asking questions about the murder of her son in ways that made her suspicious of their motives," the government memo states. "She asked them to restate their purpose and their affiliation.

"They admitted they were from the law firm that represented Larry Gooch," the memo continues. "She said, 'Isn't that the man who killed my son?' She terminated the interview and called the prosecutors."

DOJ_NMG_0090802

Prosecutors said they don't object to witnesses speaking with the defense team, but want a court order to bar "using misrepresentation to obtain consent for these interviews," the Oct. 31 memo states.

But Mr. Barber stated "nothing could be less true" than the suggestion defense team members interviewed Mrs. Cooper on false pretenses.

He said the two defense team members who visited Mrs. Cooper left her a card with his law office's name and phone number displayed.

Mr. Barber also has said Mr. Gooch wants to "develop compassionate relationships with the survivors of our client's alleged crimes."

"Simple human decency calls for defense attorneys to relate to victims with respect and compassion," Mr. Barber said. "Mrs. Cooper was treated with respect and compassion and given the opportunity to call upon our victim-liaison specialist ...."

He also said defense-victim liaisons have been authorized increasingly in federal capital cases, including the trial of convicted Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh.

"When we develop relationships between survivors and defense teams and/or clients, survivors' concern about the form of punishment -- death or something else -- often recedes into the background," Mr. Barber wrote.

S.A. Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio Express-News, November 3, 2006

A San Antonio man pleaded guilty Thursday to a charge of possessing child pornography — movies a federal judge called "trash."

George Herman "Skip" Wenglein Jr. entered the plea as part of a pre-indictment deal in which prosecutors dropped another charge alleging Wenglein, 46, sent an undercover FBI agent in Buffalo, N.Y., computer videos of adults engaged in sexual acts with children.

Wenglein, who is out on bond and in a physical rehabilitation facility, faces up to 10 years in prison and a lifetime of federal supervision when U.S. District Judge Fred Biery sentences him in February.

The FBI arrested Wenglein in June after serving a search warrant at his home in gated Oakwell Farms in March 2005.

The allegations of his federal criminal case have stunned those closest to him. Wenglein's wife filed for divorce in June and obtained restraining orders against him.

Wenglein's lawyers said the fallout from the criminal case caused Wenglein to try to take his own life by shooting himself in the head on June 16, 2005. He requires around the clock care, is in a wheelchair and may not be able to walk again, his attorneys said.

"I think any grown person that finds it necessary to view child pornography has a problem," Alan Brown, one of his lawyers, said, adding that Wenglein is undergoing therapy.

Wenglein is the son of the late George Herman Wenglein Sr., one of the founders of the Luby's cafeteria chain. The younger Wenglein had worked for the company until it moved its headquarters from San Antonio to Houston in 2004, Luby's officials said.

The search warrant affidavit — kept secret for a year and a half — was recently unsealed, revealing details of his crime that are more explicit than in previous court pleadings.

The affidavit also contains allegations that Wenglein, an ex-band teacher in Lubbock, harassed two former teen female students by calling them repeatedly with sexual intentions. Wenglein was charged in one of those cases in 1990 and pleaded guilty to a harassment charge. He was sentenced to 180 days of deferred adjudication and was fined $300, according to court records and Brown.

Brown told the judge that he plans to argue for leniency for Wenglein partly based on his condition. The judge said that could backfire for Wenglein should Assistant U.S. Attorney Mary Nelda Valadez counter Brown's arguments by asking the judge to look at the videos himself.

"So far I haven't had to look at this trash," Biery said. "The descriptions are bad enough. ... These were toddlers. These weren't even teenagers. I'm just giving you fair warning."

Out Of Grief, A New Search For Hope In SE (WP)

By Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The handwritten message, "RIP Lil Cindy. We love you always," vanished from the wall with a squirt of household cleaner and a scouring pad.

DOJ_NMG_0090803

The hand doing the scrubbing belonged to Cynthia "Big Cindy" Gray, who cries often since her daughter and namesake was shot to death more than two months ago. She had gotten fresh angel wings tattooed on her neck, ordered T-shirts bearing Lil Cindy's image and turned her apartment into a shrine. But the message on the wall outside her door had to go.

Graffiti, profane or benign, symbolized the neglect and disorder that Big Cindy and her neighbors in Benning Terrace say they want to leave behind. So there she was, on one of her brighter days since her child was killed, wiping away a condolence note that had touched her heart.

"You have to use the Brillo pad," Big Cindy told a helper matter-of-factly.

It's difficult to find anyone in Benning Terrace, the public housing complex in Southeast Washington where mother and daughter lived, who is untouched by homicide. A baby's father. A cousin. A husband. A son. In 17-year-old Lil Cindy, a daughter and a friend.

Nearly a decade ago, the District's resources were trained on the complex after a 12-year-old boy was kidnapped, shot and left dead in a frozen ravine. Crime was so bad then that the D.C. Housing Authority considered tearing down the 274-unit complex. Now, another jarring crime -- a teenager gunned down as she held a baby -- has Benning Terrace asking again: How can we save our children?

A small cadre of residents has begun searching for answers. They want to curb the senseless violence, instill hope in those who have grown up with none and convince their neighbors that at least part of the answer lies within.

Teenagers and adults have begun assembling action plans and dreaming of a new community center, a neighborhood go-cart track, a job training center. But their first step toward a new tomorrow started in the same place that residents began a decade ago: A neighborhood cleanup. Pick up the trash. Scrape away the rust. Put on a fresh coat of paint. Show the naysayers that something, anything, can happen.

For Big Cindy, a part of her healing was wiping down a wall.A Recurring Message

In early September, nervous energy rippled through First Rock Baptist Church in Southeast as D.C. Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8), trailed by colleague Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), walked up the center aisle. Young girls with puffy eyes and boys with hardened stares filled the balcony and many floor-level pews. Up front, Big Cindy shook hands with dignitaries and friends but stared ahead at her daughter, lying in a coffin.

Politicians and preachers lectured: Stop the violence. Don't retaliate. Change your wicked ways -- words that have echoed through many funerals for the young.

In 1997, the neighborhood gathered at First Rock to remember Darryl D. Hall, the scrawny 12-year-old who had fired a gun at some older rivals. He paid for it with his life. In the aftermath, young men in warring neighborhood crews were hired to clean up their community. Homicides declined dramatically. For a while, residents marveled at the welcome sound of shrieking children playing in the courtyards.

The truce brokered by the Alliance for Concerned Men had stopped the bloodshed, and young men who once had sworn to kill each other began breaking bread together. Some still work for the D.C. Department of Housing, helping to maintain the property and keep youngsters off the streets.

But residents had a recurring message: People need jobs to feed their families. Children need activities to keep them occupied.

During Lil Cindy's funeral, Barry urged mourners to demand more from their leaders. "Benning Terrace isn't fit for a dog to live there," he said.

Ronald Moten, co-founder of Peaceoholics, a grass-roots outreach group, told residents to focus first on what they could do for themselves, and then he issued a challenge. If you're serious about change, he told them, take a trip with me . . . to a city-owned campground in Southern Maryland.Respite From Violence

At the campsite, Tony Gray, Big Cindy's younger brother, was in his element. He had come to support his sister and to further his goal of finding a way to keep youths away from violence. An avid fisherman, he happily taught novices how to push bloodworms onto hooks, wait patiently for a fish to bite and then to reel it in purposefully while keeping control. It was nearing midnight, and the youngsters weren't nearly ready for bed. As the night deepened, more migrated to the water's edge, eager for a chance to cast out and reel one in.

This was Camp Riverview, a 200-acre Department of Recreation retreat where hundreds of teenagers go for a week at a time and which the city government offers, on special occasions, to other groups. This was one of them.

Moten suggested the retreat to the Rev. Anthony Minter at First Rock and organized support from such groups as East Capitol Center for Change, East River Family Strengthening Collaborative, the D.C. Department of Recreation, Washington Interfaith Network and the D.C. police department.

So it was that nearly 90 residents loaded blankets, pillows and bags of snacks onto tour buses for the trip to Scotland, Md. About two of three participants were children, most ages 6 to 16. Young men were scarce.

DOJ_NMG_0090804

Big Cindy joined her neighbors at meals, strategy sessions and walks, sticking close to her brother and mother, Ernestine Randolph.

More than anyone else, Randolph understood her daughter's grief.

Two of her 13 children have also been shot to death. Juan Randolph, 14, was killed while walking near his mother's home in Northwest Washington in July 1993. A year later, his older brother Alfred McCrae, 22, was fatally shot.

One night during the retreat, Randolph sat with dozens of others watching "Tale of the Tape," a documentary about life and death on D.C. streets. In the film by Curtis Mozie, boys are seen alive, then lying in a casket. "This violence is ridiculous," said Randolph, 60, watching stoically throughout even as a teenage girl sobbed uncontrollably.

For many, the 77-mile journey was their first experience camping, sleeping in cabins, walking in the woods. There were no sirens, no police jumping out at boys standing on corners, no worries about making it home safely. A slight chill in the air and waves crashing against the shore made a perfect backdrop for children to laugh, toss rocks into a moonlit Potomac River and begin to grapple with all that was wrong back home in Benning.

Most important, during the planning sessions, residents drew up their own plans of action: Urge management to repair apartments. Start a community cleanup drive. Keep in touch with neighbors. Know where your children are. Be an example.'You Can't Reach Them All'

Tomorrow marks the fourth weekend in a row on which kids, and a few parents, begin to arrive at the community recreation center shortly after 8 a.m., waiting for directions. At the first cleanup, the supply closet was locked, and Tony Gray was trying to get keys. They arrived an hour later.

Out came yellow buckets, heavy-duty bags, gloves and spray bottles of cleaner. Big Cindy ordered the kids one way, then the next.

Gray, 39, is a maintenance supervisor of an apartment complex in Prince George's County. Since his niece was killed, he has moved to Benning Terrace to be with Big Cindy. He is lobbying housing officials to move her to another home. In the meantime, he's trying to make Benning Terrace better. One recent Sunday afternoon, he watched as a youth threw a wrapper on the ground.

"The little kids have spent the weekend cleaning up," he told the boy. "Could you pick that up?" The youngster -- who looked to be 12 or 13 -- rolled his eyes and walked away.

"You can't reach them all," Gray shrugged. His 15-year-old son is locked up until he is 21 for trying to stab someone. "He thought he knew it all," said Gray, a father of six. "I'd rather he be there than to be out in the street."

He banters with the neighborhood kids, who call him Hercules after the patch on his blue work shirt. Some have already tired of hearing his catchphrase: "Don't talk about it. Be about it."

His efforts, such as selecting new paint colors -- green and tan -- for buildings, drew praise at the recent resident council meeting. But the tasks ahead are daunting.

Some residents chuck trash bags out the window and leave them lying on the ground below. Litter is so prevalent that some areas need repeat cleanings. And some forces in the neighborhood are intent on thwarting progress.

One recent Saturday night, even as residents were lobbying city officials for better recreation facilities, someone set a fire on the playground. The slide melted.

"That made me want to cry," Gray said. "But we can't let that stop us."

Last weekend, the buckets and paint brushes were out again. A deejay played music as children painted. Big Cindy was given a plaque honoring her dead daughter. An idea from the retreat, a state-of-the-art community center, received a major boost.

Fenty, the likely next mayor, stopped by and promised that seed money for the project would be included in his first budget. The children who came up with the idea applauded.

Gray and others smiled. Something had just happened.

As Release Nears, These Inmates Are All Business (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

BRYAN, Tex. -- His street name was "T-Murder"; his turf, the Deadly Nickel, as Houston's Fifth Ward is known in the 'hood. His business put $25,000 in his pocket monthly.

Those were the days when Thomas Laqueá Harrell Sr. ran his own crack cocaine ring, a capital venture that landed him in the Texas prison system with a 25-year sentence. Seven years of incarceration later and a few weeks from being paroled, this entrepreneur is ready to go back to work. But he's going legit.

DOJ_NMG_0090805

Thomas Laqueá Harrell Sr., who graduated from the Prison Entrepreneurship Program, wants to start a mobile food business when he is released in a few weeks after serving seven years of a 25-year sentence for running a drug ring. (By Sylvia Moreno -- The Washington Post)

Save & Share Article What's This?

Facebook

Harrell has a written business plan, a marketing strategy, a net profit/loss analysis, a projected income statement and a financial summary. All he needs, Harrell recently told a panel of business executives gathered inside the walls of the medium-security Hamilton Unit, is a start-up loan.

"Hello, my name is Thomas Harrell Sr., the founder and owner of Yum Yum's Mobile Catering Service," the animated 31-year-old inmate announced. "We make hot, on-the-spot barbecue meals."

This was Harrell's pitch for his new business, one of 60 similar plans presented by the graduates of an unusual Texas prison program designed to harness a convict's street smarts and funnel them into a legitimate venture upon release.

"We are not so much in the business of creating entrepreneurs as leveraging their skills," said Catherine Rohr, founder of the Prison Entrepreneurship Program, a nonprofit organization based in Houston. "After all, it was their entrepreneurial skills that landed them in prison."

Rohr, a one-time venture capitalist in California and New York, was inspired after visiting a prison ministry program in the spring of 2004 that was started by former Watergate conspirator Charles W. Colson. She heard a graduate say that he left prison after eight years and started a general contracting business that made $1.7 million in sales in 18 months.

"I thought I was going on a zoo tour of caged-up animals," recalled Rohr, 29, of that first visit to a prison in Sugar Land, Tex. "Instead, I saw human beings who are just as much in need of grace as I am, and I saw all this untapped potential, good sales skills and decent business sense."

Rohr created a graduate school-style business plan competition there and, within months, quit her job in Manhattan, incorporated her program and moved to Texas. She obtained permission from the state Department of Criminal Justice to locate her program in the Hamilton Unit. The pre-release facility, 100 miles northwest of Houston, houses 1,200 inmates who participate in a special therapeutic program for six to eight months before their discharge.

Rohr has instituted a rigorous business curriculum: more than 350 hours of class time, taught by 100 business executives whom she recruits; exams; extensive writing assignments; and tough homework penalties for inmates who do anything from utter a curse word to fail a test. Prisoners are paired with Harvard and Texas A&M University students, online or in person, who help edit their business plans. The executives then judge the plans.

First, though, inmates must qualify for PEP, as the program is known. They must have renounced any prison gang affiliation and must fill out a 23-page questionnaire, learn 10 pages of financial terminology, take four tests and be interviewed by almost a dozen corporate executives and PEP graduates. Important as the tests and interviews are, Rohr said, "the number one thing we look for in inmates is change."

This summer, 150 prisoners applied for PEP's fourth class; 84 were selected, and 60 completed the four-month course. On a recent cool evening, the graduates marched single file in their blue caps and gowns into the basketball court in the middle of the "Pomp and Circumstance" played over a makeshift sound system operated by a white-uniformed inmate. The graduates' relatives and the corporate executives who earlier judged the business plans gave the men a standing ovation.

For about half the graduates -- ranging in age from 20 years old to over 60, serving time for crimes from burglary to murder -- this was their first formal cap and gown ceremony.

Thomas Laqueá Harrell Sr., who graduated from the Prison Entrepreneurship Program, wants to start a mobile food business when he is released in a few weeks after serving seven years of a 25-year sentence for running a drug ring. (By Sylvia Moreno -- The Washington Post)

Save & Share Article What's This?

Facebook

"Families -- your sons, your husbands, your boyfriends, your brothers here tonight have probably robbed you and probably lied to you," Rohr said as the graduation began. "I stand here before you to vouch for these men. . . . They are capable of going out and being productive members of society."

Including this class, PEP has graduated 220 participants, and 175 have been released from prison. Rohr said 21 former inmates have started or operate small businesses. Almost 40 have completed PEP's post-prison executive course offered in Houston and Dallas and are being mentored by corporate executives. The employment rate among PEP graduates is over 93 percent, she said, and the recidivism rate has been less than 5 percent.

During the graduation ceremony and throughout the day, inmates often thanked the executives for volunteering as teachers and as judges for the two-day business plan competition.

"They could be anywhere in the world but chose to be here with me, and I can't even get a letter from my dad," said inmate Cory Seago, 27, breaking into tears as he spoke from the graduation podium. "I've been in prison two times. I lost everything: my hope, my dreams, my confidence. PEP's been more than a business class for me. I learned about love."

For many executives, the experience was transformative as well. Geoff Jones, chief financial officer of Trico Marine Services of Houston, conceded he was apprehensive when he first entered the prison. "You think you're going to go in there and feel unsafe and be surrounded by undesirables," he said.

Instead, Jones said, he was impressed by the quality of the business plans and the presentations. "They believed in what they were telling you, and it meant a lot to them. It was their chance to impress somebody in the free world," he said.

prison yard, the concrete slab fenced off by a tall chain-link fence topped with concertina wire.

Gang Trial Hangs On Informant's Testimony (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Noe "Shorty" Cruz knew that his fellow MS-13 gang members didn't care much for police informants. Members who turned on the gang to help the police were "rats," and the violent gang ethos called for them to have their tongues cut out.

So when a fellow gang member confronted him in a Riverdale parking lot with the words, "OrdoÃ±o sends his greetings," he knew he had to act quickly, Cruz said. "OrdoÃ±o" was Felipe OrdoÃ±o, a Prince George's County anti-gang police detective -- and the investigator who directed Cruz as he worked undercover for nearly two years.

Cruz said the taunt didn't surprise him. "I got angry," he later testified. Cruz said he told his fellow gang members to "stop talking such stupidity." The gang member responded that he was only joking, Cruz testified.

Federal prosecutors hope that Cruz's account of the heart-stopping confrontation, and his description of a multitude of crimes his fellow gang members committed, will help convince jurors that MS-13 is not a garden-variety street gang but a violent and international criminal enterprise.

Cruz, 25, is a key prosecution witness in the federal racketeering trial that is nearing an end in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. Attorneys gave their closing arguments yesterday.

Federal prosecutors have brought racketeering charges against 22 alleged members of MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha. The indictment accuses the gang of six murders and four attempted murders between April 2003 and June 2005 in Prince George's and Montgomery counties. Cruz testified against the first two defendants to go on trial: Oscar Ramos Velasquez, 21, known as "Casper," and Edgar Alberto Ayala, 29, who goes by the nickname "Pony."

Gary A. Ticknor, Ayala's attorney, said yesterday in his closing statement that his client did not participate in any murders or robberies and did nothing to intimidate witnesses. Velasquez's attorney, Richard C. Bittner, said the government's case against his client amounted to "guilt by association. He never committed a criminal wrong."

During nearly four days on the witness stand, Cruz described an array of criminal activities carried out by MS-13.

He testified that the gang robbed prostitution houses, videotaped two Prince George's County police officers and a federal agent and spoke of killing an officer, and that an MS-13 leader bemoaned OrdoÃ±o's "busting everybody."

Most of the activities Cruz described occurred in neighborhoods hugging the Prince George's and Montgomery borders, where many MS-13 members live.

According to the testimony of Cruz and OrdoÃ±o, this is how Cruz became a key informant:

Prince George's police had scores of photographs of MS-13 gang members but didn't know who they were. In December 2003, OrdoÃ±o visited Cruz in the county jail, hoping that Cruz would put names to some of the photos. Cruz was locked up for allegedly assaulting a girlfriend.

Cruz told OrdoÃ±o that he was angry with the gang. Fellow gang members had murdered one of his friends, another MS-13 member. Also, a fellow MS-13 member had pushed him while he was holding his infant son, almost causing him to drop the boy. That member warned Cruz that he needed to attend more gang meetings, Cruz testified.

OrdoÃ±o testified that Cruz was nervous during the initial encounter. The two later met away from the detention center.

The assault charges against Cruz were dropped. OrdoÃ±o said he had nothing to do with that. Outside the jail, Cruz agreed to be an informant and wore a wire to several gang meetings.

Cruz is in the federal witness protection program. He testified that federal authorities have moved him three times and have paid for him to have some of his gang tattoos removed or altered.

The first time he was moved, Cruz said, he returned to his old neighborhood to see a girlfriend. He said that federal officials then moved him to another community.

In his new home, Cruz said, he worked at a construction job with two other MS-13 gang members who became suspicious of him.

One day after work, someone shot at him near his home, Cruz testified. After that, Cruz said, he was moved to another location. Federal officials also paid for his girlfriend and their young child to be moved.

According to trial testimony, Cruz entered the United States with fraudulent documents provided by an aunt. Cruz testified that he believed federal officials would help him with documentation to remain legally in the United States once the case was over.

To buttress Cruz's testimony, a Salvadoran police officer testified last week on behalf of the government that MS-13 leaders in El Salvador told Maryland gang leaders how the organization should be run and even sent two leaders to Maryland to provide advice. Killing witnesses against the gang was one of the tenets the Salvadoran gang leaders imparted, the officer testified.

The Salvadoran officer testified under a pseudonym after prosecutors convinced U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow that his life would be in jeopardy if gang members in El Salvador learned of his identity.

Threat Is Exaggerated (USAT)

By Randall D. Eliason

USA Today, November 3, 2006

Supporters of a federal shield law claim the proposed statute is necessary to encourage confidential sources to come forward and to ensure that reporters do not go to jail. They are wrong on both counts.

"Leaks" to the press are a pervasive part of our culture. Scandals such as Watergate and Iran-Contra were exposed despite the lack of a federal shield law. More recently, sources have leaked information about secret CIA prisons, Iraq's Abu Ghraib and domestic surveillance. Investigative journalism is thriving, and there is no evidence that leaks are drying up for want of a shield law.

Journalists are free to promise sources that they will not identify them unless they are ordered to by a court. Cases where a court actually does that are extremely rare. Leakers are far more likely to be identified through an internal company investigation or by some other means.

Sources willing to face these more substantial risks of exposure are unlikely to change their minds because of the remote chance that a court might someday force a reporter to identify them. And sources who are really worried can always provide information to the press anonymously, not even revealing their identity to a reporter.

Nor would a shield law keep reporters from going to jail. Most shield laws, including the proposed federal statute, are not absolute. For example, under the proposed federal law, the San Francisco reporters would still be ordered to testify because they have information critical to a criminal investigation. Presumably, they would still refuse and would still face jail for contempt.

Those reporters are facing jail not for what they wrote, but for defying a lawful court order. Their source is suspected of perjury and obstruction of justice. By refusing to testify, the reporters are placing themselves above the law and are shielding the true potential criminal. That's not conduct that should be encouraged by a federal statute.

Randall D. Eliason, a former federal prosecutor, teaches law in Washington, D.C.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Predict Voter ID Problems (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

On Indiana's primary day, Rep. Julia Carson shoved her congressional identification card in a pocket, ran out of her house and raced down the street to be at her polling site when it opened at 6 a.m. The Democrat, seeking to represent Indianapolis for a sixth term, showed the card to a poll worker, who told her it was unacceptable under a new state law that requires every voter to show proof of identity.

The law compels voters to show an ID, issued by Indiana or the federal government, with a photograph and an expiration date. Carson's card was for the 109th Congress, but did not say when the session ends. "I just thought I was carrying the right thing -- if you have a card that has a picture and shows it is current," she said.

In the end, the poll worker telephoned a boss, and Carson was allowed to vote for herself in the five-way primary. But her close call in the light turnout of the May primary, she and other Democrats say, foreshadows turmoil and votes that are not counted when the nation goes to the polls for Tuesday's midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0090808

Indiana will have the country's strictest voter identification law in effect on Election Day. The 2005 picture ID law, however, puts it among a dozen states that have tightened requirements lately that voters display some form of identification at the polls. The laws have spawned partisan warring, lawsuits and confusion that election experts predict could influence the outcome of some close elections.

In the Washington area, Virginia requires all voters to show identification, although it does not need to have a picture. Maryland and the District require first-time voters who registered by mail to bring identification, such as a driver's license or utility bill, to the polls.

While the local laws have not been challenged, new voter ID laws nationally are the most widespread, and most bitterly disputed, of several types of voting procedures that states have adopted after the chaotic 2000 presidential election. The procedures include statewide electronic databases of registered voters, which critics allege have in a few states improperly knocked out eligible people. In another procedure, Ohio and Florida -- battleground states that have produced recent contested elections -- have placed tighter reins on groups that work to register new voters.

Such rules, together with updated voting-machine technology, were touted as means to modernize and bolster public confidence in the election system. They have quickly led to new struggles over voting rights. Republicans and their allies assert that the identification requirements and other rules will lessen voting fraud. Democrats and their supporters contend the changes are ploys to suppress voting among poor, elderly, minority and disabled citizens, who are prone to support Democratic candidates.

"We believe photo ID is the kind of confidence-building measure that is warranted in light of past fraud," said Mark "Thor" Hearne, the chief election lawyer for the 2004 Bush campaign and now counsel to the American Center for Voting Rights, a conservative advocacy group. He predicted the identification laws will prompt higher turnout.

Mary G. Wilson, national president of the League of Women Voters, said identification laws, particularly ones requiring photo IDs, are "odious" and added: "There is very little evidence there's been any kind of voting by people who are ineligible to vote. We view this as basically another unnecessary hurdle voters are being put through."

Tuesday's election will be "a laboratory of democracy," providing the first major test of which view is right, said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, a nonpartisan project that tracks election reform.

In 2002, as Congress debated how to respond to the disputed presidential election two years earlier, lawmakers disagreed over how much to make voters prove who they are. In the end, the Help America Vote Act requires first-time voters who register by mail without an ID to bring identification to the polls. Nearly half the states have tougher laws.

Missouri and Georgia have adopted photo identification laws similar to Indiana's, although Missouri's has been struck down as unconstitutional and a federal court has halted the Georgia requirements while a lawsuit is underway.

In Arizona, voters are required to bring some form of ID and proof of citizenship. The requirement is being challenged in federal courts, but the Supreme Court stepped in two weeks ago to say that IDs could be required in Tuesday's election before the lawsuits are resolved. The situation has been in even greater flux in Ohio, where opponents of a new ID law sued last week over whether voters using absentee ballots must supply an identification number. Ohio courts flip-flopped on the question before the parties reached a settlement late Wednesday that exempts absentee ballots from the state's ID law for Tuesday's election only.

Indiana's law is also being challenged, by the Indiana Democratic Party and the state chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union; the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit has indicated it will not decide before Election Day whether to uphold a lower-court ruling that it is constitutional.

Indiana's secretary of state, Todd Rokita, a Republican who made photo IDs part of his platform when he ran for the office, said photo IDs give "a measure of integrity" to an election system that had been continually expanding access to voting since the mid-1960s.

He said that, based on the primary in which Carson's congressional ID card was challenged and a few local special elections, the law "is going very, very well." His office is spending $2 million in federal and state money on advertising about the requirements, including ads targeting bus passengers who do not have cars or driver's licenses.

The law enables people without a driver's license to get a free state ID at Bureau of Motor Vehicle branches. But first they need an official birth certificate and other documents, and some Hoosiers are discovering it is difficult to get one in time.

Jowana Peterson, 51, of Indianapolis lost her wallet with her license inside a few weeks ago. When she went to replace it, she brought a copy of her birth certificate from Chicago, her Social Security card, her ID card from her job as a financial planner and four utility bills. "They turned me out cold," she said, telling her she needed a new birth certificate from Cook County. She has applied, but it has not yet arrived. Because she had signed up to work at the polls on Election Day, she was eligible to get an absentee ballot, but she worries about other would-be voters who cannot get one -- or do not know to ask.

DOJ_NMG_0090809

Even so, she says, "I feel pretty cheated. I am an American citizen. I've paid my taxes. I feel the system kind of let me down. It shouldn't be that hard."

Delays Loom In Counting Ballots (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — As the battle for control of Congress enters its final weekend, election experts warn that the number of voters forced to cast provisional ballots Tuesday because of eligibility questions could delay some results in tight races for days or weeks.

New statewide voter databases, strict ID requirements and other factors may increase the percentage of voters whose paper ballots must be reviewed by local officials.

Provisional ballots are often used when a voter is not listed as registered, shows up at the wrong precinct, lacks required identification, has moved recently but returns to his or her old polling place, or is listed by a slightly different name in state databases.

The ballots are delivered in envelopes to elections officials, who must rule after Election Day on the voters' eligibility before counting or discarding them. “I think we're going to see a lot more provisionals than we've seen before,” says Kimball Brace, president of Election Data Services. “For a poll worker, a provisional is the easy way out.”

Poll workers are encouraged to use provisional ballots if they're not sure what to do. “This is really a good tool for election officials and for voters,” says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

In 2004, the first year provisional ballots were used nationwide, about 1.9 million people cast them. About 1.23 million of those, or nearly 65%, were ruled to be in order. The number of provisional votes counted was about 1% of the 122 million votes cast for president.

Eighteen states allow late counting of absentee ballots postmarked by Election Day. The combination of absentee and provisional ballots could leave close races undecided Tuesday. State officials might not even know how many provisional ballots were cast.

Some states allow extended periods for determining the eligibility of provisional voters — up to 28 days in California. In Washington state in 2004, provisional ballots played a role in delaying Gov. Christine Gregoire's victory for more than eight weeks.

“With so much attention focused on pre-election barriers, we've almost forgotten about things that could cause problems on and after Election Day,” says Dan Tokaji, a professor at Ohio State's Moritz College of Law. “Provisional ballots are at the top of that list.”

States with strict new ID requirements, such as Florida and Indiana, are likely to see increased use of provisional ballots. Six states — Idaho, Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Wyoming — should have very few because they allow voters to register on Election Day. North Dakota has no voter registration.

States, and even counties within a state, handle provisional ballots differently. Some polling places in Pennsylvania ran out of provisional ballots in 2004. In other states, the ballots became fodder for lawsuits because of variations in the way they were counted.

Most elections officials say provisional ballots are an improvement from the past, when voters were denied the right to vote. “This becomes a safety net for the voter,” says R. Doug Lewis of the Election Center, which represents state and local elections officials.

Denver To Get Voting Oversight (RMN)

By Laura Frank, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, November 3, 2006

Officials with the U.S. Department of Justice will be among those monitoring elections in Denver Tuesday.

The Justice Department is sending a record number of officials to monitor midterm elections across the country. Denver is one of 65 cities and counties nationwide where DOJ officials believe problems may be possible.

"They'll be doing observations of elections," said Alton Dillard, spokesman for the Denver Election Commission. He added that he was unaware of any specific reasons why Justice Department officials chose Denver.

Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil right division, told reporters this week that monitors would "very discreetly" assist voters who encounter problems voting. The officials would be watching for violations of federal voting laws. The Justice Department could use that information in future lawsuits, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0090810

Voters can notify the Justice Department of voting problems directly by calling the voter hotline at 1-800-253-3931 or visiting its Web site at www.usdoj.gov/crt/voting/index.htm.

The Acorn Indictments (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

So, less than a week before the midterm elections, four workers from Acorn, the liberal activist group that has registered millions of voters, have been indicted by a federal grand jury for submitting false voter registration forms to the Kansas City, Missouri, election board. But hey, who needs voter ID laws?

We wish this were an aberration, but allegations of fraud have tainted Acorn voter drives across the country. Acorn workers have been convicted in Wisconsin and Colorado, and investigations are still under way in Ohio, Tennessee and Pennsylvania.

The good news for anyone who cares about voter integrity is that the Justice Department finally seems poised to connect these dots instead of dismissing such revelations as the work of a few yahoos. After the federal indictments were handed up in Kansas City this week, the U.S. Attorney's office said in a statement that "This national investigation is very much ongoing."

Let's hope so. Acorn officials bill themselves as nonpartisan community organizers merely interested in giving a voice to minorities and the poor. In reality, Acorn is a union-backed, multimillion-dollar outfit that uses intimidation and other tactics to push for higher minimum wage mandates and to trash Wal-Mart and other non-union companies.

Operating in at least 38 states (as well as Canada and Mexico), Acorn pushes a highly partisan agenda, and its organizers are best understood as shock troops for the AFL-CIO and even the Democratic Party. As part of the Fannie Mae reform bill, House Democrats pushed an "affordable housing trust fund" designed to use Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac profits to subsidize Acorn, among other groups. A version of this trust fund actually passed the Republican House and will surely be on the agenda again next year.

Acorn and its affiliates have pulled some real stunts in recent years. In Ohio in 2004, a worker for one affiliate was given crack cocaine in exchange for fraudulent registrations that included underage voters, dead voters and pillars of the community named Mary Poppins, Dick Tracy and Jive Turkey. During a Congressional hearing in Ohio in the aftermath of the 2004 election, officials from several counties in the state explained Acorn's practice of dumping thousands of registration forms in their lap on the submission deadline, even though the forms had been collected months earlier.

"You have to wonder what's the point of that, if not to overwhelm the system and get phony registrations on the voter rolls," says Thor Hearne of the American Center for Voting Rights, who also testified at the hearing. "These were Democratic officials saying that they felt their election system in Ohio was under assault by these kinds of efforts to game the system."

Given this history, it's not surprising that Acorn is so hostile to voter identification laws and other efforts to ensure fairness and accuracy at the polls. In Missouri last month, the state Supreme Court held that a photo ID requirement to vote was overly burdensome and a violation of the state constitution. Acorn was behind the original suit challenging the statute, and it has brought similar challenges in several other states, including Ohio.

A recent Pew Research Center survey found that blacks today are almost twice as likely as they were in 2004 to say they have little or no confidence in the voting system. Such a finding would seem like a powerful argument for voter ID laws, which consistently poll well among people of all races and incomes and would increase confidence in the voting process. Of course, voter ID laws would also cut down on fraud, which, judging from the latest indictments, would put a real crimp in Acorn's style.

Lawsuit Targets Political Jurisdictions (FRESBEE)

By John Ellis

Fresno Bee, November 3, 2006

Merced Co. entities accused of not getting approval for changes.

Two Merced County residents have filed a lawsuit that claims multiple political jurisdictions in the county have undertaken more than 200 annexations and other related changes without federal approval, violating the Voting Rights Act.

The federal lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Fresno, names Merced County, the Local Agency Formation Commission, the cities of Atwater, Dos Palos, Gustine, Livingston and Los Banos, as well as 17 other irrigation, water, resource conservation and community service districts throughout the county.

"This is the most massive example of noncompliance that I have ever seen," said Joaquin Avila, an attorney and Seattle University law professor who filed the suit on behalf of Felix Lopez and Elizabeth Ruiz.

The suit doesn't seek to stop next week's election in the affected jurisdictions, but instead asks that certification of the results be delayed until approval for the changes is given by federal authorities, Avila said.

It also seeks class-action status for U.S. citizens of Spanish heritage who are registered to vote and are affected by the changes.

DOJ_NMG_0090811

A hearing has been scheduled Friday before U.S. District Judge Oliver W. Wanger in which the plaintiffs will seek a temporary restraining order that could delay certification of Tuesday's election in the affected Merced County jurisdictions.

James Fincher, county counsel designee in Merced, was still trying to digest the lawsuit late Wednesday, but he said a vast majority of the jurisdictions in the lawsuit — including all of the irrigation, water, resource conservation and community service districts — will not have elections Tuesday.

On Friday, he will ask Wanger to limit any arguments on a temporary restraining order to cities holding elections Tuesday. As for those cities, he said, they have submitted the needed paperwork to the Justice Department and are just waiting to hear back on approval of the annexations.

"This is not a case where there's something to be corrected," he said. "It's in the process."

One example is Gustine, where two candidates are running for mayor, and two people are unopposed for City Council seats in Tuesday's election.

Normally, obtaining Justice Department approval — known as a "preclearance" — is a formality. It happens more than 99% of the time, said Loyola Law School professor Richard L. Hasen, an expert in election law.

Still, Hasen said, "the failure to get preclearance is a problem in a lot of jurisdictions that are subject to the federal rules."

According to the lawsuit, either the U.S. attorney general or the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia must determine that any changes that affect voting "do not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group."

First approved in 1965, the Voting Rights Act targeted Southern states that had long used poll taxes and literacy tests to impede minority voting.

In the 1970s, four California counties — Kings, Merced, Monterey and Yuba — were added.

Under the act, the California counties must get federal permission for every change that affects voting. Examples include changes as small as moving a polling location or redrawing voting precincts, or as large as altering county supervisorial districts.

Annexations or consolidations also have an impact on voting, Avila said.

A similar Monterey County case made news a month before the state's 2003 gubernatorial recall election, where voters removed Gov. Gray Davis from office and replaced him with then-actor Arnold Schwarzenegger.

In that case, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law filed a suit claiming Monterey County's election plan had not been approved by federal authorities.

The Justice Department quickly authorized the county's proposal, which among other things consolidated some precincts in Hispanic neighborhoods and proposed hiring fewer bilingual poll workers.

The latest Merced County lawsuit claims its Local Agency Formation Commission and the named jurisdictions have approved 172 annexations, 35 detachments, four formations and one consolidation without federal approval since Nov. 1, 1972, when Merced became a Voting Rights Act county.

For instance, the lawsuit claims Merced County's LAFCO has approved 10 Gustine annexations since November 1972 without getting the required federal approval.

Gustine City Manager Roger Wong said he hasn't seen the lawsuit but was surprised by his city's inclusion.

"We're not exactly a growth city," he said. "We have not grown like everybody else has grown."

In other examples, the lawsuit claims 21 LAFCO-approved annexations for the Hilmar County Water District, 26 annexations for Los Banos and 39 annexations for Atwater — all lacking federal approval under the Voting Rights Act.

Dale Wickstrom, district manager for the Hilmar County Water District, said he was just served Wednesday with the lawsuit and had not had time to read it. Officials in several other jurisdictions said the same thing.

Others, such as Dos Palos and Atwater, had not been served but had been alerted to the lawsuit via e-mail.

Avila said the matter is of paramount importance because it ensures fair elections and voting rights for all.

"The key issue is not whether they submit. The issue is whether they have secured approval," Avila said. "As far as we can tell, these voting changes in the complaint have not received … approval."

The reporter can be reached at jellis@fresnobee.com or (559) 441-6320.

ANTITRUST:

AT&T-BellSouth Vote Delayed By FCC (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 3, 2006

FCC Delays AT&T-BellSouth Vote for a Third Time Because It Can't Decide on Conditions for Deal

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Federal Communications Commission delayed for a third time its vote on whether to let AT&T Inc. acquire BellSouth Corp., because it can't decide what conditions should be placed on the deal.

The vote was scheduled for Friday, but the agency sent a notice Thursday night saying the item had been removed from the agenda.

"We're always open to moving forward, but we weren't able to reach an agreement for tomorrow's meeting," said agency spokeswoman Tamara Lipper.

The FCC was working with AT&T in an attempt to reach a compromise that would avoid a 2-2 deadlock. The apparent standoff raises the possibility that the fifth and newest commissioner -- Robert McDowell, a Republican appointee who until now has taken no part in the proceeding -- may be pulled in to cast a tie-breaking vote.

The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department on Oct. 11 cleared the deal, valued at $83.4 billion at the close of trading Thursday, declaring there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest any assets or make any other concessions.

The failure to attach conditions sparked a sharp response from the two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who accused the Justice Department of failing to protect consumers.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin had scheduled the Friday vote after twice delaying the decision. The issue was pulled from the Oct. 12 agenda, and a special meeting to consider the acquisition on the 13th never convened when Copps and Adelstein asked for more time to consider last-minute concessions offered by AT&T.

Those concessions included $10-per-month Internet access in its service area, free modems, promises to temporarily freeze prices for competitors that use the company's networks and even a pledge to bring back some BellSouth jobs that were shipped overseas.

A consortium of consumer groups criticized the concessions as "short-term candy for a few instead of long-term lower prices and better choices for all consumers."

In a statement Thursday night, AT&T said it had offered "unprecedented conditions unrivaled by any other communications provider in a merger proceeding." The company blamed the delay on "self interest of commercial entities and their litany of unreasonable demands."

AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth is being called the largest telecommunications merger ever. The combined company would generate $117 billion in revenue, operate 68.7 million local phone lines across 22 states stretching coast to coast across the southern United States and up through the Midwest. The merged company would employ 309,000 people, though AT&T said it plans to eliminate up to 10,000 jobs over three years.

Consumer groups are asking for promises that AT&T not discriminate against certain kinds of Internet traffic, offer reasonably priced digital subscriber line service without requiring customers to buy a bundle of services and other concessions.

Consumer groups and competitors also want the FCC to force AT&T to divest unused wireless spectrum unless it plans to use it.

McDowell is a former lobbyist for COMPTEL, a trade association that opposes the merger.

Federal ethics regulations permit the agency's general counsel to clear McDowell to vote as long as the "interest of the government in the employee's participation" outweighs any concerns about the how the vote may affect the agency's integrity.

The rules also say that once cleared by the general counsel, an employee "may not thereafter disqualify himself from participation." However, nothing would prevent him from abstaining.

Blair Levin, who was chief of staff for former FCC Chairman Reed Hundt and now a telecommunications industry analyst for Stifel, Nicolaus & Company, Inc., predicted McDowell will be called on to vote if the stalemate continues.

"At some point in time -- and I think that time is quickly approaching -- the general counsel is entitled to declare a deadlock," he said.

Levin predicted that McDowell, despite the difficult position he is in, would not abstain.

FCC Delays Vote Again On AT&T, BellSouth Merger (MRKTWTCH)

By Ana Campoy

Market Watch, November 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- The Federal Communications Commission has delayed its vote again on the proposed $80 billion merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp.

The vote, which had been scheduled for Friday, has been deleted from the agency's agenda for that day, the FCC said in a statement Thursday.

The delay is the third time in less than a month that a vote has been postponed because Republican and Democratic commissioners have failed to agree on possible concessions, according to a Dow Jones Newswires report. See full story.

Two of the three Republicans on the agency's five-member commission support the deal, but the panel's two Democrats insist on concessions by the phone companies, and the fifth member has excused himself from the vote because his previous employer has publicly commented on the merger, according to the report.

On Oct. 11, the Department of Justice approved the deal, saying that the merger is likely to benefit consumers. The regulators said the deal would not hurt competition "substantially" in any part of the U.S. communications industry. The department did not require the companies to sell any assets or attach other conditions. See full story.

The two Republicans have supported the deal, but the panel's two Democrats insist on concessions by the phone companies. They have been critical of the Justice Department's decision to approve the merger without any strings attached. See full story.

The merger would create the largest U.S. telecommunications provider, with more than 300,000 employees, annual revenue of $120 billion and a market value of more than $200 billion. AT&T (T

FCC Postpones Vote On AT&T's Purchase Of BellSouth (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, November 3, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Federal Communications Commission postponed a vote on AT&T Inc.'s $82 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. for a third time, signaling members are still deadlocked on approval terms.

The delay means the commission probably won't rule until after the Nov. 7 election, said telecommunications attorney Andrew Lipman of Bingham McCutchen LLP in Washington. His firm represents competitors of AT&T and BellSouth.

Today's announcement indicates FCC Chairman Kevin Martin and Commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate, both Republicans, haven't satisfied the panel's two Democrats, who are demanding conditions such as price controls. The five-member FCC is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, to complete the deal, which would be the largest U.S. phone company combination.

``It may be that after the election there will be different conversations than are happening today," said Lipman. ``It doesn't look like there's been progress this week."

The panel's fifth member, Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell, has said he expects to be barred from voting because of his previous work as a lobbyist.

Martin, who initially proposed approving the deal without conditions, first scheduled a vote for Oct. 12. He moved that to Oct. 13 and then to Nov. 3 after Democrats Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein sought a public review of concessions offered by AT&T. The company's proposals included a price freeze on certain business services and $10-a-month high-speed Internet access for some BellSouth customers.

Rivals' Demands

Rivals and consumer advocates said AT&T's concessions won't protect competition. They want to force the combined company to divest some airwaves and bar it from charging Web companies premium fees for faster network access.

``While we regret that the merger has been delayed by the self interest of commercial entities and their litany of unreasonable demands, we look forward to the FCC's approval, so that we can get about the business of providing the overwhelming benefits the merger represents to consumers, to the economy and to the public interest," AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said today in an e-mailed statement.

Washington-based Comptel, which represents carriers that compete with AT&T and BellSouth, questioned whether AT&T ``ever engaged in any meaningful attempt" to address concerns raised by the group and consumer advocates.

``Comptel is heartened that the commission did not bend to AT&T's pressure tactics," President Earl Comstock said today in an e-mailed statement.

Fifth Commissioner

The commission probably will approve the transaction with conditions this month or early next month, said Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin. If Republicans and Democrats can't agree, Martin could press McDowell to break a tie, Levin said.

``I think at the end of the day, if he has to vote to break a deadlock, he'll do it," Levin, a former FCC chief of staff, said of McDowell. ``But I'm sure he would do everything he can to urge the other four commissioners to keep him out of it."

Shares of AT&T rose 26 cents to $34.02 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have gained 39 percent this year. Atlanta-based BellSouth added 45 cents to $44.65.

Commissioners Copps and Adelstein signaled their tough stance last month when they denounced the Justice Department's decision to clear the deal without conditions.

The department's antitrust unit said the deal was unlikely to ``substantially" reduce competition. Eighteen states also approved the deal without conditions.

AT&T is expanding to meet competition for phone customers from cable-television providers such as Comcast Corp. and Internet-based companies including Vonage Holdings Inc.

The BellSouth acquisition will increase AT&T's local service area to 22 states. BellSouth, the third-biggest U.S. phone company, sells local service in nine southeastern states.

The deal also would give AT&T full ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC. Atlanta-based Cingular, the largest U.S. mobile-phone carrier, is jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth.

Watch Those Data Pipelines (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Federal regulators should add some conditions to the AT&T-BellSouth merger to prevent the abuse of Internet-access monopolies.

THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT was right last month to approve the merger of two powerhouse telephone companies, AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. Given the rapidly changing telecommunications landscape, the teaming up of so-called Baby Bells and long-distance carriers (don't forget that AT&T is also the former behemoth SBC Communications Inc.) is not as alarming a prospect as it would have been a decade ago.

But that is not to say that the brave new world of a fiercely competitive market of cable, wireless and power companies delivering services over high-speed data pipelines has put to rest all concerns about the potential for abuse on the part of still-dominant former monopolists. In this time of transition, federal regulators should still take steps to protect consumers and competitors.

The Federal Communications Commission, in its own review of the merger, is considering a number of sensible conditions.

One would bar the merged company from giving preferential treatment to selected Internet sites and applications, or imposing unreasonable costs on cable companies' phone services.

AT&T and BellSouth contend that these restrictions are solutions in search of a problem. The FCC should address the issues raised by the cable telephone issue promptly in a proceeding that will apply industrywide, not just to AT&T.

But the so-called net neutrality concern is valid. There's a chokepoint on the emerging stream of competition: the companies that provide high-speed connections to the Internet. More than 99% of high-speed homes get their connection from the local phone company (DSL lines) or cable TV operator (cable modems). In many areas, there's only one of those options. It may take years before wireless companies, electric utilities and satellite firms can field a competitive offer. Top executives from AT&T and BellSouth have been quoted as saying they expect popular websites such as Google and Yahoo to pay more "to use my pipes," as AT&T Chief Executive Ed Whitacre told Business Week last year.

That's why the FCC should approve the AT&T-BellSouth deal only with conditions that prohibit the merged company from imposing fees that discriminate unfairly against websites or services. These conditions should be lifted where new high-speed Internet services emerge to challenge the cable-telco duopoly. That day isn't here yet, and the FCC shouldn't pretend otherwise.

Microsoft And Novell Agree To Make Windows, Linux Compatible (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Thaw And Dina Bass

Bloomberg, November 3, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp. and Novell Inc., rivals in the market for software that runs server computers, agreed to make their products work together, the companies said.

The companies will jointly develop and market software that lets the Windows and Novell's Linux operating systems co-exist on the same machine, Microsoft Chief Executive Officer Steve Ballmer said at an event in San Francisco today.

Novell shares rose the most in four years on optimism the agreement may entice more corporations to use its version of Linux software. By forging the accord, Microsoft is responding to pressure to make Windows more compatible with other software. The pact may also help Microsoft, the world's largest software maker, get more of its software into corporate data centers.

``Microsoft can bring to the table an easier sales process and, to the benefit of Novell, potentially greater sales down the road," Mark Mowrey, an analyst with Al Frank Asset Management in Laguna Beach, California, said in an interview.

Novell shares, down 23 percent this year, jumped 92 cents to $6.79 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Microsoft fell 4 cents to $28.77.

Under today's agreement, Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft and Novell also won't sue each other's customers if their software encroaches on their patents. Microsoft will recommend Novell's Suse Linux Enterprise for customers who want to run computers with both Windows and Linux and will distribute coupons for maintenance and support.

DOJ_NMG_0090815

The two companies will establish a joint research facility to make sure customers can consolidate multiple Linux and Windows systems on a single server machine. The facility will also work to improve interoperability between documents created with Microsoft's Office and its open-source rival OpenOffice.

Rivalry Dulled

The agreement dulls a longstanding rivalry between Microsoft and Linux software makers. Linux had become the biggest threat to Microsoft's Windows Server, taking more than 11 percent of overall server sales in 2005 and growing faster than Windows for the past several years, according to Framingham, Massachusetts- based IDC. Windows accounted for 35 percent of server revenue in 2005.

Novell packages software and offers support services so companies can use Linux, a freely available source code.

``I was actually shocked," said Eugene Munster, an analyst at Piper Jaffray in Minneapolis. ``This is like the sign of the apocalypse here that Microsoft is actually endorsing the Linux platform. Things are changing in the world of software."

Munster said in the future some Microsoft programs will probably run on Linux, which ``in the past would have been absurd."

In response to the threat from Linux, Microsoft boosted customer service, spent more on research to improve its products and offered price cuts in some cases. In the second quarter, Linux revenue rose less than 10 percent for the first time in almost four years, according to IDC.

Court Battle

Microsoft and Novell have also done battle in the courts. In 2004, Microsoft paid Novell $536 million to settle an antitrust lawsuit. Novell is still pursuing claims that Microsoft tried to shut out sales of WordPerfect, which was owned by Novell from 1994 to 1996.

Novell bought WordPerfect for $1 billion in 1994 and was forced to sell it two years later for $181.5 million after Microsoft's rival Word became the dominant program for word- processing software.

Microsoft's Windows Server also crippled Novell's NetWare operating system, pushing Novell to buy Suse Linux AG in 2004 to get into the growing market for Linux products.

Red Hat

The agreement between Microsoft and Novell may be a blow to Red Hat Inc., the largest seller of Linux software and services. Oracle Corp. last week said it would offer cheaper services based on Red Hat's Linux products.

Oracle's entry into the Linux market signaled more competition for Windows, a threat that may be dulled by Microsoft's agreement with Novell. The Novell deal also ensures that Red Hat's products won't become the default standard to Linux.

Microsoft, Novell Reach Accord On Linux (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Microsoft Corp. reached a rapprochement with a major seller of the Linux operating system, a deal that makes a kind of peace between two opposing camps in the software industry.

The deal with Novell Inc. is designed to make it easier for customers to use both Linux and Microsoft's Windows software. It puts new pressure on Red Hat Inc., a Linux seller whose shares were recently roiled when Oracle Corp. announced plans to offer its own technical support for Red Hat's products.

The deal effectively makes Microsoft a reseller of Suse Linux, Novell's version of the operating system, and kicks off a broad technology collaboration between the two companies. At the heart of the deal is a "patent covenant" under which Microsoft agreed not to file patent-infringement charges against users of Suse Linux, and Novell agreed not to sue users of Windows. Businesses that use Linux have long worried that Microsoft would one day file patent-infringement suits against them, thereby hindering their use of and investment in the rival software.

Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, acknowledged at a news conference in San Francisco that Linux now plays an "important role" at many companies, along with the software titan's own products. The new deal "bridges the divide between open-source and proprietary software," he said.

The term open source refers to the ability of users to examine and modify the underlying instructions, known as source code, used to make a program. Microsoft and many other vendors typically keep such code private. Linux has been the most widely adopted open-source program, a potent competitor to Windows on server systems used to run application programs such as managing Web sites.

The Wall Street Journal broke news of the accord online yesterday. Novell shares were up 16%, or 92 cents, to $6.79 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Also on the Nasdaq, which traded broadly lower, shares of Red Hat fell 33 cents, or 2%, to $16.10; and Microsoft shares fell four cents to $28.77.

DOJ_NMG_0090816

Financial terms weren't disclosed, but involve various payments between the two companies, including Microsoft's paying Novell for a minimum of roughly 70,000 "coupons" that Microsoft corporate customers can convert into annual subscriptions to receive support for Suse Linux. The value of each of those coupons varies between roughly $400 and $1,500 a year, Novell Chief Executive Ron Hovsepian said. Other payments include a "running royalty" stemming from the patent covenant that Novell will pay to Microsoft, executives at the companies said.

The companies said the set of agreements, expected to be in force until at least 2012, will include a joint research facility at which Microsoft and Novell will design and test software combinations, and work with customers and software developers to build and support those technologies. Microsoft also will recommend Novell's Suse Linux Enterprise for customers that want Windows and Linux. "We definitely want customers who chose to run both Windows and Linux to choose Novell," Mr. Ballmer said.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

· A partnership between1 Microsoft and Novell is like the Hatfields teaming with the McCoys, as Rob Guth of the Wall Street Journal explains.

· Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer2 and Novell CEO Ron Hovsepian discuss the unusual partnership between the companies.

RELATED READING

· Oracle to Support Linux Software3

10/26/06

· Novell Names New CEO in Shakeup4

06/22/06

The pact marks an unusual level of cooperation between two longtime rivals. Microsoft has been battling all versions of Linux but has faced pressure to assure customers can run both Windows and Linux without problems. Red Hat's Linux is the most popular commercial version of the product, followed by Suse Linux. The deal follows Oracle's announcement that it would start selling its own support for Red Hat's version of Linux, a plan that undercuts Red Hat's own business, which is based on providing support and maintenance.

Backing by Oracle, the world's second-largest software maker behind Microsoft, coupled with the Microsoft-Novell pact, could instill more confidence in businesses that have held back investment in open source, some industry experts said. Concerns over patents and general competition with Oracle and Microsoft hampered some potential users of the software, the executives say. "There were always customers that were concerned about whether there would be a backlash with Microsoft," said Stuart Cohen, chief executive of the Open Source Development Laboratory, an open-source promotion group. "They just took that off the table."

Microsoft has at times spooked the Linux community with statements that stressed it indemnifies Windows customers against claims of patent infringement. Some people in the open-source community regarded those statements as thinly veiled threats that it would eventually file patent-infringement suits against Linux users.

Microsoft's move to embrace only Novell's software could be seen by skeptics as a move to divide the Linux community. "There is bound to be some animus, just because of who Microsoft is," said Daniel Ravicher, legal director of the Software Freedom Law Center, a public-service law firm that represents open-source developers.

Farm Group Asks Justice Department To Investigate CME, CBOT Merger (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Anti-trust concerns are behind the National Farmers Union's request that the U.S. Justice Department investigate the proposed merger of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. (CME) and CBOT Holdings Inc. (BOT), the U.S. farm group's president said Thursday.

The NFU's Tom Buis, in a prepared statement, said: "I want to ensure that the department examines the proposed merger with an eye toward the impact that such a transaction would have on family farmers, ranchers and fishermen."

Justice Department spokespeople were not available for immediate comment.

On Oct. 17 Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings - the parent company of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange - announced it would buy the smaller CBOT Holdings - the parent company of the Chicago Board of Trade - for $8 billion. The merger, if approved by regulators and shareholders, would create the world's largest financial market.

The NFU said it is concerned the proposed merger could be detrimental to farmers and agriculture industry. It would be a good idea for hearings to be held so those affected could voice concerns, the farm group said.

"NFU is concerned about the anti-trust issues that would arise from the proposed merger, as well as potentially overlapping contracts, specifically within the ethanol industry," the farm group said.

Bart Chilton, an NFU vice president, said the group wants to make sure consolidation will not result in the closing of contracts that farmers rely on.

"We're not saying don't do the deal," Chilton said. "We're saying examine it thoroughly."

The CME's main agricultural contracts are livestock futures, and the CBOT's main agricultural contracts are grain and oilseeds futures. However, both exchanges have an ethanol futures contract, although neither is heavily traded.

"The organization is urging the department hold hearings across the countryside, so producers who may be impacted by the merger can make their voices heard," the NFU said.

MySpace Investor Sues, Claims Site Unfairly Blocked Links (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 3, 2006

(11-02) 16:55 PST San Jose, Calif. (AP) --

An early investor in MySpace sued the popular social networking Web site on Thursday, claiming the company violated antitrust laws by blocking links to his new online video-sharing venture.

Brad Greenspan, chief executive of Los Angeles-based LiveUniverse Inc., claims that last month MySpace began deleting references on user pages to his new Web site, vidiLife.com, and has dismantled video links and blocked users from mentioning the site.

Both sites allow users to post videos and create online profiles for swapping media and collecting Internet pen pals.

"MySpace has no legitimate business justification for its actions," read the suit, filed in a Los Angeles federal court.

Instead, MySpace's actions constitute "an attempt to monopolize the market for Internet-based social networking services in the United States."

The lawsuit seeks unspecified damages and an order that MySpace restore all references to vidiLife.

MySpace, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., said in a statement that it routinely blocks links to Web sites for violating copyright protections, and that vidiLife.com had been identified by Universal Music Group as a "primary source of infringing UMG content."

It declined to comment further because it had not yet reviewed the complaint.

Greenspan formerly was chief executive of Los Angeles-based Intermix Media Inc., which owned MySpace and was sold last year for $580 million to News Corp.

An outspoken opponent of the sale, Greenspan submitted his own bid for the company but was denied by Intermix's board. Last month, a state court judge in Los Angeles rejected his lawsuit challenging the sale. Greenspan vowed to appeal.

Greenspan left Intermix in 2003 amid an informal regulatory inquiry into accounting restatements.

The New York Attorney General's office then began looking into allegations the company secretly installed adware and spyware on millions of home computers, and Greenspan agreed to a pay $750,000 in a settlement that did not include an admission of guilt.

Federal Judge Orders Recordings Turned Over In Toys R Us Antitrust Case (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, November 3, 2006

The plaintiffs in an antitrust suit against Toys R Us may not delay turning over tapes of secretly recorded phone conversations that allegedly include smoking-gun proof of the antitrust conspiracy until after the speakers captured on the tapes have been deposed, a federal judge has ruled.

In her five-page opinion in BabyAge.com Inc. v. Toys R Us Inc., U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody held that tape recordings are no different from documentary evidence and must be turned over promptly.

Brody rejected the plaintiffs' argument that they should be allowed to delay turning over the tapes because a witness with prior knowledge of the content of the recording might alter his or her deposition testimony in order to "explain away" the allegedly inculpatory statements.

In his brief, plaintiff attorney Eugene A. Spector of Spector Roseman & Kodroff argued that a delay should be granted because a witness who merely knows that a recording exists, but who is unenlightened as to its content, will have every incentive to testify truthfully at the outset.

The tapes, Spector argued, reveal that the defendants have been caught "red handed" in a price-fixing scheme that "unambiguously" violates federal antitrust law.

Without a delay, Spector argued, the "impeachment value" of the recorded statements will go unrealized.

DOJ_NMG_0090818

Brody disagreed, saying "impeachment value alone does not justify a delay where, as here, the disputed statements constitute substantive evidence relevant to the parties' claims and defenses."

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Brody said, "statements constituting substantive evidence are discoverable by the persons or parties who made the statements prior to their depositions."

The plaintiffs in the suit -- BabyAge.com and The Baby Club of America Inc. -- are Internet retailers.

The suit alleges that Babies R Us, a subsidiary of Toys R Us, coerced several manufacturers of "high-end" baby products to establish minimum retail prices so that the Internet retailers would be unable to discount the goods.

The purpose of such minimum price agreements, the suit says, was to protect Babies R Us from price competition, and included threats of termination of contracts if violated.

The suit says such agreements are per se illegal under the Sherman Act, and that they allowed Babies R Us to maintain and enhance its monopoly power.

The dispute over the secret recordings erupted in September when defense attorney Jeffrey I. Zuckerman of Curtis Mallet-Prevost Colt & Mosle in Washington, D.C., filed a motion to compel production of the tapes.

In the motion, Zuckerman said that the existence of the tapes was revealed during a July 2006 deposition when plaintiff attorney Kendall Scott Zylstra of Schiffin & Barroway in Radnor, Pa., referred to statements made during recorded phone calls.

Zuckerman said the plaintiff lawyers promised to turn over the tapes on the date their discovery was due, but later refused.

Spector, in his response brief, said the tapes were made by the plaintiffs before they hired lawyers to file suit.

In his brief, Spector quoted extensively from the tapes and said the excerpts showed that the Internet retailers had "caught some of the defendants 'red-handed' and have compelling evidence to demonstrate just that."

Both Zuckerman's and Spector's briefs were initially sent as "attorneys' eyes only" letters to Brody and were not publicly available, But, at the request of The Legal Intelligencer, Brody ordered that redacted versions of the briefs be filed of record. The redacted versions do not include any of the excerpts from the tapes.

Now Brody has sided with the defense and ordered that the tapes and transcripts must be produced to the defense immediately.

"I find that the retailer plaintiffs' request to conceal the contents of recording from a deponent until after the deposition is unwarranted," Brody wrote.

Brody said the plaintiffs "have offered no rationale consistent with the underlying objectives of the civil discovery rules as to why surreptitious recordings should be singled out from any other document, written or electronic."

All such documents "have the potential for impeachment," Brody said, and "there is no reason to believe that a party that would alter testimony to match it to recorded statements would not do the same with regard to e-mails or other such records."

Brody said she found it "most unlikely" that the plaintiffs would ask her to delay the production of a document that might impeach the testimony of a witness, or an e-mail from a witness with the potential for impeachment.

"That the 'documents' are audio recordings instead of written or electronic documents has no bearing on the analysis of the retailer plaintiffs' obligation to produce them immediately."

In so ruling, Brody refused to follow a 1973 decision by Senior U.S. District Judge J. William Ditter Jr.

In Snead v. American Export-Isbrandtsen Lines, Ditter resolved a discovery dispute regarding a secret surveillance videotape of a plaintiff who had claimed personal injuries.

Ditter permitted the defendants to delay producing the tape or answering interrogatories about it until after they had deposed the plaintiff, in order to induce the plaintiff to testify truthfully at his deposition.

"In discussing personal injury cases, most defense lawyers contend that if a plaintiff knows surveillance films exist, he will tailor what he has to say accordingly," Ditter wrote.

Instead, Brody adopted the reasoning of the late Judge Raymond J. Broderick in his 1998 decision in Superior Beverage Co. v. Schweppes that ordered immediate production of secret recordings because the statements constituted evidence relevant to claims and defenses.

Spector argued that Schweppes was distinguishable because, in that case, the impeachment value of the statements had already been realized since one of the defendants had filed an answer denying the plaintiffs' allegations. Broderick, he noted, found the impeachment rationale "not applicable" to that case.

Brody disagreed, saying "nonetheless, Schweppes still stands for the proposition that secret recordings are generally discoverable without delay."

Google In Bid To Halt YouTube Legal Threat (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin And Aline Van Duyn In New York And Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

Google is engaged in a frantic round of negotiations aimed at persuading traditional media companies to supply their content to YouTube, the video website it bought last month for $1.65bn, and ward off a potentially crippling round of lawsuits.

Chief executive Eric Schmidt and other managers have met CBS, Viacom, Time Warner, NBC Universal, News Corp and others, say people familiar with the talks, offering tens of millions of dollars in upfront payments for the right to broadcast their video content legally on YouTube.

For Google the talks could determine whether its investment in YouTube gives it a leading position in the fast-growing online video market or results in a wave of lawsuits for copyright infringement.

YouTube, founded 18 months ago, serves 100m video clips a day, making it the most popular internet video site, and leading to predictions that it and similar websites could become the dominant means of distributing television, films and other video content to consumers. But much of the material available on the site belongs to the traditional media companies and has been posted without their permission.

Some media executives speculate that if Google fails in its effort YouTube could face the same fate as Napster, the file-sharing service that gained enormous popularity seven years ago before the music companies sued it for copyright infringement and put it out of business.

Recently Mr Schmidt told the Financial Times he wanted media companies to be partners and wanted them to combine Google's advertising platform with their content to reach a larger audience. "So far people like that message; they are now trying to figure out what to do about it – should they, should they not, under what terms, and those sort of things."

Traditional media companies must balance the promotional and advertising potential of YouTube, which allows them to reach vast new audiences, against the need to protect material on which they have spent millions of dollars creating.

Many are also wary of helping Google achieve the dominance in distributing video on the internet that it already enjoys in the search advertising market.

"The fact is that in three to six months every media company's going to decide that their stuff gets taken down or that they get paid for it," a media executive said, likening the negotiations to "a big chessboard".

So far Warner Music, Universal Music and Sony BMG have signed agreements with YouTube to supply some of their content in exchange for licensing fees and a share of associated advertising revenue.

In lieu of upfront payments the music companies received equity stakes in YouTube worth tens of millions of dollars.

Google, having averted that threat, has turned its attention to the film and television companies, offering one $100m to license its content over a two-year period, according to a person familiar with the matter.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Overfishing Threatens Catastrophe, Study Finds (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

All of the world's fishing stocks will collapse before mid-century, devastating food supplies, if overfishing and other human impacts continue at their current pace, according to a global study to be published Friday by a team of scientists from 12 academic institutions in five countries.

Already, 29% of species that are fished — including bluefin tuna, Atlantic cod, Alaskan king crab, Pacific salmon and an array of California fisheries -- have collapsed and the pace is accelerating, the report says.

If present trends persist, the study predicts that "100% of [fished] species will collapse by the year 2048 or around that," said marine conservation biologist Boris Worm at a press conference today. A fishery is considered collapsed if catches fall to 10% of historic highs. Worm, an assistant professor at Dalhousie University in Halifax, Canada, led the team of researchers responsible for the report.

In addition, ocean ecosystems will be unable to recover from shrinking populations of so many species of fish and other sea creatures, the scientists reported in the journal Science.

The report is the first comprehensive assessment of the potential consequences of ongoing declines in the diversity of life in the world's oceans. In recent years, marine scientists have warned about the extreme toll of overfishing in many regions, but the new report offers one of the most dismal predictions for the future of the world's fisheries.

Yet, there is still hope, the scientists concluded.

If more protections are put into place, such as new marine reserves and commercial fishery closures, the volumes available for food will surge and the oceans can recover, they said.

"The good news is that it is not too late to turn things around," Worm said. "It can be done, but it must be done soon."

DOJ_NMG_0090820

Delving into recent catch data from around the world as well as a thousand years of archives in regions such as San Francisco Bay, the researchers concluded that estuaries, coral reefs, wetlands and oceanic fish are all "rapidly losing populations, species or entire functional groups."

The scarcity of a highly nutritious food supply for the world's growing human population is the most visible effect of declining ocean species. But the scientists said other disruptions also are occurring as ocean ecosystems unravel species by species.

The loss of diversity "sabotages the stability" of marine environments and their ability to recover from stresses, the report says.

Water quality is worsening and fish kills, toxic algal blooms, dead zones, invasive exotic species, beach closures and coastal floods are increasing, as wetlands, reefs and the animals and plants that filter pollutants and protect shorelines disappear. Climate change also is altering marine ecosystems.

"Our data highlight the societal consequences of an ongoing erosion of diversity that appears to be accelerating on a global scale," the scientists reported. "Our analyses suggest that business as usual would foreshadow serious threats to global food security, coastal water quality and ecosystem stability, affecting current and future generations."

The authors of the report are 14 marine biologists and economists, eight from California institutions: Scripps Institution of Oceanography, Stanford University's Hopkins Marine Station, Santa Barbara's National Center for Ecological Analysis and Synthesis and UC Davis' Section of Evolution and Ecology. The study was funded by the National Science Foundation, the University of California and UC Santa Barbara.

Andrew Sugden, Science's international managing editor, said the strength of the new report "lies in the breadth of the array of information the authors used for their analysis."

The researchers combined information from a variety of sources, from small-scale local experiments to United Nations fisheries databases.

Worm and his colleagues said the similarities surprised and disturbed them. Even the smallest experiments -- measuring biodiversity in a few square meters -- mirrored the declines seen in entire ocean basins.

"Kinds of seafood that were very common and quite abundant in past decades are not there now," said co-author Stephen Palumbi of Stanford University.

Palumbi warned that "unless we fundamentally change the way we manage all the oceans species together, as working ecosystems, then this century is the last century of wild seafood."

The National Fisheries Institute, a U.S. fishing industry group, questioned the findings, saying that federal statistics "show more than 80% of fish stocks are sustainable and will provide seafood now and for future generations."

The group said that for the past quarter-century, wild fisheries worldwide have provided between 85 and 100 million metric tons of seafood annually, and that aquaculture, also known as fish farming, is filling the growing demand.

90% Of The Ocean's Edible Species May Be Gone By 2048, Study Finds (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, November 3, 2006

Oversight of commercial fishing must be strengthened or there may eventually be no more seafood.

That's the conclusion of a report in today's Science journal that predicts 90% of the fish and shellfish species that are hauled from the ocean to feed people worldwide may be gone by 2048.

Even now, 29% of those species have “collapsed,” meaning a 90% decline in the amount being fished from the sea, said Boris Worm, lead author and a professor of marine conservation biology at Dalhousie University in Halifax, Canada.

“It is a very clear trend, and it is accelerating,” Worm said. The paper represents four years of work by an international team of researchers at various universities who analyzed ocean species diversity over the past 1,000 years.

The team concludes that this trend can be reversed. “We need to implement sustainable fishing methods, create marine sanctuaries where species can replenish themselves and limit pollution from coastal areas,” said Heike Lotze, a marine ecologist at Dalhousie University.

“If the habitat is gone or the water's destroyed,” the fish populations can't bounce back, she said.

“We know how to do this. But it must be done soon,” Worm said. “With each species that is lost, the opportunity for the system to repair itself is diminished.”

The findings are too pessimistic and not true of the USA, said Steve Murawski, chief scientist for the National Marine Fisheries Service, which oversees fishing regions in U.S. waters.

Murawski said “aggressive fisheries management” is reducing the percentage of U.S. overfished species, which he estimated is now 20%. U.S. fishing regions represent about 10% of the world's catch.

DOJ_NMG_0090821

Worldwide, overfishing is a big part of the problem, the researchers said. "Every year it's estimated that human beings remove 150 million metric tons of life from the seas," said Joshua Reichert, environment-program director at Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia.

But fishing isn't the only problem, the report states. The destruction of coastal areas, estuaries and reefs by dredging, building and pollution destroys nursery habitats for young fish.

As marine species disappear, the ability of others to survive is further harmed by the drop in the ocean's overall productivity and stability, the researchers found.

Fish and seafood are key protein sources for a world that's expected to add another 3 billion people by 2050. But it's also a problem for people who don't eat fish. Sixty percent of Americans live within 60 miles of a coast. Declines in marine biodiversity can:

·Increase coastal flooding because of the loss of floodplains and erosion control provided by the wetlands, reefs and underwater vegetation that are a cornerstone of marine life.

·Reduce water quality by destroying the plants, shellfish and fish that are the ocean's biological filtering apparatus.

·Increase beach closure because of harmful algae blooms, such as red tide, facilitated by diminished filtering.

Study Sees 'Global Collapse' Of Fish Species (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

If fishing around the world continues at its present pace, more and more species will vanish, marine ecosystems will unravel and there will be "global collapse" of all species currently fished, possibly as soon as midcentury, fisheries experts and ecologists are predicting.

The scientists, who report their findings today in the journal Science, say it is not too late to turn the situation around. As long as marine ecosystems are still biologically diverse, they can recover quickly once overfishing and other threats are reduced, the researchers say.

But improvements must come quickly, said Boris Worm of Dalhousie University in Nova Scotia, who led the work. Otherwise, he said, "we are seeing the bottom of the barrel."

"When humans get into trouble they are quick to change their ways," he continued. "We still have rhinos and tigers and elephants because we saw a clear trend that was going down and we changed it. We have to do the same in the oceans."

The report is one of many in recent years to identify severe environmental degradation in the world's oceans and to predict catastrophic loss of fish species. But experts said it was unusual in its vision of widespread fishery collapse so close at hand.

The researchers drew their conclusion after analyzing dozens of studies, along with fishing data collected by the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization and other sources. They acknowledge that much of what they are reporting amounts to correlation, rather than proven cause and effect. And the F.A.O. data have come under criticism from researchers who doubt the reliability of some nations' reporting practices, Dr. Worm said.

Still, he said in an interview, "there is not a piece of evidence" that contradicts the dire conclusions.

Jane Lubchenco, a fisheries expert at Oregon State University who had no connection with the work, called the report "compelling."

"It's a meta analysis and there are challenges in interpreting those," she said in an interview, referring to the technique of collective analysis of disparate studies. "But when you get the same patterns over and over and over, that tells you something."

But Steve Murawski, chief scientist of the Fisheries Service of the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration, said the researchers' prediction of a major global collapse "doesn't gibe with trends that we see, especially in the United States."

He said the Fisheries Service considered about 20 percent of the stocks it monitors to be overfished. "But 80 percent are not, and that trend has not changed substantially," he said, adding that if anything, the fish situation in American waters was improving. But he conceded that the same cannot necessarily be said for stocks elsewhere, particularly in the developing world.

Mr. Murawski said the Bush administration was seeking to encourage international fishery groups to consider adopting measures that have been effective in American waters.

Twelve scientists from the United States, Canada, Sweden and Panama contributed to the work reported in Science today.

"We extracted all data on fish and invertebrate catches from 1950 to 2003 within all 64 large marine ecosystems worldwide," they wrote. "Collectively, these areas produced 83 percent of global fisheries yields over the past 50 years."

In an interview, Dr. Worm said, "We looked at absolutely everything — all the fish, shellfish, invertebrates, everything that people consume that comes from the ocean, all of it, globally."

DOJ_NMG_0090822

The researchers found that 29 percent of species had been fished so heavily or were so affected by pollution or habitat loss that they were down to 10 percent of previous levels, their definition of "collapse."

This loss of biodiversity seems to leave marine ecosystems as a whole more vulnerable to overfishing and less able to recover from its effects, Dr. Worm said. It results in an acceleration of environmental decay, and further loss of fish.

Dr. Worm said he analyzed the data for the first time on his laptop while he was overseeing a roomful of students taking an exam. What he saw, he said, was "just a smooth line going down." And when he extrapolated the data into the future "to see where it ends at 100 percent collapse, you arrive at 2048."

"The hair stood up on the back of my neck and I said, 'This cannot be true,' " he recalled. He said he ran the data through his computer again, then did the calculations by hand. The results were the same.

"I don't have a crystal ball and I don't know what the future will bring, but this is a clear trend," he said. "There is an end in sight, and it is within our lifetimes."

Dr. Worm said a number of steps could help turn things around.

Even something as simple as reducing the number of unwanted fish caught in nets set for other species would help, he said. Marine reserves would also help, he said, as would "doing away with horrendous overfishing where everyone agrees it's a bad thing; or if we banned destructive fishing in the most sensitive habitats."

Josh Reichert, who directs the environmental division of the Pew Charitable Trusts, called the report "a kind of warning bell" for people and economies that depend on fish.

But predicting a global fisheries collapse by 2048 "assumes we do nothing to fix this," he said, "and shame on us if that were to be the case."

World's Fish Supply Running Out, Researchers Warn (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

An international group of ecologists and economists warned yesterday that the world will run out of seafood by 2048 if steep declines in marine species continue at current rates, based on a four-year study of catch data and the effects of fisheries collapses.

The paper, published in the journal Science, concludes that overfishing, pollution and other environmental factors are wiping out important species around the globe, hampering the ocean's ability to produce seafood, filter nutrients and resist the spread of disease.

"We really see the end of the line now," said lead author Boris Worm, a marine biologist at Canada's Dalhousie University. "It's within our lifetime. Our children will see a world without seafood if we don't change things."

The 14 researchers from Canada, Panama, Sweden, Britain and the United States spent four years analyzing fish populations, catch records and ocean ecosystems to reach their conclusion. They found that by 2003 -- the last year for which data on global commercial fish catches are available -- 29 percent of all fished species had collapsed, meaning they are now at least 90 percent below their historic maximum catch levels.

The rate of population collapses has accelerated in recent years. As of 1980, just 13.5 percent of fished species had collapsed, even though fishing vessels were pursuing 1,736 fewer species then. Today, the fishing industry harvests 7,784 species commercially.

"It's like hitting the gas pedal and holding it down at a constant level," Worm said in a telephone interview. "The rate accelerates over time."

Some American fishery management officials, industry representatives and academics questioned the team's dire predictions, however, saying countries such as the United States and New Zealand have taken steps in recent years to halt the depletion of their commercial fisheries.

"The projection is way too pessimistic, at least for the United States," said Steven Murawski, chief scientist for the National Marine Fisheries Service, which is part of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. "We've got the message. We will continue to reverse this trend."

The National Fisheries Institute, a trade group representing seafood producers as well as suppliers, restaurants and grocery chains, said in a statement that most wild marine stocks remain sustainable.

The group's spokeswoman, Stacey Viera, added that because the global demand for seafood has already outstripped the amount of wild fish available in the sea, her group's members are meeting the need in part by relying on farmed fish. "To meet the gap between what wild capture can provide sustainably and the growing demand for seafood, aquaculture is filling that need," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0090823

But several scientists challenged that prediction and questioned why humanity should pay for a resource that the ocean had long provided for free. "It's like turning on the air conditioning rather than opening the window," said Stanford University marine sciences professor Stephen R. Palumbi, one of the paper's authors.

Oregon State University marine biologist Jane Lubchenco said the study makes clear that fish stocks are in trouble, even though consumers appear to have a cornucopia of seafood choices.

"I think people don't get it," Lubchenco said. "They think, 'If there is a problem with the oceans, how come the case in my grocery store is so full?' There is a disconnect."

The possible collapse of commercial fisheries could have a serious on the global economy, said Gerald Leape, vice president for the advocacy group National Environmental Trust. The industry generates $80 billion a year, Leape said, and more than 200 million people depend directly or indirectly on fishing for their main source of income. Worldwide, a billion people eat seafood as their main source of animal protein.

"This should be a wake-up call to our leaders, both internationally and domestically, that they need to protect our fish stocks. Otherwise they will go away," Leape said.

In order to reach their conclusions, the paper's authors looked at nearly three dozen controlled experiments and crunched the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization's worldwide catch data going back to 1950. In some cases, they also surveyed ecosystem records -- including sediment cores and archival data -- going back a thousand years.

The researchers said the loss of so many species is eroding the viability of marine ecosystems and their ability to resist environmental stresses. In 12 marine ecosystems surveyed, they found that a decline in biodiversity of 50 percent or more cut the number of viable fisheries by 33 percent, reduced nursery habitats by 69 percent and cut the ocean's capacity to filter and detoxify contaminants by 63 percent.

This phenomenon is apparent in the Chesapeake Bay, where the collapse of the oyster fishery has reverberated across the ecosystem. In 1880, there were enough oysters to filter all the water in the bay in three days; by 1988, it took more than a year for the remaining oysters to accomplish the same task.

Hunter Lenihan, a marine ecology professor at the University of California at Santa Barbara, said the mass dredging of oysters from the bay over the past century has transformed its ecosystem.

As the oysters declined, the water became more cloudy, and sea grass beds, which are dependent on light, died off and were replaced by phytoplankton that does not support the same range of species.

"When you removed the oysters through overfishing, that's when you begin to see a rapid decline in water quality," Lenihan said. "What it's done is change the entire production of the bay."

But University of Washington fisheries professor Ray Hilborn said ascribing a decline in fisheries production to loss of biodiversity was a bit like deciding which came first, the chicken or the egg.

"Do more productive systems lead to more diversity, or is it more diversity leads to more productivity?" Hilborn asked.

Yesterday's report suggests it is possible to resolve this puzzle. The researchers analyzed nearly 50 areas where restrictions had been imposed to stop overfishing and found that, on average, the range of species in the water increased by 23 percent within five years. That provides reason for optimism, Worm said, because it means sound management can halt the decline of fish stocks worldwide.

"It's not too late to turn this around," he said. "It can be done, but it has to be done soon."

Marine advocates, such as chief scientist Michael Hirschfield of Oceana, said they hope the report would spur countries to reassess their practice of providing roughly $20 billion a year in subsidies for harmful fishing practices.

"The single biggest thing we can do to address this is to eliminate subsidies," said Hirschfield, adding that European Union countries alone account for 10 percent of these subsidies.

Federal Lawsuit Aims To Resolve Gettysburg Waste Clean-up (AP)

By Mark Scolforo

AP, November 3, 2006

HARRISBURG, Pa. - The federal government has sued CBS Corp., a landowner and a pottery manufacturer, over the costs of cleaning up a 10-acre hazardous waste site north of Gettysburg, a step toward final resolution of a process that has taken decades.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. Middle District Court on Monday seeks a judgment that would require the defendants to pay the federal government's environmental response costs, including interest, at the Shriver's Corner Superfund Site.

The civil lawsuit will allow the parties to formalize a settlement that they have negotiated with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, said attorney Rick Friedman, who represents defendant Donald R. Wishard, executor of the estate of his grandmother, Sarah A. Culp.

DOJ_NMG_0090824

"Under the procedures that EPA uses in settlement of Superfund cases, once they reach a consent order they have to file a complaint so there's something to be resolved," he said Thursday.

The defendants are broadcasting giant CBS Corp., because the site includes material from an elevator factory operated by its predecessor, Westinghouse Electric Corp.; SPC Residual LLC of York, a successor to Susquehanna Pfaltzgraff Co., which had its hazardous waste from two ceramics plants trucked to the site; and Wishard, whose grandmother owned eight acres of the site.

According to the lawsuit, industrial waste was dumped on the property as early as 1969, and in January 1984 state and federal officials inspecting the site found numerous deteriorating drums that contained hazardous materials.

Substances discovered at the site, which is located in a rural area, include paint, solvents, toluene, lead, cadmium, mercury and others, according to the lawsuit. The EPA's Web site indicates that groundwater cleanup at Shriver's Corner began in 2002 and will take more than 30 years.

The consent decree calls for CBS and SPC to pay the EPA $659,000 within 30 days and the Culp estate to pay the EPA $98,000. It also requires the federal government to pay CBS $182,000 related to future response costs and to pay the Superfund $372,000.

Andrew Ames, a Justice Department spokesman, said Thursday the settlement resolves liability for the payment of cleanup costs for the industrial waste that was dumped at the site.

A CBS spokeswoman, Shannon Jacobs, and a lawyer for SPC Residual, Kathleen K. Kerns, both declined immediate comment Thursday.

A Mine's Still-Toxic Legacy (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Surge in Polluted Water Sets Back Creek Cleanup In Maryland Coal Country

BARTON, Md -- Some of the most poisoned water in Maryland flows out of a hillside here, its color like Coca-Cola and its acidity in the same range as stomach juices.

The water runs through a culvert into Georges Creek, turning it the colors of the autumn leaves overhead. For four miles downstream, hardly anything is alive.

"Everything died. Everything died here in this stream," fishing guide Ken Pavol said one recent morning.

The source of the problem is an abandoned coal mine, one of more than 150 in Western Maryland that leak groundwater tainted with acid and dissolved metals. In August 2005, this particular trickle turned into a torrent stronger and far more caustic than it had been.

More than a year later, the state is still studying its options, and this stretch of Georges Creek is still dead. For frustrated residents, the situation is a reminder of coal mining's bleak environmental legacy: After more than two decades of cleanups here, the hills are still leaking pollution.

"This area was blessed with coal. I mean, what a blessing!" Pavol said sardonically.

Now, he said, the deep mines are mostly closed, and the mining jobs are mostly gone. "This is what's left."

Among the things that Maryland's western panhandle has that the rest of the state doesn't -- bears, mountains and ski resorts -- there is coal. The area sits on the eastern fringe of the great Appalachian coal field, which starts in Alabama and stretches to Lake Erie. At their peak in the early 1900s, Maryland's mines produced more than 5 million tons of coal a year.

One of those mines was here in Barton, a small town in Allegany County. The McDonald mine, as it was known, eventually comprised about 100 acres underground, divided into "rooms" that were only as high as the coal seam, about four feet, state officials say.

State records indicate that the mine probably closed in the 1940s, when a shift to strip mining on the surface shuttered deep mines across the state.

The mines were abandoned, but they were not empty. Over time, groundwater percolated through the rock and reacted with minerals in the mine walls and oxygen in trapped air. The water became saturated with metals such as iron and aluminum, and it became as much as 1,000 times as acidic -- 3.5 on the pH scale -- as a normal stream.

As the mines filled, the nasty liquid started to leak out. In Maryland alone, officials have counted 342 "seeps" of escaping mine water, sometimes more than one seep per mine.

The situation is worse elsewhere. In West Virginia, for instance, the mining industry left more than 2,800 drainage sites. But Maryland was left with a serious environmental problem: By 1980, mine water had polluted 450 miles of streams, according to state figures.

DOJ_NMG_0090825

In places, "it was essentially a biological desert," said Raymond P. Morgan II, a professor who has studied mine drainage at the University of Maryland Center for Environmental Science. He said the drainage is harmful in two major ways: The acid kills fish and other things in the water, and a metallic sludge called "yellow boy" keeps insects from living on the bottom.

"It's probably the most insidious pollutant that we have in the United States, because it's the two whammies there," Morgan said.

Since the mid-1980s, government projects have improved some streams in Western Maryland, using machines to discharge limestone compounds -- "River Rolaids" -- that neutralize the acid. In Maryland, 81.5 miles of streams have been restored enough to support life, officials said.

That approach worked at the McDonald mine, which has always had the worst acid drainage in the state. A lime machine was put here in 2002, and by 2005, people were fishing for trout in the formerly dead creek.

Then, last August, something happened. The best guess is that a section of the mine collapsed, releasing a pocket of toxic water. Suddenly, the volume of drainage was seven times what it had been, and the pH was less than 2.5 -- normal for a digestive system but terrible for a creek.

"It went from the worst water in the state to the worst water on steroids," said Joe Mills, an official with the Maryland Bureau of Mines.

As the mine water flowed to the North Branch of the Potomac River, even the mayflies in Georges Creek died.

"It looked like tomato soup, basically," turned red by a high iron content, said Alan Klotz, who oversees fisheries in the area for the Maryland Department of Natural Resources. "As soon as I walked down there, I just saw thousands of dead fish."

Scientists say the mine water should not concern operators of Washington area drinking water plants because the pollutants are diluted by the Potomac as they travel downstream. In Barton, though, the creek's dismal state is a constant worry.

Fourteen months after the surge in volume from the McDonald mine, officials say the acidity and amount of discharge have weakened a bit.

But the river does not look right. As the iron- and acid-laced water hits the clear flow of Georges Creek, it produces a range of colors, from reddish-brown to orange to yellow, an almost cartoonish image of pollution.

Department of the Environment officials said they are waiting to see if the seep gets better or worse in the next few months before taking action. They worry about money. Federal funding for cleanup projects comes from a fee on coal mining operations, but Maryland has only a few left, so it gets the minimum amount of aid, about $1.5 million a year.

"We're waiting for the situation to stabilize," said department official Richard A. Eskin. "Do we want to spend a half a million dollars or a million dollars, if it's going to go away [by] itself?"

In the meantime, residents are wondering what's taking so long.

If you're not going to fix the worst mine water in Maryland, "what are you going to fix?" asked Bob Miller, who heads the George's Creek Watershed Association. (Locally, the creek's name is often spelled "George's," with an apostrophe.)

And even if the mine's drainage is rendered less toxic, a fundamental problem remains. For all the government's success in treating what comes out of mines, it has made little headway in cleaning up what's inside them: hidden, toxic lakes that are replenished every time it rains.

"We don't have the technology to cure the ill now," said James Cummins, a scientist with the Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin.

For the time being, he said, the only thing preventing a McDonald-style collapse at other area mines might be the system of wooden timbers set up by miners decades ago.

"How long does wood last?" he asked.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Operation Nabs 11,000 Fugitives In Eastern States (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nearly 11,000 fugitives, including 1,659 sex offenders, were swept up in what Attorney General Alberto Gonzales described Thursday as a record-breaking law enforcement operation targeting some of the nation's "worst" felons.

Focused in 24 states east of the Mississippi, the week-long "Operation Falcon III" roundup netted 100 murder suspects, one of whom died in a shootout with police near Atlanta.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today," Gonzales said.

DOJ_NMG_0090826

Gonzales has made the campaign against child sex abuse a major part of his administration at the Justice Department. The latest fugitive operation — the third in two years — reflected that focus.

Among the hundreds of sex offenders arrested, Gonzales singled out last week's capture of Allen Marksberry, who was wanted on charges of failing to register as a sex offender.

When officers arrested Marksberry in Rickman, Tenn., he was babysitting three young children. Investigators recovered a handgun, marijuana, police scanners and pornography.

"He is exactly the type of offender that Operation Falcon intended to take off the streets," Gonzales said.

Of the 1,659 fugitive sex offenders arrested, nearly 1,000 were wanted on charges of failing to register as a sex offender.

Sex offenders who fail to register face felony charges under the recently passed Adam Walsh Act.

It is believed that between 100,000 and 150,000 sex offenders have failed to register or have not updated their whereabouts following a move, said Ernie Allen, president and chief executive officer of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

"Compliance is the focus of this," Allen said. "Two-thirds of convicted sex offenders are child sex offenders. That's why this is so important."

More Than 10,700 Snared In Fugitive Roundup (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nearly 11,000 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives were swept up in what the Justice Department on Thursday called a sting targeting the "worst of the worst" criminals on the run.

Last week's roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, included Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested on Oct. 24.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The weeklong sting, code-named Operation Falcon III, also led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive who was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, officials said. Additionally, the neighbor of a fugitive in Florida fired - but missed - police approaching her home. Both incidents are under investigation, said John F. Clark, director of the Marshals Service.

The roundup, in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Albert Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said.

Two earlier stings - Falcons I and II - were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall - before the winter weather hit.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,773 fugitives - including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives - even at their homes in the early-morning hours - proved to be a hit-or-miss mission for the federal, state and local authorities.

A six-hour sting in Washington, D.C., last Thursday morning, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents from the U.S. Marshals, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State Department and the city's Metropolitan Police Department.

"He was there a week or so ago," muttered Marshals Inspector Robert Hoffmaster, after a pre-daybreak search of a house for an accused drug dealer.

In upstate New York, some fugitives tried to hide in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets that a person shouldn't be able to fit in, but they end up fitting in and we have had to call the fire department to get them out."

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law - what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress last summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail register with communities.

The law was named for six-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

DOJ_NMG_0090827

Falcon III showed the Marshals "have proven their extraordinary ability to quickly capture thousands of sexual predators," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Normally, the Marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

Associated Press Writer William Kates in Syracuse, N.Y., contributed to this report.

More Than 10,000 Fugitives Arrested In Eastern U.S. Roundup (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, November 3, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Law enforcement authorities arrested 10,773 fugitives in a 24-state roundup in the eastern U.S., Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

The arrests included 1,659 suspected sex offenders, the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort, Gonzales said today at a news conference in Washington. The operation, dubbed FALCON III, was conducted from Oct. 22 to 28 in states east of the Mississippi River, as well as the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico.

Law enforcement officers led by the U.S. Marshals Service were ``targeting the worst of the worst fugitive felons" in that part of the country, Gonzales said.

An average of 3,000 federal, state and local officers participated each day in the dragnet, said John Clark, director of the Marshals Service. In addition to suspected sex offenders, those arrested were wanted on charges including kidnapping, burglary, carjacking, weapons offenses and drug distribution. Officials arrested 364 gang members and 107 people wanted for murder. They seized 232 guns.

One suspect was killed in the Atlanta area, and no law enforcement officers were hurt during the operation, Clark said.

More than 1 million fugitives are at large in the U.S., Clark said, adding that the Marshals Service apprehends about 1,000 during a typical week.

FALCON stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally. This is the third roundup conducted under the program. In April, the government focused on the Western U.S. and arrested 9,037 fugitives.

Massive Roundup Nabs Record Offender Toll (UPI)

United Press International, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 (UPI) -- The arrests of 10,733 fugitives, including 1,659 sex offenders, in a coordinated 7-day roundup were announced Thursday by U.S. authorities in Washington.

The results of the operation known as Falcon III, which involved thousands of national, state and local law officers, were announced jointly by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Marshals Service Director John F. Clark.

Of the record 1,659 fugitive sex offenders apprehended, 971 were wanted for failing to register. Some 360 gang members also were nabbed and 230 weapons confiscated. Other priority targets were violent crime offenders and major narcotics distributors.

"This operation has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Gonzales said.

The area covered included 24 states east of the Mississippi River and in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico.

11,000 Fugitives Caught In 24 States (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

Nearly 11,000 "worst of the worst fugitives in the country" were arrested this week in raids in 24 states as part of a law-enforcement initiative to apprehend violent criminals, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said yesterday.

Deputy U.S. marshals, assisted by state and local police, arrested 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges.

"I am confident in saying that America's neighborhoods are safer today thanks to ... the devoted individuals who carried out its work," Mr. Gonzales said at a Justice Department press conference.

The third phase of the initiative, known as "Operation FALCON" (Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally), focused on sex offenders and gang members in jurisdictions east of the Mississippi River, including Virginia, Maryland and the District.

Mr. Gonzales said convicted sex offender Allen Marksberry was taken into custody in Rickman, Tenn., for violating his probation. At the time of his arrest, he said investigators discovered Marksberry -- who failed to register in Tennessee as a sex offender -- had been babysitting three young children.

DOJ_NMG_0090828

A search of his home, the attorney general said, resulted in the seizure of a loaded handgun, quantities of marijuana and veterinarian narcotics, police scanners and pornographic photographs, including a picture of Marksberry holding a partially nude young girl.

He said investigators also found a travel trailer behind the home, which provided its occupant with a clear view of a local playground. Inside the trailer, he said, investigators found a pair of binoculars.

Also arrested were Demetrius A. Jackson, accused of killing a police officer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric D. Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn. The operation also led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive, killed by authorities as he came out of his house.

The Marshals Service has significantly increased its apprehension of fugitives over the past few years with the creation of five regional task forces to target violent offenders.

Mr. Gonzales and Marshals Service Director John F. Clark said the raids were not designed to coincide with next week's midterm elections.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Mr. Clark said, adding that he wanted to carry out the raids before winter weather arrived.

The regional task forces were created under the Presidential Threat Protection Act of 2000 to combine the efforts of federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies in locating and apprehending the most dangerous fugitives and assist in high-profile investigations. They are divided into five areas: New York/New Jersey, the Pacific Southwest, the Great Lakes, the Southeast and the Capital Area, which targets the District, Maryland and Virginia.

Operation FALCON I was conducted in April 2005 and netted more than 10,300 fugitives. Operation FALCON II went into action this year, also in April, targeting much of the western half of the country. Nearly 9,100 fugitives were arrested.

Over 1,600 Arrested In Sex Offender Roundup (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 — The Justice Department on Thursday announced the arrests of more than 1,600 fugitive sex offenders as part of a weeklong roundup, the largest number ever arrested in a single operation.

In all, federal, state and local authorities in 24 states east of the Mississippi arrested more than 10,700 fugitives last week, including 140 people wanted on murder warrants, 232 for firearms violations, and 3,600 on drug charges. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called the group “the worst of the worst,” with particular priority given to capturing unregistered and wanted sex offenders who he said posed a “serious threat to our children.”

Mr. Gonzales said in response to a question at a news conference that there was no political motivation behind the arrests and that the Justice Department “played no role in the timing of this program,” less than a week before the midterm elections.

John Clark, the director of the United States Marshals Service, which coordinated the operation, said that planning for the arrests began months ago “without regard to any political elections coming up.” One factor in the timing, Mr. Clark said, was to move ahead before the “harsh winter weather” hit because officials said that the wanted fugitives would be less likely to congregate outdoors.

Last week’s coordinated arrests, involving an average of 3,000 investigators a day in the 24 states, were the third in a series of fugitive roundups called Operation Falcon, which began last year.

Local and federal authorities routinely execute arrest warrants on fugitives on a daily and weekly basis, but those operations generally occur in much smaller numbers and without a coordinated, nationwide push. The Marshals Service, for instance, arrests about a thousand fugitives in a normal week.

“The truth of the matter is,” Mr. Gonzales said, “we don’t have the level of resources available either at the federal or state/local level to have this kind of committed push all the time.”

The most recent arrests focused in large part on wanted sex offenders, many of whom had failed to comply with the terms of state sex offender registrations. Officials said more than 970 of the 1,659 sex offenders arrested last week had failed to properly register in their states, which is a federal crime under a law enacted this year. Mr. Gonzales has put a premium at the Justice Department on prosecuting child sex offender cases, and he pointed with some satisfaction Thursday to the arrest last week of an unregistered sex offender in Tennessee, Allen Marksberry, who was convicted in 1996 in a sodomy case involving a 7-year-old girl.

Investigators, executing a warrant for a probation violation against Mr. Marksberry, found that he had been babysitting three children, and a search of his home produced a loaded handgun, drugs and child pornography, Mr. Gonzales said. They also found a pair of binoculars in a backyard trailer with “a clear view of a local playground,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090829

Mr. Marksberry was arrested after a short standoff, Mr. Gonzales said. Several arrests elsewhere produced altercations, including a shootout that led to the killing of a man in Atlanta who was wanted in a drug case, as well as an arrest in northern Florida in which the arresting officers were fired on, officials said. No one was injured in that case.

200 Fugitives Captured In Alabama (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), November 3, 2006

Charges include homicide, rape, sexual crimes against children

A multistate roundup has led to the capture of at least 200 people in Alabama, including some wanted on charges homicide, rape, incest and sex crimes against children.

The arrests came in a seven-day sting named Operation Falcon III, which was led by the U.S. Marshals Service in partnership with local and state law enforcement.

The arrest of Demetrius Avery Jackson Jr., 21, in the shooting of two Fairfield police officers was included in the roundup list. Jackson was caught Oct. 24 in Birmingham and charged with the capital murder of Officer Mary Smith and the attempted murder of Officer Erick Burpo.

Also captured was Michael Owen DeVaughn, 48. He was arrested at a Birmingham motel Oct. 27 on a federal parole violation and on multiple counts stemming from a multimillion-dollar real-estate fraud case in three jurisdictions in California.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who announced the results of the operation Thursday, said the roundup was aimed at the "worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country." Two earlier stings, Falcon I and II, were held in April over the past two years.

More than 10,700 fugitives were arrested during the operation that was conducted in 24 states east of the Mississippi River and in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. Task force members also arrested 971 unregistered sex offenders and 364 documented gang members.

Marty Keely, U.S. marshal in north Alabama, said members of the Gulf Coast Regional Fugitive Task Force relied on help from officers from Birmingham, Alabaster, Hoover, the Alabama Department of Corrections, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and sheriff's deputies from Jefferson and Shelby counties to capture metro-area fugitives.

"The press is on to the folks out there who want to continue to commit violent crimes in this community," Keely said at a news conference in Birmingham.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said the arrests resulting from Operation Falcon III were part of 91 cases in Alabama's northern district. Included in those were:

One case of incest involving an adult.

Two cases of cruelty toward a child.

Two sex offenses against a child.

17 failures to register as a sex offender.

29 sex offenses.

Two sexual assaults.

One case of statutory rape.

Seven rape cases.

At least 53 fugitives were arrested in south Alabama and 101 in the Montgomery federal district.

E-mail: vwalton@bhamnews.com

National Crime Sweep Results In 90 Local Criminal Charges (WVTM)

WVTM-TV, NBC 13, Birmingham, AL, November 3, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. -- A seven-day crime sweep resulted in 90 criminal charges locally and more than 10,000 nationally.

Operation FALCON was a seven-day crime-fighting spree that made gang-related violent crimes and sex crimes a top priority.

When Fairfield police Officer Mary Smith was gunned down in the line of duty, Operation FALCON got the call and Smith became one of the operation's top priorities.

"Some 25 hours later, Demitrius Avery Jackson Jr., Disciple gang member, was taken into custody," said U.S. Marshal Martin Keely.

FALCON is made up of law enforcement from various agencies around the area, led by the U.S. Marshals. Out of the 90 local cases solved, 58 involved sexual predators.

DOJ_NMG_0090830

“People that rape generally don’t rape once, so the fact these rapists and sexual predators have been taken off the street make me confident some child is not going to be victimized tonight,” said U.S. Attorney Alice Martin.

Operation FALCON works in 24 states, where deputy marshals team up with thousands of law enforcers for the major sweeps and to fight crime daily.

“In times of limited resources, these type of partnerships become more and more important, and you see why it’s important to participate,” said Birmingham Police Chief Annetta Nunn.

The crime-fighting operation arrested 971 unregistered sex offenders over the weeklong sweep.

'Worst' Fugitives Captured In Sweep (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), November 3, 2006

Nationwide Operation FALCON III makes 53 arrests in southwest Alabama

A team of federal, state and local law enforcement officers last week arrested 53 fugitives in southwest Alabama, including an accused rapist identified as one of the 15 "worst of the worst" by the U.S. Marshals Service.

It was all part of a national effort, dubbed Operation FALCON III, which resulted in the arrest of 10,773 felony fugitives in 24 states and two foreign countries over a seven-day period.

Locally, arrests nabbed 17 people accused of sex crimes and 17 drug suspects. Other charges included attempted murder, assault, robbery, weapons violations and burglary.

Many of the fugitive arrests had already been announced.

"All of these offenders would be on the streets today if it were not for these efforts," U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Alabama Deborah Rhodes said at a news conference Thursday in downtown Mobile.

Operation FALCON -- an acronym for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally -- linked the Marshals Service with 13 participating law enforcement agencies in Southwest Alabama.

This year's operation, the third of its kind, placed a special emphasis on gang members and sex offenders.

One of the fugitives captured was Inigo V. Felix, 32, a Mexican national accused of sexually assaulting a 5-year-old boy. He faces three counts of first-degree sodomy and two counts of sexual abuse of a child under the age of 12.

Members of the Gulf Coast Regional Fugitive Task Force took him into custody on Oct. 26 in Orange Beach.

The U.S. Justice Department had dubbed Felix one of the "FALCON 15," the worst offenders of the nearly 11,000 arrested during the operation.

"Any crime against a child is horrible," said David Rahbany, the supervisory agent of the task force.

Rahbany said Felix was the boyfriend of the child's aunt. He said the suspect came into the United States illegally at least 10 years ago. Felix confessed to the abuse, telling authorities he had been molesting the boy for about a year, Rahbany said.

Authorities said the alleged abuse came to light when the boy participated in a school lesson on "good touches and bad touches," authorities said.

A search of the man's home yielded items that officials said corroborated the boy's account. Rahbany said one of the agents on the task force speaks Spanish, which aided in the interrogation of Felix.

Local law enforcement officials praised the cooperation with federal agencies.

"Certainly, when we can take 53 people off the streets, it makes a real impact," Mobile Police Chief Phillip Garrett said.

Another previously reported arrest authorities highlighted Thursday was Willie Alexander Washington, 31, who is accused of failing to register as a sex offender. An investigation revealed that he has previous sex offense convictions in Alabama and Georgia.

Rahbany said authorities staked out Ella Grand Elementary School in Prichard -- where Washington was known to frequent on his bicycle -- and spotted him Oct. 26. Agents captured him down after a brief chase.

Rahbany said Operation FALCON III was something of a coming-out event for the task force, which opened its Mobile office this summer.

A recent federal law authorized the Marshals Service to create regional task forces.

The Gulf Force unit is the newest one, made up of representatives from the Marshals Service, the state Department of Corrections, the Mobile Police Department and the Mobile Sheriff's Office.

"The Gulf Coast Regional Fugitive Task Force is here to stay," Rahbany said. "This operation did not end Friday."

Rahbany said Operation FALCON beefs up manpower for the targeted program. Five teams consisting of eight to 10 officers each worked from sun-up to past sundown, he said.

"I don't think you could keep up the pace that we maintained this week," he said. "It made me proud to watch those guys."

Dozens Arrested Locally In 24-state Fugitive Sweep (NORBULL)

By Greg Smith, Norwich Bulletin

Norwich (CT) Bulletin, November 3, 2006

NORWICH — A week-long initiative to round up fugitives has resulted in dozens of arrests in eastern Connecticut.

Headed by the U.S. Marshals Service and code-named Operation FALCON III, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced today a total of nearly 11,000 arrests made in the 24-state effort running from Oct. 22-28.

In Connecticut, 181 warrants were served, including 56 for sex offenses. In Norwich, Thomas Heberding was arrested for felony violation of probation based on an original offense of first-degree sexual assault. His victims were allegedly three children.

Deputy US Marshals teamed up with state, local, and federal officials in the largest fugitive sweep to ever focus on violent sex offenders.

FALCON III resulted in the arrest of 10,773 fugitives and the clearance of 13,333 warrants. Of the fugitives arrested, 1,659 were wanted for sexual offenses, 971 for not registering as sex offenders.

Falcon III was the third effort to combine law enforcement agencies in an effort to chip away at thousands of outstanding warrants.

"Operation FALCON has once again proven how much we can accomplish with our network of federal, state, and local law enforcement," Gonzales said in a prepared statement. "This operation has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members."

A mix of law enforcement officials had met each day last week in a different eastern Connecticut host town. Norwich, one of 428 police departments involved, hosted on Oct. 25, resulting in the arrest of 13 people on a variety of warrants, most violating probation and failing to appear in court.

The morning's activities in the Norwich area also illustrated the struggle city police face considering the fact there are more than 500 unserved warrants on the books.

Teams had worked for hours with the last known addresses of fugitives, but came up empty handed time and time again.

"It's something we face all the time," said Norwich Police Det. Ed Peckham. "We don't have the manpower or budget to do this every day. You could end up at ten different addresses trying to find one person. It's time consuming."

The problems are similar in New London, where Police Sgt. Michael Strecker said his department dedicates one day a week working with probation officers and the U.S. Marshals Service. The group serves four or five warrants on a good day. But considering that the number of warrants is in the 1,300 to 1,500 range, "it's a finger in the dike," Strecker said.

"We get the dangerous ones, and that's who we usually target," Strecker said.

With 12 different police barracks spread across the state, Connecticut state police face similar issues, likely with thousands of warrants waiting to be served.

State police spokesman Lt. J. Paul Vance, who did not provide numbers of outstanding warrants, said it is the responsibility of the trooper who investigated the case to follow up. But when the subjects move away, sometimes out of state, it becomes more difficult to track them.

Many agencies, especially when the criminals face misdemeanor charges, will learn of the warrants during routine motor vehicle stops or when the person is arrested for another crime.

"There is only so much (local police departments) can do, and I think they do their best," Chief State's Attorney Kevin T. Kane said. "It's a problem that strains the resources of the police departments and the state."

Fugitives Nabbed In Operation Falcon III (WTNH)

WTNH-TV, ABC 8, New Haven, CT, November 3, 2006

(New Haven-WTNH, Nov. 2, 2006 7:30 PM) _ It's called Operation Falcon III and it landed nearly eleven thousand fugitives behind bars. These are bad guys -- accused drug dealers, sex offenders and gang bangers, and 167 of them have been hiding out here in Connecticut.

by News Channel 8's Chris Velardi

These are fugitives who've skipped bail, criminals who've violated their probation and sex offenders who haven't registered. They're fugitives the Justice Department calls the worst of the worst. Police have had the warrants and last week they got the bad guys.

From Vermont to Florida in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, local police, state police and federal agents teamed up for one week with one goal -- to round up fugitives who'd been running from the law.

"It was a cooperative effort, lot of different agencies involved and that fact that we all worked together makes it a success," U.S. Marshal John Bardelli said.

DOJ_NMG_0090832

The numbers also make it a success. Authorities made 10,773 arrests in 24 states, including almost 1,700 sex offenders.

In Connecticut, police picked up 167 fugitives, 19 of them sex offenders, including Steven Ramos, who was convicted of sexually assaulting a young girl in New Jersey.

He took off before he was sentenced for the crime and police say he'd been living in New Haven with the victim and her mother. This is just the kind of guy authorities are glad to get back behind bars.

"A lot of them are going to do the same kinds of crimes that they were wanted for in the first place," Bardelli said.

Police in Connecticut also arrested a man in Norwich who'd sexually assaulted three children and is accused of violating his probation. They also picked up a man IN Bridgeport wanted for attempted murder who was found with an Uzi and a handgun in his possession.

"They're the kind of people that you don't want running around, committing additional crimes," Bardelli said.

Bardelli says there are still plenty of fugitives out there and close to a million unserved warrants across the country, but raids like this go a long way towards getting criminals off the streets.

Most of the fugitives rounded up during Operation Falcon did not fight back. A murder suspect was killed by police in Atlanta and a suspect's mother fired shots at authorities in Florida, but no law enforcement agents were hurt. In Connecticut all 167 arrests were made without incident.

Roundup Nabs 167 Fugitives In Conn.Police Call Fugitives 'Worst Of Worst' (WFSB)

WFSB-TV, News Channel 3, Hartford, CT, November 3, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. -- Dozens of Connecticut police departments joined departments from 23 other states in rounding up fugitives who were on the run in Connecticut.

Police described the 167 fugitives who were rounded up in Operation Falcon III the "worst of the worst."

U.S. Marshal John Bardelli said Connecticut has been working with 24 other states in a massive task force to find dangerous men and women. Channel 3 Eyewitness News reporter Susan Raff reported that the fugitives were found in towns and cities across the state.

Operation Falcon III involved 33 different agencies.

Police said the roundup was the largest ever of fugitive sex offenders and wanted gang members.

"On a nationwide basis, yes, we found some of the worst offenders. We did not get them all," Bardelli said.

Raff reported that one of the captured fugitives was Steven Ramos, who was arrested in connection with the sexual assault of an 8-year-old girl. A warrant was issued for Ramos' arrest when he failed to appear for sentencing.

"We found one person living in his car, a sex offender, entirely mobile, could have been anywhwere," Bardelli said.

U.S. marshals said they received a tip that Ramos was living in New Haven with his girlfriend. They went to the girlfriend's home at 6 a.m. and found Ramos sitting in his car, marshals said.

Police said another fugitive, Teric Clark, was wanted in connection with attempted murder. Police said when they found Clark, they found an automatic weapon as well as a handgun on him.

Raff reported that federal law requires all states to register sex offenders, but police departments said they are having a difficult time finding sex offenders who fail to register.

Joint Manhunt Nabs 96 Fugitives In Delaware (WILNJ)

By Lee Williams, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, November 3, 2006

U.S. marshals teamed up with federal, state and local authorities last week to round up fugitive sex-offenders and other wanted felons across Delaware, part of a nationwide sweep called Operation FALCON III -- Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally.

Locally, the U.S. Marshals First State Fugitive Task Force arrested 96 fugitives, including 17 for failure to register as a sex offender.

Nationally, officers arrested 10,773 felony fugitives, including 1,659 sex offenders and 364 gang members.

"This operation, along with our past FALCON efforts, provides a clear indication of what law enforcement agencies can accomplish when there is cooperation on all levels -- federal, state and local," said David W. Thomas, U.S. marshal for the district of Delaware.

Most of the raids occurred in the early morning hours, the "best time and the safest time to apprehend fugitives," Thomas said Thursday.

The arrest teams deployed with 250 active warrants, mostly for New Castle County residents, although some teams were sent to Kent County and Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0090833

"This operation shows that the federal government can play an important role in our efforts to curb violence on our streets here in Delaware," said U.S. Attorney Colm F. Connolly.

In Delaware, the agencies included the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration; Federal Bureau of Investigation; U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Office of Inspector General; U.S. Secret Service; Delaware State Police; Delaware Probation and Parole; Delaware River and Bay Authority; New Castle County police; Wilmington police; Newark police; New Castle city police; and Smyrna police. Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

Nearly 11,000 Fugitives Arrested In Sweep (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Nearly 11,000 fugitives were arrested last week as part of an organized effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and state and local law enforcement agencies east of the Mississippi River, including an accused cop killer in Alabama and a Tennessee sex offender who was babysitting young children when arrested, authorities said yesterday.

It was the third in a series of sweeps since last year aimed at catching "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

More than 10,700 fugitives were arrested during the latest push, which also included the shooting death of one suspect in Georgia that is under investigation, authorities said. More than 30,000 fugitives have been arrested as part of the "Operation Falcon" initiative overall.

Previous sweeps were held in April 2005 and April 2006. Gonzales and Marshals Service Director John F. Clark said next week's midterm elections played no role in the decision to hold another sweep now.

In the Washington region, 687 fugitives were arrested, including 102 alleged sex offenders and 23 alleged gang members, authorities said.

Local, Federal Law Enforcement Officers Sweep 3 Counties For Offenders (SCRIPPS)

By Gabriel Margasak

Scripps Howard, November 3, 2006

November 3, 2006 PORT ST. LUCIE — The Port St. Lucie Police detective and the Deputy United States Marshal strapped on their guns and SWAT-style vests.

They hit the streets in an unmarked SUV in search of about 150 people with outstanding warrants on the Treasure Coast and surrounding areas — the focus was on sex offenders who failed to register and gang members.

Advertisement

They were one of several teams who arrested 93 people locally in weeklong sweep across 24 states called Operation Falcon III. The bust cleared 325 warrants and netted 66 sex offenders in South Florida alone, the U.S. Marshals Service announced Thursday. The national arrest tally included 1,659 fugitive sex offenders, which officials called "the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort."

The third installment of the national operation was deemed a highly successful partnership between the marshals, state agents and local police and sheriff's deputies, who were given federal powers to make arrests across county lines. The unique teamwork allowed for massive numbers of quick arrests not otherwise possible for each agency alone.

"I thought it was extraordinary the Martin County sheriff and the Port St. Lucie police chief, and even the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office, actually dedicated people for an entire week," said Supervising Deputy U.S. Marshal Glen Wilner, who organized the local teams. "We couldn't have done it without our partners at the local police departments and the sheriff's offices."

WHO THEY BUSTED

Brian Geary allegedly raped two children, ages 6 and 7, in Okeechobee County.

"This is as bad as it gets," Wilner said, "raping two young children."

The Marshals and their local partners investigated in the area and uncovered the tip they needed: Geary had fled to Kentucky.

The team worked with counterparts in Kentucky to set up surveillance in the city of Muldraugh. Agents saw Geary enter an apartment, moved in and made the arrest.

"This is what law enforcement is all about," Wilner said.

The Geary bust was just one of the marquee cases the task force featured.

DOJ_NMG_0090834

There also was the case of Port St. Lucie resident Bernard N. Arison, 43, who allegedly hit his 79-year-old mother in the leg with a Bible during a fight. She was treated at the scene by medical personnel for a cut.

Arison was picked up in Port St. Lucie by a Falcon team.

PARTNERS AGAINST CRIME

The teams gathered for a roll call last week at the Port St. Lucie Police Department's new western city annex.

Their badges represented the Port St. Lucie Police Department, Martin County Sheriff's Office, Florida Department of Law Enforcement and Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office. But here, they were part of one efficient team of cops, which also included the Fort Pierce Police Department and Indian River County Sheriff's Office.

Many of them had worked together before.

The Marshals and local cops set up a unique partnership in 2004 called the South Florida Fugitive Apprehension Strike team. The Marshals federally deputized several local cops from Martin, St. Lucie and Palm Beach counties and the state FDLE.

Their mission was to catch the most violent fugitives.

"It eliminated any jurisdictional boundaries," Wilner said. "It gave them the resources to follow their own case along with us ... Instead of sending a lead to another police department somewhere where a road patrol unit is just going to go knock on a door, you're sending it to a team of investigators who will be as either aggressive or discrete as need be."

Falcon operated much the same but on a more grand scale.

This time, the Marshals temporarily federalized local cops to join the strike team, increasing their numbers and ability to make arrests.

"They were cherry picking," Wilner said, as he handed out stacks of paper warrants with address and pictures during one roll call. "The people who have work addresses, lets pull those out. That's an easy grab."

ON THE STREETS

Detective Daniel Herrington had plenty of local street knowledge. Deputy U.S. Marshal Lynn Navitsky possessed the classified tools of the federal government.

They had a stack of names and addresses.

"It's really nice to work with the locals," Navitsky said. "It's a tremendous tool."

For nearly five hours, they knocked on door after door without much luck. One fugitive had gone to Baltimore. Another was likely in Colorado.

They found the family of another wanted woman. They promised to call in five minutes when they located her. That call, of course, never came.

The team had much better luck during several other days of the operation.

"(Later) that night we actually ended up picking up two of the people we were trying to pick up earlier," Herrington said. "It ended up being very successful overall."

WHAT'S NEXT

The heat won't end with the national operation — especially for the sex offenders who didn't register. There were about 57 more warrants still to serve.

The Adam Walsh law, signed in July, allows the Marshals Service to take over cases where sex offenders cross state lines.

That means a federal charge upon arrest.

"There's a whole bunch of people we didn't find throughout the week," Wilner said. "We're not going to just let that go."

Police Sweep Up Felony Fugitives (TAMPTRIB)

By Valerie Kalfrin

Tampa Tribune, November 3, 2006

TAMPA - Roy Brown said he felt a thrill pulling up at the Pinellas County home of a fugitive sexual predator with members of a U.S. Marshals Service operation.

"We got him with cocaine and everything," Brown, 54, of Tampa, said Thursday with a smile.

Brown, whose 7-year-old daughter was killed by a previously convicted pedophile, joined another grieving father, Mark Lunsford, in participating in a nationwide operation last week to round up fugitive sex offenders and gang members.

Called Operation FALCON for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, the initiative netted arrests of 10,773 felony fugitives in the country and 431 in the Middle District of Florida, which includes Tampa.

Fourteen of those arrested in the Tampa Bay area were sex offenders who failed to register and traveled out of the state or country, which is a federal offense under the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act.

DOJ_NMG_0090835

Unregistered sex offenders are fugitives who cause the Marshals Service particular concern, Assistant Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Pete Cajigal said Thursday. He spoke at a news conference in Tampa with Brown, Lunsford and law enforcement officials.

When offenders move where people don't know them, "they have a much larger rein to do the things that they do," Cajigal said.

He estimated the operation, which focused on the eastern half of the United States, cost a little less than $750,000. Most of the money was used for travel expenses and to pay confidential informants.

Investigators from 19 local, state and federal agencies in the Bay area participated in the operation, including Tampa and St. Petersburg police and sheriff's offices from Hillsborough, Pasco, Pinellas, Polk, Hernando, Sarasota and Manatee counties.

The most significant gang member arrested locally was a Jamaican citizen, Chan Tesha Miller, allegedly a high-ranking member of the Clansman gang arrested Oct. 24 in Riverview on an immigration hold, officials said. Miller, 27, is accused of multiple homicides in St. Catherine, Jamaica, officials said.

Investigators invited Brown and Lunsford to ride with them when they went to arrest several offenders.

"I've always said we should turn the tables: Instead of them stalking our kids, we'll stalk them," said Lunsford of Homosassa, whose 9-year-old daughter, Jessica, was killed in 2005.

A convicted sex offender living near the family's home, John Evander Couey, is accused of kidnapping and raping the child and burying her alive. He is awaiting trial.

"It just makes me happy to know I'm making their lives miserable," Lunsford said.

Brown's only daughter, Amanda, was abducted in 1998. In 1999, Willie Crain, a commercial crab fisherman who had prior molestation convictions, was sentenced to death in her disappearance and murder. Her body has never been found.

Roy Brown said the 14 offenders arrested locally during the operation are "14 we don't have to worry about for a while."

Brown now has a granddaughter named Amanda. He said he tried to move away from Tampa to escape memories but felt compelled to return.

"Because Amanda's missing, I couldn't stay away," he said. "She could've been a marshal. She could've been a ballet dancer. I'll never know."

Reporter Valerie Kalfrin can be reached at (813) 259-7800 or vkalfrin@tampatrib.com.

Manatee Rounds Up 37 Felons As Part Of Nationwide Sweep (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, November 3, 2006

MANATEE - Thirty-seven of Manatee County's worst felons were taken off the street and put into jail during a weeklong sting targeting some of the area's most wanted criminals, according to Sgt. Chris Atkinson of the sheriff's office warrant unit.

The county joined federal authorities in the code-named Operation Falcon III, which took place Oct. 22-28.

Nearly 11,000 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives were swept up in what the Justice Department on Thursday called a sting targeting the "worst of the worst" criminals on the run in the eastern United States.

The operation was led by the U.S. Marshals Service.

In Manatee, murderers, sex offenders and probation violators who have absconded were the targeted fugitives. When the operation concluded, gang members made up 20 percent of the arrests and 30 percent were sexual offenders, according to Atkinson.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,773 fugitives - including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives - even at their homes in the early-morning hours - proved to be a hit-or-miss mission for the federal, state and local authorities.

The Manatee County Sheriff's Office warrant unit, which consists of one sergeant, one lieutenant and six deputies, prepared for the operation by pulling their resources together with other agencies, gathering intelligence and researching several databases to have as much information as possible. Informants also assisted, Atkinson said.

Two of their highest priority arrests included a man charged with aggravated battery with a firearm, and a gang member who was found to have a "bunch of guns" inside the residence where he was apprehended, Atkinson said.

Arrests made during Operation Street Sweep, conducted Oct. 27 by the sheriff's office, also contributed to a portion of the arrests recorded in the county during Operation Falcon III.

"Every year we do this operation with the federal marshals office," Atkinson said. "We round up our targets and get them off the streets."

DOJ_NMG_0090836

Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested Oct. 24.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The operation also led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive who was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, officials said. Additionally, the neighbor of a fugitive in Florida fired at - but missed - police approaching her home. Both incidents are under investigation, said John F. Clark, director of the Marshals Service.

The roundup, in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said.

Two earlier stings - Falcons I and II - were held in April during the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall - before the winter weather hit.

A six-hour sting in Washington, D.C., on Oct. 26, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents from the U.S. Marshals; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement; State Department; and the city's Metropolitan Police Department.

"He was there a week or so ago," muttered Marshals Inspector Robert Hoffmaster, after a pre-daybreak search of a house for an accused drug dealer.

In upstate New York, some fugitives tried to hide in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets that a person shouldn't be able to fit in, but they end up fitting in and we have had to call the fire department to get them out."

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law - what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress last summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail to register with communities.

The law was named for 6-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Falcon III showed the Marshals "have proven their extraordinary ability to quickly capture thousands of sexual predators," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Normally, the Marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

· 10,773 fugitives
· 1,659 sex offenders
· 364 gang members
· More than 230 weapons
· 37 felons in Manatee, including some gang members and sex offenders

National Criminal Crackdown Nabs Central Florida Fugitives (WFTV)

WFTV-TV, ABC 9, Orlando, FL, November 3, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. -- A major roundup of gang members and sex offenders has led to thousands of arrests around the country and dozens in Central Florida. The Justice Department said it rounded up more than 11,000 criminals in crackdown called Operation Falcon III.

The sweep allowed local agencies to give the U.S. Marshals' Office a list of top sex offenders on the loose. It was the first sweep that used the new Adam Walsh Act to make federal arrests. In fact, the first arrest under the Adam Walsh Act happened in Orange County.

Federal agents hope sex offenders hear one thing from Operation Falcon III, that absconding is now a federal offense. Agents said they busted more than 10,000 fugitives in a week, mostly offenders and predators and even gang members and murder suspects.

"So these are very significant players. They have preyed on children. They were at large and now they are not," explained Deputy Eric Thompson, U.S. Marshals Service.

Local agencies gave feds a wish list and then helped marshals scour the nation for men and women who thought they'd hide states away. In Central Florida, 43 warrants were cleared on 38 fugitives.

"We were able to take what the federal marshal has, what the federal government has, and direct them at specific people. We have very few absconders in Brevard County, so what we did is highlight four of them," said Lt. Tod Goodyear, Brevard County Sheriff's Office.

Wilfredo Madera was the first offender arrested under the Adam Walsh Act. The law makes it a federal offense to "not register and regularly report to authorities" as a sex offender.

"If you're registered in one state and you move to any other state, it's now a federal crime. We can prosecute federally. We can extradite the individual," explained Deputy Laura Sophia, U.S. Marshals Service,

One local man told marshals, when he was arrested, that he was just tired of being on the FDLE site and reregistering ever six months. He got part of what he wanted; he's not required to register because he's in jail.

'Falcon' Joint Crime Sweep Arrests 61 Area Fugitives (GAINS)

By Alice Wallace, Sun staff writer

Gainesville (FL) Sun, November 3, 2006

National and local law enforcement teamed up for a fugitive sweep this past week, and in total, 10,773 fugitives, all of whom were felons including sex offenders and gang members, were arrested across the country.

Locally, Operation FALCON III (Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally) resulted in the arrest of 61 fugitives in Alachua, Gilchrist and Levy counties - the majority from Alachua County.

Included in the sweep was the arrest of David Nieves, 38, who was found in Mexico on Oct. 25. Nieves was charged with armed robbery and attempted murder in connection with the beating and robbing of Chiefland resident John Edward Curtis at a Red Roof Inn in Gainesville earlier this year.

Organized by the U.S. Marshals Service, Operation FALCON III lasted from Oct. 22 - Oct. 28. The Marshals Service pooled the resources of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the Drug Enforcement Administration, local sheriff's offices and police departments, as well as other agencies in order to locate as many fugitives as possible during the weeklong effort.

"This is what we can do when we all get together," said John Blount, deputy U.S. Marshal, at a news conference Thursday.

Nationally, the 10,773 fugitives arrested included 1,659 sex offenders and 364 documented gang members. Many of the sex offender arrests were fueled by the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, which was signed into law by President Bush in July. The act allows law enforcement to charge sex offenders with a felony punishable by up to 10 years in prison if they fail to register and also travel in interstate or foreign commerce.

This is the third Operation FALCON since April 2005, Blount said.

Hundreds Of Fugitives Arrested In Georgia (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 3, 2006

Federal, state and local law enforcement agencies, in a coordinated sweep, arrested 520 fugitives in North Georgia as part of a sweep to find sex offenders, members of gangs and others accused of violent crimes.

At a news conference today, the U.S. Marshals Service said the week-long operation had locked up some of the â€œworst of the worst.â€

FALCON III was the third coordinated effort since last year. The first was a national sweep that saw 187 people arrested on outstanding warrants. The second time out, the operation focused on states west of the Mississippi River. The third one, in states in the eastern half of the country, resulted in 11,0000 arrests between Monday morning last week and noon last Saturday.

While 520 fugitives were caught in North Georgia, another 142 were picked up in central parts of the state and 352 were arrested in South Georgia.

Midstate Authorities Arrest 87 People Through 'Operation FALCON III' (MACT)

By Liz Fabian

The Macon Telegraph, November 3, 2006

A Macon man accused of paying a 7-year-old for a sex act and an accused kidnapper arrested in Warner Robins are two of more than 10,000 fugitives caught last week in a nationwide round-up organized by U.S. Marshals.

"Operation FALCON III," or Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally, targeted sex offenders and wanted gang members. Of the 10,773 arrests across the country - 1,659 were accused sex offenders and 364 were documented gang members, according to a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service.

DOJ_NMG_0090838

Through the Southeast Regional Fugitive Task Force office in Macon, officers from several local law enforcement agencies cleared 111 felony warrants by arresting 87 wanted fugitives in about four days. The task force normally arrests between 100 and 120 people per month, said Will Hawkins of the Southeast Regional Fugitive Task Force.

During Operation FALCON, which occured Oct. 22-Oct. 28, the Macon office focused on cases in Bibb, Jones, Houston and Peach counties, Hawkins said, with officers from the local sheriff's offices, Macon and Warner Robins police, the Georgia Department of Corrections, Pardons and Paroles, the Veterans Administration, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms.

At about 3:45 p.m. on Oct. 24, officers arrested Michael Scott, 37, on Dexter Avenue in Macon where he lives, Hawkins said.

Scott, who the release states is accused of performing a sex act with 7-year-old and then giving the child money, was being held today in the Bibb County Law Enforcment Center on a charge of child molestation.

In Houston County, investigators were tracking 43-year-old Samuel Easley, of Philadelphia who was wanted by the state of Pennsylvania for kidnapping a minor, the release stated.

After days of interviewing and surveillance, officers arrested Easley on Oct. 26th at about 9:30 p.m. at a motel on Woodcrest Blvd. in Warner Robins, the release stated.

Easley is charged with kidnapping, interference with a child, endangering the welfare of a child and concealing the whereabouts of a child, Hawkins said.

The child was placed in temporary state custody before a reunion with family members.

This morning at the Atlanta office of the Southeast Regional Fugitive Task Force, U.S. Marshal Theresa Rodgers announced the results of the operation during a news conference.

"When we share information and pool our resources towards a common goal, the results are safer communities for our children and a more secure homeland," Rodgers stated in the release.

To contact Liz Fabian, call 744-4303 or e-mail lfabian@macontel.com.

National Marshal Operation Has Local Results (WALB)

WALB-TV, NBC 10, Albany, GA, November 3, 2006

Albany - - More than ten thousand of the nation's most violent criminals are now behind bars. Hundreds of those criminals are gang members, over a thousand are sex offenders and some of them were arrested right here in South Georgia.

They were America's most wanted. Now they're serving time.

"I have four grand kids and I want them to be safe to walk around here and not be afraid to walk in the yard," says Vandolyn Hunt who has lived in one of Albany's high crime public housing complexes for four years. She says criminals aren't kicking her out.

"It's a serious problem yes it is," says Dougherty County Sheriff Jamil Saba. He says cracking cold cases and finding fugitives are the department's top priorities.

Marked territory and graffiti are some of the tell-tell signs of gang activity, but one group of criminals whose signs are not as apparent is sexual predators.

"It could be your uncle. It could be anybody you never know you have to be careful," Hunt says.

So the U.S. Marshal's Office teamed with area Sheriff's Offices around the country. In Albany, officers arrested 22 fugitives in just two weeks.

One of them is Demetri Davis who failed to register as a Sex Offender, and hid from police for three years.

Robert Jackson moved to Tift County from South Carolina, lived there for 8 years but never registered as a sex offender.

Other South Georgia criminals, some gang members, are locked up for parole violations and drug activity.

"The U.S. Marshal Service, the citizens, all the state and local officers out here everyday, they're not going to let these guys keep going around. There's over a million warrants in the U.S. And we're trying to get them down as quick as we can get them locked up," says Deputy U.S. Marshal Jeff Crosby.

Added relief for people fed up with crime. Earlier this year, President Bush signed the Adam Walsh Act making it a federal felony for convicted sex offenders who fail to register. You may remember he's the little boy from Florida who was kidnapped, assaulted and beheaded.

His father is John Walsh of American's Most Wanted. Those offenders can face up to ten years in prison.

These agencies from the Middle District of Georgia participated in Operation FALCON-

Housing and Urban Development - OIG

U.S. Marshals Service

U.S. Veterans Administration - OIG

DOJ_NMG_0090839

Operation Falcon Puts Thousands Behind Bars (WTOC)

WTOC-TV, CBS 11, Savannah, GA, November 3, 2006

Nearly 11,000 fugitives are now facing charges after a 24 state undercover operation, including almost 50 divisions in South Georgia alone.

The U.S. Marshals operation, Operation falcon III, targeted sex offenders, gang members, kidnappers, and other fugitives. It's the largest round up ever of fugitive sex offenders, with more than 1,600 behind bars.

The Savannah division of operation falcon caught 134 fugitives, including 19 wanted sex offenders. The resources available were much different from years past.

Marshal James Roberts says, "In the old days, departments worked within their boundaries, and today we work across boundaries by giving them special status. They can go anywhere within the state and outside the state with us and that's a force multiplier."

Operation Falcon is a joint effort by federal, state, and foreign law enforcement agencies, as well as local police and county sheriff's departments.

Operation Falcon Swoops Into Louisville (WHAS)

WHAS-TV, News 11, Louisville, KY, November 3, 2006

The U.S. Marshall Service is calling it the biggest roundup ever of gang members, sex offenders and others roaming the streets with warrants.

Called Operation Falcon, it covered the eastern half of the U.S. including the Metro Louisville area and saw over 10-thousand fugitives captured.

Some had been on the run for more than a year. They had every reason to think cops had forgotten all about them, but all last week scores of them got a rude awakening. Gone does not mean forgotten.

Their targets, fugitives, sex offenders and gang members in the Louisville Metro area. The team included U.S. Marshals, Jefferson County Sheriff's Deputies, even a doctor.

The woman inside a house with outstanding warrants figured maybe they'll give up and they'll go away, but no dice.

The Marshals Service saying local round ups have netted at least 148 fugitives arrested, including 9 wanted on sex related charges. Including Brian Geary, nabbed in Muldraugh, Kentucky. Geary, authorities say, is wanted in Florida for allegedly raping two girls just six and seven years old.

Authorities say the operation got some of the nation's most dangerous criminals off the streets.

Kentucky was one of 24 states that took part in Operation Falcon. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced today that the weeklong crackdown helped catch almost 11-thousand fugitives, sex offenders and gang members. Gonzalez says more than 16-hundred of those arrested are sex offender.

Nearly 150 Arrested As Sweep Nets Fugitive Sex Offenders (LCJ)

By Jessie Halladay

Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, November 3, 2006

Nearly 150 people were arrested and hundreds of warrants were cleared in Kentucky last week as local law-enforcement agencies participated in a nationwide push to locate fugitive sex offenders.

During the seven-day effort, 18 agencies in the Western District of Kentucky provided about 75 officers and personnel to pick up people who have failed to register as sex offenders.

Rick McCubbin, U.S. marshal for the western district, said he hopes the weeklong blitz, especially the strong presence of officers, acts as a deterrent for those who don't comply with laws requiring sex offenders to register their locations.

Agencies in several states participated in the national program, dubbed Operation FALCON, which stands for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally.

In all, officers arrested 10,773 felony fugitives during the operation.

This is the third such effort run by the marshals. The focus on sexual predators comes after passage of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, which became law in July. The law makes it a federal felony for convicted sex offenders to fail to register or to travel in interstate or foreign commerce.

As part of the local effort, medical personnel trained in high-risk police operations accompanied officers -- something not done by any other team running a similar operation, said McCubbin.

Reporter Jessie Halladay can be reached at (502) 582-4081.

DOJ_NMG_0090840

135 Arrested Locally As Part Of Nationwide Roundup (SHREVET)

By Loresha Wilson

Shreveport Times, November 3, 2006

The U.S. Marshals Service today announced today the arrests of 10,773 people --- including 135 in the Shreveport area – as part of the largest nationwide round-up of fugitives.

Deputy marshals and fellow task force members cleared 153 Shreveport police warrants last week during Operation FALCON III (Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally), officials said.

Those arrested include Wilbert Smith, who was wanted for attempted murder in connection with an aggravated battery 10 years ago. Sex offenders and documented gang members also were rounded up, authorities said. Firearms, narcotics and cash also were seized during the seven-day sting.

"The numbers mean safer streets for the citizens of communities all over this country," said John Clark, U.S. Marshals Service director. "We have not only brought those wanted fugitives to justice, but we have hopefully brought a bit of peace to their communities."

FALCON III is the third such operation in less than 18 months dedicated to victims of crime and to ensure greater safety in the community, officials said. It ran Oct. 22-28 and included law enforcement agencies of 48 districts and in 24 states.

Alexandria reported 107 arrests, Lafayette 41, Lake Charles 43 and Monroe 54.

Fugitive Sex Offender Round Up (KPLC)

KPLC-TV, NBC 7, Lake Charles, LA, November 3, 2006

Between October 22nd and 28th, arrest scenes were taking place across half the country, including in Lake Charles. Deputy U.S. Marshals teamed up with state local and federal crime fighters in the largest roundup targeting unregistered sex offenders, sexual predators and violent offenders.

Surrounded by representatives from several local agencies, Deputy U.S. Marshal Beau Bartel announced the results of Operation Falcon III at a news conference in Lake Charles. Bartel says, "Most fugitives that are out there on the run are repeat offenders and they're they ones that are committing crimes daily. Totally during this week, we had 10,773 fugitives arrested."

Lake Charles Police Chief Don Dixon says a new federal law is making it harder for unregistered sex offenders to hide across state lines. Dixon says, "Every state has a different bill and each state has different penalties and a lot of states have loopholes. I'm glad to see that President Bush has enacted federal legislation that gives consistency and continuity in every state." Stitch Guillory, chief deputy with the Calcasieu Parish Sheriff's Office says, "By doing it at the federal level, it just lets us put a little more teeth into it."

In addition to fugitive sex offenders, other fugitives wanted for gang activity, drugs and firearms violations were also apprehended. The roundup netted 43 arrests in Lake Charles, 41 in Lafayette and nearly 300 more in Alexandria , Shreveport and Monroe. "

Operation Falcon III covered 25 states in the eastern half of the country. The entire one week operation resulted in more than ten thousand arrests, and involved more than one thousand police, sheriff's and other agencies.

187 Maine Fugitives Nabbed In Roundup (WCSH)

WCSH-TV, NBC 6, Portland, ME, November 3, 2006

A major fugitive roundup in 24 states has netted nearly 11,000 wanted felons. In Maine, state troopers and local police teamed up with U.S Marshals to nab 187 wanted fugitives.

The seven day sweep code-named "Operation Falcon-3", was conducted in states east of the Mississippi. The search focused on unregistered sex offenders and gang members. Officials say the sting was designed to get the "worst of the worst" criminals off the street.

"We had resources to track these people and we tried to target the most violent offenders out there. Did we get them all in one week, no we didn't. But we haven't given up on them," said U.S. Marshal David D. Viles.

In all, Maine law enforcement officers cleared 267 outstanding warrants, including 21 arrests for sex related offenses and 48 drug offender arrests.

This is the third Operation Falcon sweep. The first occured nationwide in 2005. The second rounded up criminals west of the mississippi this past April.

Roundup Snares More Than 10,000 Fugitives (PPH)

By From Staff And News Services

Portland (ME) Press Herald, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090841

WASHINGTON - A Department of Justice sweep aimed at nabbing thousands of sex offenders, drug dealers and other fugitives across the country also netted scores of suspects in Maine, federal officials announced Thursday.

Nearly 11,000 fugitives were caught in what the Justice Department called a sting targeting the "worst of the worst" criminals on the run.

Last week's roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, included Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested Oct. 24.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, accused of killing a police oficer, in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The weeklong sting, code-named Operation Falcon III, also led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive who was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, officials said. Also, the mother of a fugitive in Florida fired -- but missed -- police approaching her home. Both incidents are under investigation, said John F. Clark, director of the Marshals Service.

In Maine, authorities grabbed James Miller, a man convicted of gross sexual assault on a child under 13 and disseminating sexually explicit material. Miller, arrested at his Auburn apartment Oct. 22, was charged with failing to register as a sex offender and violating probation. Police say they found pornography links on a computer at his home, though it wasn't clear if that violated his probation conditions.

Deputy U.S. marshals working with state and local police arrested 21 people on sex-related offenses and 48 on drug-related offenses in Maine, clearing 267 warrants, said a statement by U.S. Marshal David Viles.

The roundup, in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Albert Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

Two earlier stings were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark said coming elections played no part in planning the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, noting he wanted to do the roundup before winter hit.

In all, Gonzales said, officials caught 10,733 fugitives -- 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges.

Operation Falcon Nabs 65 Area Fugitives (WHAG)

WHAG-TV, NBC 25, Hagerstown, MD, November 3, 2006

NBC25 News - Nearly 11,000 fugitives have been arrested as part of a sting operation that stretched up and down the East Coast, and many of those fugitives were captured in the Four-State region.

Edward Bowman, 44, is behind bars after he was accused of sexually assaulting his 16-year-old niece. Last week other violent criminals, sexual offenders and gang members were also captured, thanks to a week-long

U.S. sting operation called Operation Falcon 3.

Bowman was arrested on October 25th on Butts Mill Road. He was just one of many residents arrested during operation week.

Nearly 11,000 criminals in 24 states across the country were arrested in the operation, including 65 in the Eastern Panhandle.

Although

U.S. marshals will not go into the specifics of the investigation, authorities say they plan to have more sting operations in the near future.

“If you're wanted we're going to find you,” says Deputy U.S. Marshal Mike Ulrich. “There's no where to run and no where to hide.”

Operation Falcon is the third sting operation targeting criminals across the

Nationwide Fugitive Sweep Nets 433 Felons In Massachusetts (BOSH)

By O’Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, November 3, 2006

Some of the state’s worst gang bangers, pedophiles and suspects-in-hiding, were targeted in a nationwide sweep by federal marshals tagged Operation Falcon III.

In Massachusetts, 433 fugitives were collared in raids carried out over the past week in which federal, state and local police used their combined resources to round up suspects wanted on warrants for multiple violent crimes or failure to register as a sex offender.

DOJ_NMG_0090842

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston said one of the seized men, Brian Berlo, plied a New Hampshire boy with drugs and sodomized him for a six-month period beginning in December 2005. Federal marshals caught up to Berlo in Easton, where he was arrested with a small amount of cocaine, authorities said. He was arraigned on charges of being a fugitive from justice in Taunton District Court and was ordered held on $500,000 bail.

Here in the Bay State, Falcon III plucked 67 sex offenders off the street, with nearly half of those cases involving offenders who failed to register. The Massachusetts portion of the operation also swooped down on 73 alleged gang members, resulting in the seizure of 11 firearms and $9,000 in cash.

Nationwide, Falcon III netted 10,773 fugitives, including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. Some 230 weapons were seized. The roundup, in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said.

Dragnet Captures Almost 11,000 Fugitives, Including 433 In Mass. (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy

The Boston Globe, November 2, 2006

A week-long sweep targeting unregistered sex offenders, gang members and other violent criminals has led to the arrest of 433 fugitives in Massachusetts and 10,773 nationwide, according the US Marshal Service.

In the third and largest dragnet of its kind, dubbed Operation Falcon III, deputy US Marshals teamed with 46 state, federal and local law enforcement agencies in Massachusetts to hunt for some of the region's most wanted fugitives between Oct. 22 and 28.

Those arrested in Massachusetts included 67 convicted sex offenders, including 30 who were not registered as required by law, and 73 reputed gang members.

"We did try to target as many gang members and sex offenders as possible," said Acting US Marshall William Fallon.

All of those arrested face state charges, but federal prosecutors are currently reviewing the cases to determine whether any of them will be prosecuted in federal court under the recently enacted Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, which makes it a federal crime to fail to register as a sex offender and travel interstate. The law was named for Six-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Nationwide the 24-state sweep netted 1,659 sex offenders -- including 971 who failed to register with authorities as required by law -- in what the government called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

The sweep "has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a prepared statement.

Hundreds of state and local law enforcement authorities and more than a half-dozen federal agencies -- including the U.S. Marshals, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the State Department -- helped in the roundup.

The nearly 11,000 fugitives arrested across the country included 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were collected.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep.

90 Nabbed In WMass Fugitive Hunt (RMA)

By Stephanie Barry, Sbarry@repub.com

The Republican (MA), November 3, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - A total of 90 suspects in gang beatings, robberies, sexual crimes and assaults were rounded up last week in this region as part of a coordinated effort to rein in fugitives nationally, law enforcement officials announced yesterday.

A parade of federal and local crime fighters lauded results of "Operation Falcon III," touting 98 arrests of suspects wanted in connection with local crimes.

Nearly 11,000 fugitives were arrested nationally and 433 statewide, according to William Fallon, acting U.S. marshal.

"What we wanted to do come Oct. 22 was hit the ground running. And that's what we did," Fallon told reporters during a news conference at the federal building.

He was referring to the first day of the weeklong sweep and the months of research that preceded it.

Locally, 72 arrests were made in Springfield, 14 in Chicopee, three in Holyoke and one in West Springfield. Eight others were arrested in other states for local crimes, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0090843

Local chiefs of police, Hampden County District Attorney William M. Bennett; Kevin O'Regan of the local U.S. Attorney's Office; and representatives of the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Division of Fisheries and Wildlife joined U.S. marshals at the news conference.

The code name for the operation, falcon, is an acronym for "Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally." The last such sweep took place in spring 2005. Arrests in Springfield tripled during this round, Fallon said.

A national focus was placed on sexual predators, O'Regan said.

"Protecting our children from sexual predators is one of the most important things we all do in law enforcement," he said, adding that criminal suspects who remain at large erode the public's trust in the criminal justice system.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Daniel Spellacy said the initiative yielded the arrest of a New York City man wanted in connection with the 2004 rape of a 7-year-old boy in Chicopee. That investigation is ongoing.

Jerry Washington Jr., 45, of Springfield, was arrested in Springfield for failing to register as a sex offender, Spellacy said. Court records show Washington was convicted in 1979 of 11 counts of rape.

Mark S. Bryant, 28, of Chicopee, was tackled on a sidewalk in Chicopee last week while trying to evade marshals and local police, according to the deputy U.S. marshal. Bryant never answered 2003 charges that he kidnapped, assaulted and intimidated an ex-girlfriend, records show.

Spellacy said local marshals and police conducted hundreds of hours of research in preparation for last week's sweep.

"We worked up 400 cases," Spellacy said, adding that he expects to keep looking for the many they were unable to arrest.

The announcement followed this week's ranking by a private research company of Springfield as the state's most dangerous city.

Springfield Police Commissioner Edward A. Flynn yesterday said the timing was pure coincidence.

"This was in the pipeline for some time," said Flynn, who has denounced the ranking.

Close To 500 Fugitives Arrested In Michigan As Part Of A Federal Sweep (DEN)

Detroit News, November 3, 2006

Nearly 500 fugitives were arrested in Michigan as part of a recent federal sweep in 24 states, officials at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit said today.

A news conference is scheduled for 2 p.m. to announce details of the Michigan operation, which was headed up by the U.S. Marshals Service. A total of 480 arrest warrants were cleared in Michigan between Oct. 22 and 28, many involving alleged sex offenders, officials said.

In all, nearly 11,000 fugitives, including sex offenders, gang members and others wanted on a variety of charges from kidnapping to weapons offenses, were swept up last week in a 24-state operation called Operation Falcon III, the Justice Department was to announce today.

Among the fugitives caught were 1,659 sex offenders - including 971 who failed to register with authorities as required by law - in what the government called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

The sweep, the third and largest such operation since April 2005, "has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said in a prepared statement.

Some of those arrested in Michigan were already in custody on other charges.

The Associated Press contributed to this report You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

Marshals Nab 1600 Sex Offenders (WOOD)

WOOD-TV, NBC 8, Grand Rapids, MI, November 3, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- More than 1,600 fugitive sex offenders and gang members were rounded up nationwide, including some in West Michigan, in a coordinated effort between U.S. Marshals and other law enforcement agencies.

Overall, Operation FALCON III arrested nearly 11,000 fugitives between October 22 and 28, including 107 murder suspects.

Throughout West Michigan, FALCON - Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally - arrested 108 people. Of those, 11 were wanted for sex offenses, four for gang-related activities, 17 for assault and 33 for drugs.

One of those sex fugitives arrested was 28-year-old James Leech, who was picked up while accessing the Internet at the Grand Rapids Public Library on October 24. He was arrested without incident and is now being held in the Kent County Jail. He is facing a first-degree criminal sexual conduct charge involving a minor.

Plus, for the first time, a national operation targeted fugitives in Battle Creek, with nearly half the arrests being made in that city.

DOJ_NMG_0090844

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made the national announcement about this operation that included federal, state and local agencies.

The push for Operation FALCON III came in July.

"Earlier this summer, the President signed the Adam Walsh Act, which named the Marshal Service the primary federal agency for the apprehension of unregistered sex offenders. Off of that, Operation FALCON was born," says Bruce Nordin, Chief Deputy of the U.S. Marshals Office.

John Clark, the director of the U.S. Marshal Service, said, "When we fail to catch those who commit (these crimes, we) may also harm an innocent person."

The new law makes it a federal felony, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, for any convicted sex offender who fails to register in their area.

Operation Nets Thousands Of Criminals (FREEP)

By Cecil Angel, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 3, 2006

A nationwide fugitive apprehension campaign dubbed Operation FALCON III ended with the arrest of more than 10,700 fugitives, including sex offenders and gang members, the U. S. Department of Justice announced Thursday.

"We tried to target the worst of the worst," said Robert Grubbs, U. S. Marshal for the Eastern District of Michigan, at a news conference in Detroit.

Operation FALCON III -- the acronym stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally -- ran sweeps from Oct. 22 to 28. The campaign was a collaboration involving federal, state, county and municipal law enforcement agencies, predominantly in states east of the Mississippi River.

Nationwide, the campaign ended with the arrest of more than 10,773 fugitives. Of those were 1,659 fugitive sex offenders and 364 gang members. Authorities seized more than 230 firearms

In Michigan, 480 people were arrested. The multi-agency sweeps yielded 43 arrests for sex-related crimes, eight for homicides, 112 for assaults, 133 for narcotics charges, 42 for burglary/larceny, 32 for weapons, 37 for robbery, six for arson, one for kidnapping, 10 for stolen vehicles, 13 for fraud and 43 for other crimes.

"I think the bottom line is that 10,773 people are off the street," Grubbs said. "Many, many communities can breathe a lot better, feel a lot safer that they're not going to become victims of these people."

164 Arrested In Mississippi In Fugitive Roundup (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, November 3, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - Authorities have arrested 164 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives in Mississippi as part of a nationwide sting that nabbed some of the most dangerous criminals on the streets.

The roundup was headed by the U.S. Marshals Service with cooperation from hundreds of other agencies, and resulted in nearly 11,000 arrests nationwide, said Nehemiah Flowers, the U.S. marshal for the Southern District of Mississippi.

The arrests included Jonathan Putt, a reputed gang member wanted for the fatal beating of another man in New York, said Christopher Felix, a supervisory marshal in northern Mississippi.

Putt was grabbed after two days of police work in Corinth. He had family ties to the area and came to the Magnolia state to escape authorities, Felix said.

Most of those arrested, however, were sexual offenders whom Flowers said were some of the most dangerous fugitives in Mississippi.

"Anytime you have grandfathers raping grandchildren, you can call that the worst of the worst," he said without elaborating.

Forty-one of the arrests were made in the Jackson area, including two for kidnapping and one for bank robbery, Flowers said. Antwon Townsend was arrested for the Oct. 11 robbery of an AmSouth bank.

At least 81 fugitives were arrested in northern Mississippi.

The sting was known as Operation Falcon III, and followed similar sweeps over the last two years. Flowers said no officers in Mississippi were injured during the weeklong roundup.

At least one suspect here had failed to register as a sex offender and could face charges under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act, which charges sex offenders who fail to register with a federal crime.

Major arrests elsewhere included an unregistered sex offender in Tennessee who was baby-sitting young children when he was picked up and an accused cop killer in Alabama.

DOJ_NMG_0090845

164 Wanted Felons Busted In Mississippi (WLBT)

By By: Marsha Thompson

WLBT-TV, NBC 3, Jackson, MS, November 3, 2006

More than 164 dangerous felons are off the streets of Mississippi tonight. The U.S. Marshals Service says 41 were captured in Jackson. In all Operation Falcon III, netted nearly 11-thousand fugitives.

The long arm of the law reached out in communities east of the Mississippi River. U.S. Marshals and a task force of lawmen targeted sexual predators, unregistered sex offenders, suspected murderers and other criminals hiding out from New York to homes in Jackson.

This is video from the Operation Falcon bust in late October. The roundup netted 164 felony fugitives in Mississippi, 41 in Jackson, 81 in north Mississippi: many with violent criminal histories. Mississippi lawmen worked long days and well into the night. They tagged felons on- the -run. Their work paid off. A reputed New York gang member implicated in a murder was captured hiding out in Corinth, a Jackson bank robbery suspect is also hauled in, so are two people suspected of kidnapping a Jackson man.

The 24 -state operation combined the largest fugitive- hunting law enforcement mobilization unit in history. Hundreds of local, state and federal agents working in tandem. Authorities concede there are thousands of other fugitives eluding justice. According to Southern District U.S. Marshal Nehemiah Flowers, " Our work is not done."

Our investigation found several awol sex offenders, like Susan Landry Boudreaux. Her last known residence was Hinds county. But the woman's address has not been verified. Now Boudreaux is on the wanted list. At least 10 others on Mississippi's Sex Offender Registry list from Hinds County had not verified thier current addresses.

The sweep lead by U.S. Marshals Service was considered a boots- on -the- ground operation. We are told it took surveillance and tips to chase down violent felons statewide. A successful but dangerous operation according to Flowers.

Authorities say Mississippi's neighborhoods are safer as a result. An estimated 1- million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

'FALCON III' Crackdown Nets 83 In NH (MANUL)

By Dale Vincent, Union Leader Staff

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, November 3, 2006

Concord – A joint effort by more than 45 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies resulted in the arrest of 83 people in New Hampshire as part of a weeklong national effort targeting fugitive sexual offenders and documented gang members.

"The streets of New Hampshire are safer than they were last week," U.S. Attorney Thomas Colantuono said.

U.S. Marshal Stephen Monier yesterday said Operation FALCON III (Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally) resulted in 10,733 felony fugitive arrests nationwide during the week of Oct. 22-28. The 83 New Hampshire arrests cleared 114 warrants.

Of the nationwide total in the third FALCON sweep, there were 1,659 fugitive sex offenders and 364 documented gang members arrested. The corresponding state figures were 13 sex offenders, eight of them convicted offenders who failed to register, and no documented gang members, although one man self-reported gang affiliation with Folk Nation, which is affiliated with the Crips, and one had tattoos linking him to Aryan Nation, an anti-Semitic white supremacy group.

Also in the New Hampshire total were 20 narcotics, seven assault, eight burglary, three robbery and four stolen vehicle warrant arrests.

The roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, also included Brian Berlo, who was booked in the town of Easton, Mass. Berlo had been wanted by police in Meredith, N.H., on multiple sex-related counts, including an indictment handed down in July alleging he repeatedly sodomized a 14-year-old boy after providing him with alcohol and marijuana, according to authorities in Boston.

Of the arrests made nationwide, Colantuono said, 140 were homicide warrants and there were 230 weapons seized.

Attorney General Kelly Ayotte said the success of the operation highlights the strong collaborative network of federal, state and local law enforcement agencies and sends a strong message to offenders that they will be found and brought to justice.

Manchester Police Chief John Jaskolka said the city had 33 outstanding warrants and there were 12 arrests, clearing 14 warrants.

Two of the people Manchester sought during FALCON III, Ronald Shotts, 52, a convicted child molester who had failed to register, and Albert Lancey, 44, convicted of aggravated felonious sexual assault and wanted on two counts of failing to register, were arrested in Manchester during the FALCON operation. Lancey had been sought since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0090846

Two other men sought by Manchester for failure to register, Thomas Goines, 50, and Calvin Woodburn, 49, were arrested in Maine.

Saying Manchester, like the rest of the state, will continue to arrest fugitive felons, Jaskolka said the FALCON operation was different from the intensified state and local law enforcement effort in Manchester in the wake of Police Officer Michael Briggs' murder.

The Manchester operation is much broader than FALCON's one-week intensive targeting of fugitive felons.

Jaskolka said the Manchester task force will focus on problem areas and activities, bolster neighborhood watch operations and work on preventive measures. While there's been much publicity around the multi-agency law enforcement in the near term, Jaskolka said the long-term activity of neighborhood watch organizations will be key to making the city a safe place.

While the Briggs shooting has energized local groups, Jaskolka said it's essential to keep those groups active and cooperating with police.

"They know who doesn't belong (in a neighborhood)," he said, and residents need to report suspicious activity or people.

Operation Falcon Seizes Hundreds Of Jersey's Most Wanted (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), November 3, 2006

Federal and local officers rounded up 548 of New Jersey's most wanted criminals last week, specifically targeting suspected gang members and child predators as part of a national crackdown on fugitives.

The suspects, nabbed in every New Jersey county, included 88 sex offenders, more than a third of whom who had not registered as required by law. Another 95 are gang members. Each faced a felony charge worth at least five years in prison. Six were wanted for murder.

"We arrest bad guys every day, but this is a special mission for us in law enforcement -- to get the worst of the worst off the streets," James Plousis, the U.S. Marshal for New Jersey, said at a news conference in Trenton.

The sweeps, which involved hundreds of state and federal officers, were part of Operation Falcon, an ongoing national effort to locate, prosecute or jail fugitives. More than 10,000 suspects wanted in 24 states were caught last week, including 1,600 sex offenders, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced.

But the arrests also highlighted what has been the stark, hamster-wheel reality here and elsewhere: The jails are often revolving doors. Last week's roundup, the second in 18 months, only cut the New Jersey's fugitive rolls to 21,000, and officials acknowledged that some of the newly caught suspects are likely to post bail and be free again.

Their hope is that a new federal law, enacted this summer, will make a difference. The so-called Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act exposes sex offenders who cross state lines to as many as 10 years in prison for failing to register their whereabouts. "That's going to make a big difference," said Donald Rackley, chief of the marshals service in New Jersey.

None of the suspects has yet been charged under the new law. Deputy U.S. Attorney William Fitzpatrick said his office planned to review the new fugitive cases to see if any could be prosecuted under the new law.

Plousis said the marshals teamed with agencies statewide, including the New Jersey State Police.

Among the New Jersey cases he highlighted yesterday was the capture of Steven Ramos, who fled after being arrested near Atlantic City in April 2005 for allegedly sexually assaulting his stepdaughter. Marshals found him living with his wife and stepdaughter last week in New Haven, Conn.

Another suspect was Damielle Tondee, 23, a reputed Bloods gang member from Jersey City wanted for a fatal shooting on Aug. 6. Officers staked out a Trenton neighborhood for more than 24 hours before nabbing Tondee on the street.

Authorities also pointed to the arrest of Armando Vasquez, a 41-year-old Trentonian they said had been a fugitive since 2002, when he was charged with sexually assaulting a child. He was found in Trenton.

But Superior Court records listed his case as "non-active" and his attorney, Charles Casale, was shocked to hear his client had become a poster child for dangerous predators on the lam.

"What a bunch of baloney," Casale said yesterday.

He said Vasquez was never on the run and had offered to surrender weeks ago when he was notified that "an old claim" was being reinstated. "The guy has been living here for something like 20 years," Casale said.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Schroeder, a spokesman for the agency, disputed that Vasquez offered to surrender; he said officers had to forcibly arrest him when he refused to open his door.

Either way, Vasquez is likely to soon be out.

A judge set bail at $25,000. Vasquez expects to soon be released, his attorney said.

John P. Martin covers federal courts and law enforcement. He can be reached at (973) 622-3405 or jmartin@starledger.com.

DOJ_NMG_0090847

NJ Among States Targeted In Massive Fugitive Roundup (WINS)

1010, WINS-AM, NY, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Nearly 11,000 fugitives, including sex offenders, gang members and others wanted on a variety of charges from kidnapping to weapons offenses, were swept up last week in a 24-state operation, the Justice Department announced Thursday.

New Jersey is among the states where Operation Falcon III took place. An estimated 871 fugitives were nabbed in New York and New Jersey.

Among the fugitives in the 24 states were more than 1,600 sex offenders, including 971 who failed to register with authorities as is required by law. The government called the results the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

In one case, authorities said they tracked down Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was convicted in 1996 of sexually assaulting an 8-year-old child. At the time of his Oct. 24 arrest, officials said, Marksberry was baby-sitting several children all of whom were under 11 years old.

Agents also found pornography and drugs inside Marksberry's home, authorities said, and were led to a separate trailer that had a clear view of a playground and a pair of binoculars inside.

The sweep, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, "has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a prepared statement.

The Oct. 22-28 roundup snared more fugitives than similar operations in April 2005 and April 2006, the Justice Department said.

The most recent dragnet, targeting 24 states east of the Mississippi River, was boosted by the 2006 Adam Walsh Act, approved by Congress last summer, which created stricter requirements for sex offenders to register with communities. Six-year-old Adam Walsh was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Hundreds of state and local law enforcement authorities and more than a half-dozen federal agencies - including the U.S. Marshals, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the State Department - helped in the roundup.

In all, officials said they caught 10,733 fugitives. Among them were 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were collected.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep.

870 Suspects Arrested In New York Area Raids (NEWSDAY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 3, 2006

When a squad of federal officials and police caught up with suspected fugitive Robert Shells in a Manhattan apartment, they not only caught him with his pants down, they found he wasn't wearing anything at all.

"Put your pants on, please," an officer said during the early morning raid.

Shells, 29, wanted for sex crime charges involving minors in Virginia, was one of the nearly 11,000 people who officials said Thursday were nabbed in the latest federal nationwide effort to apprehend fugitives on a wide variety of offenses. Most, like Shells, whose arrest was captured on tape by WPIX/11, were taken by surprise between Oct. 22 and Oct. 28. They generally offered no resistance.

Dubbed "Operation Falcon III," the dragnet was the latest in a series of sweeps that since 2005 have netted more than 41,000 suspects, including 3,144 sex offenders and 681 gang members, said Eugene Corcoran, the head U.S. marshal for the Brooklyn federal court region, which includes Long Island.

Teams coordinated by U.S. marshals and composed of NYPD, other federal agencies and local police corralled 870 fugitives, said Corcoran at a Manhattan news conference announcing the operation here. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales first disclosed the busts at a Washington, D.C., conference earlier Thursday.

The total arrested nationwide and locally included those who were convicted sex offenders but hadn't registered as required by law or were facing arrest warrants for sex crimes, gang violence and other charges. A small number of the fugitives arrested included people wanted by other countries for a variety of charges, including murder, child rape and fraud, officials said.

Out of the New York area total, 110 were grabbed on Long Island, said Michael Pagliughi of the U.S. Marshals Service.

DOJ_NMG_0090848

"Fugitives imperil our ability to prosecute them and hamper our ability to put them in jail," said Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf. "Fugitive defendants don't respect jurisdictional boundaries ... that is why it is critical that we band together."

As described by federal officials, Operation Falcon III involved a total of 1,063 law enforcement agencies. During the week in which the agents and police carried out the raids, more than 3,000 law enforcement officers worked on any given day.

Locally, a number of arrests were highlighted by officials. They included the case of Lateaf Johnson, whom officials labeled a "documented member" of the Bloods street gang and who was wanted by Suffolk police on robbery charges. Johnson, whose age wasn't given, was found in Wyandanch and arrested Oct. 27, officials said. Investigators said he admitted being a gang member and was found with gang paraphernalia.

In Brooklyn on Oct. 26, task force members arrested John Oakley, wanted by Ohio authorities on charges he raped and sodomized two young girls.

Shells was traced by a task force team to an Upper West Side apartment the morning of Oct. 24. He was wanted by officials in Norfolk, Va., on charges he raped two girls, one of whom was 4 years old, officials said.

Shells, along with Johnson and Oakley, remain in custody.

Federal Sweep Snares Fugitives (TROYREC)

By Shawn Charniga

Troy (NY) Record, November 3, 2006

TROY - Just before 5 p.m. Friday, one of the last local fugitives to be brought in under a federal dragnet was driven to the Troy Police Station. According to federal authorities this man, 31-year-old Alfred Morey, is one of 11,000 criminals to be caught up in "Operation Falcon III."

Federal authorities said Thursday this law enforcement effort led to the arrests of fugitives, including 99 from this area plus others from 24 states. The last dragnet under this name collared 718 unregistered sex offenders, nearly 2,000 persons sought on sexual assault charges and more than 1,200 sought on other charges.

Morey, whose last known address was 882 River St., is a Level 2 sex offender who was first arrested by city police eight years ago after sexually abusing a then 10-year-old girl. This time, his offense was failing to notify authorities he had moved, said Tim Orava, a criminal investigator with the U.S. Marshals Service.

He was caught in Colonie at his place of employment by the Capital District Fugitive Task Force and brought in by city police, a U.S. Marshal and a member of the Rensselaer County District Attorney's office. Authorities said he was one of 1,659 sex offenders caught up in this sweep.

"The classic line is, 'I called last week, and I'm coming in today, or tomorrow,'" Orava said. Authorities believe this was the second time Morey failed to notify them he was moving, and according to a female acquaintance who arrived at the police station soon after, the first time got him 90 days in jail.

Orava said Morey would be brought in front of a Police Court judge who would decide his punishment. State records show he was released in 2001 after serving a sentence of 18 months to three years for the initial crime; he is required to keep law enforcement informed of his whereabouts for the rest of his life.

His arrest was one of a multitude during the preceding week. Overall, the operation targeted fugitives believed to be present east of the Mississippi. At least one other Trojan, 30-year-old Robert S. Morrison, was arrested at his home earlier in the week after also allegedly failing to register as a sex offender.

Locally, at least one more of these offenders, gang members and a woman with a history of involvement with firearms and drugs were sought, according to federal authorities.

At Thursday's press conference at the federal courthouse in Albany, local, county state and federal authorities laid out what they had done during the last week of October - cleared 13,333 warrants during what U.S. Attorney's Office staffer Grant Jaquith called "the largest and most successful law enforcement effort in U.S. history."

FALCON is an acronym for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally, authorities said. Law enforcement agencies from the Justice Department to the Troy Police Department worked in concert to take criminals, most of whom were wanted on felony charges, off the streets.

Authorities who spoke Thursday said the only misdemeanor charges filed against persons arrested during Falcon III was that of failing to register as a sex offender, which becomes a felony on the second offense and thereafter.

Rensselaer County District Attorney Patricia DeAngelis said, "34 of these offenders are from Rensselaer County - these were some very dangerous criminals we we are apprehending. These guys (the Marshals) are the best of the best. If I need to track someone down, these guys are the bloodhounds."

Marshals said three teams of 10 officers each worked the streets for 12 hours or more every day in search of fugitives, and between 30 and 35 were caught in each of Albany, Schenectady and Rensselaer counties.

Albany Police Department Deputy Chief S.M. Reilly said 30 arrests were made in his city alone. One of these suspects, who was not identified, was arrested in Arbor Hill on an unspecified date on the strength of seven felony warrants, Reilly said.

Locally, all of these arrests were made without incident, according to the Marshals, but at least two incidents of violent resistance reportedly took place - a suspect found in Georgia was killed during a shootout, while another in an unspecified area fired at authorities but surrendered without causing or sustaining injury.

Marshals said at least one similar sweep will take place each year.

CNY Sweep Nabs 132 Fugitives (SYPS)

By Sue Weibezahl, Staff writer

The Syracuse Post-Standard, November 3, 2006

Federal and local police find suspects in Cayuga, Cortland and four other counties.

The long arm of the law caught up with 132 fugitives who had been hiding out in Central New York, officials said Thursday.

Operation FALCON Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally used a $10,000 federal grant to pay overtime for troopers, deputies and officers who rounded up the suspects from Oct. 22 to 28, said Deputy Marshal Joseph Ciciarelli, of the U.S. Marshals Service.

More than 200 were on the list, and many were sex offenders, while others were violent felons and gang members, he said. Local suspects who were caught came from Cayuga, Cortland, Madison, Oneida, Onondaga and Oswego counties.

Advertisement

It's hard to breathe a sigh of relief, Ciciarelli said.

"As we get rid of one or two, there's always three or four more 10,733 coming in," he said. "We're always behind the eight ball."

Representatives of the Syracuse Police Department, Onondaga County Sheriff's Office, state police, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and Drug Enforcement Administration spent more than a week researching their targets before the sweep, Ciciarelli said.

"Sometimes, it just comes down to good old-fashioned police work, knocking on doors, talking to people, checking in basements," he said.

U.S. marshals have found fugitives hiding in insulation, rolled up in rugs and inside cabinets, Ciciarelli said. "One of them was taking a shower when we got there," he said.

"These folks can literally find a needle in a haystack," said Syracuse Deputy Police Chief Michael Kerwin.

Charges for those rounded up include rape, robbery and murder and burglary, menacing and drug possession.

The local sweep was part of a seven-day campaign across the country that led to the arrests of 10,733 fugitives, said Glenn Suddaby, U.S. attorney for New York's Northern District.

Ciciarelli said he believes the sweep made an impact.

"At least it made people aware that we're going out there, going after them," he said. "Now that they know it will be harder and harder for them to just disappear, they may think twice."

The first FALCON sweep was in 2005 and resulted in 75 arrests locally. One in April led to the arrests of 123 suspects.

Dragnet Nabs 11,000 (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales yesterday announced a record sweep that netted nearly 11,000 fugitives nationwide - raising eyebrows five days before the election.

Among those rolled up in the past week by federal agents and 1,000 state and local police agencies were 1,659 sex offenders, Gonzales said.

The raids were part of Operation Falcon in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, including 2006 election battlegrounds.

Gonzales said the point was to get "the worst of the worst fugitive felons" and make "America's neighborhoods safer."

There was no political calculation involved, he said.

"You're questioning the timing," Gonzales told reporters. "The Department of Justice played no role in the timing of this program."

In New York, marshals nabbed 85 convicted sex offenders who failed to register under Megan's Law.

On Oct. 23, they picked up accused rapist John Oakey, who was hiding in his family's Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, attic. He was wanted in Ohio on three felony counts for the rape and sodomy of two young girls.

DOJ_NMG_0090850

Also arrested last month was Darnell Nisbett, wanted for a July 2006 revenge slaying in a Bedford-Stuyvesant, Brooklyn, playground that left two bystanders, including a 6-year-old girl, wounded by stray bullets.

Marshals Service Director John Clark said the weather was the main reason for rounding up the fugitives now.

"We wanted to conduct something in the fall, which would be outside the realm of the harsh winter weather," Clark said.

But Democrats and some cops were skeptical, citing security issues dominating the campaigns.

"It seems very suspicious," said Jennifer Palmieri, spokeswoman for the liberal think tank Center for American Progress.

Gonzales, a close friend of President Bush and his ex-White House counsel, has made a point of doing anti-crime events in the battleground states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri and Virginia since May. He has appeared with endangered Republicans Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio) - though he also appeared with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a Democrat.

With Thomas Zambito in New York

20 Sex Offenders Arrested In Area (Rochester Democrat &)

By Victoria E. Freile

Rochester Democrat & Chronicle, November 3, 2006

Total of 44 held here in national roundup of fugitives

Federal and local police officers arrested thousands of fugitives — including 44 people in the Rochester area — last week in a 24-state operation, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn and John Palillo, chief deputy marshal for the Western District of New York, announced the nationwide arrests of 10,773 felony fugitives — from sex offenders to drug dealers to gang members — at a news conference in the U.S. courthouse in Rochester on Thursday.

The arrests were made Oct. 22 to 28 as part of a roundup called Operation Falcon III.

In the Rochester area, 44 people were arrested, including 20 sex offenders on charges they failed to register, Palillo said. In the Buffalo area, 35 felony fugitives were arrested.

Level 2 sex offender Timothy Grossman, 40, of Rochester — who was wanted by the Rochester Police Department for failing to register as a convicted sex offender — was one arrested as part of the roundup.

Grossman was located in the attic of a duplex on Electric Avenue on Oct. 22.

Authorities said he crawled from his own attic to his neighbor's attic, where officers found him.

He was taken into custody without incident and remained at Monroe County Jail on Thursday in lieu of $7,500 bail.

The effort, led by the U.S. Marshal's Service, "has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a prepared statement.

Rochester Police Officer Robert Jobe said the increased enforcement led to more arrests than he typically would make as the department's sole officer tasked with tracking sex offenders.

"There's no comparison," he said. "I might make one arrest a week."

Of the sex offender arrests in the Rochester area, five were felony arrests and the rest were misdemeanor arrests, Jobe said.

A sex offender who fails to properly register is hit with a misdemeanor for a first offense and a felony for the second.

The arrests were made through use of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act passed in July, which makes nonregistration a felony and a federal crime punishable by a prison term of up to 10 years for convicted sex offenders.

Six-year-old Adam Walsh was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

At the same time as the crackdown, local probation and state parole officers also worked to keep a close eye on registered sex offenders on Halloween.

According to state Parole Division spokesman Scott Steinhardt, parole officers conducted 159 home visits of registered sex offenders and there were no curfew violations.

"We're pleased with the fact the (sex offenders) were home," Steinhardt said.

367 People Arrested In N.C. Fugitive Roundup (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, CBS 5, Raleigh, NC, November 3, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. -- More than 350 people were arrested last week in eastern North Carolina as part of a national roundup of fugitives, making it one of the most comprehensive operations of its kind in the state.

Operation FALCON III, conducted Oct. 22 to Oct. 28, focused heavily on gang-related crime, major felony warrants and unregistered sex offenders.

DOJ_NMG_0090851

Personnel from 21 different law enforcement agencies in eastern North Carolina helped U.S. Marshals arrest 367 people, including 20 convicted sex offenders, and serve 415 warrants.

"(The) national average for a round up of this type is 13 percent," said Tex Lindsey, U.S. Marshal Fugitive Task Force commander for Eastern North Carolina. "And we far exceeded our expectations with an arrest average close to 40 percent."

Nationally, 10,773 fugitives were arrested and 13,333 felony warrants were cleared, including 365 documented gang members and 1,659 sexual offenders, of which 971 were unregistered sex offenders.

Drive Nabs Fugitives In Carolinas (CO)

By Gary L. Wright

The Charlotte Observer, November 3, 2006

Nearly 11,000 fugitives, including 935 in the Carolinas, have been arrested in what federal authorities on Thursday called the nation's largest-ever roundup of sex offenders and gang members.

Operation Falcon III netted 105 fugitives in Mecklenburg and the Western District of North Carolina, including 22 suspected sex offenders.

"This is the largest fugitive apprehension effort in the history of the United States," Patrick Smith, the U.S. marshal for the Western District of North Carolina, told reporters in Charlotte.

U.S. deputy marshals teamed with federal, state and local law enforcement agencies in the Carolinas and 22 other Eastern states from Florida to Maine.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called the more than 1,500 sex offenders nabbed the most ever captured in a single law enforcement effort. More than 950 of the sex offenders had failed to register with authorities.

Wilton Richard Bethel, described as one of Mecklenburg's most wanted sex offenders, was arrested in Tennessee, authorities said. They said Bethel had been wanted since June 2005 for failing to register.

Among other fugitives captured were Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting young children when he was arrested, and Demetrius Avery Jackson, accused of killing an Alabama police officer.

The 105 apprehended in the Western District of North Carolina had been charged with everything from assault and fraud to narcotics and weapons violations. Most were captured in Mecklenburg, Gaston and Iredell counties.

Among the Charlotte-area arrests:

· Sammie Lee Washington, who authorities say was arrested in Charlotte on five counts of first-degree sex offense with a victim under 13 and five counts of indecent liberties with a child.

· Michael Ray Goins of Gastonia, who authorities say had been charged with 23 counts of child pornography.

· Bobby Lamar Reep, who authorities said had been wanted since 2002 in Florida for failure to register as a sex offender. Officers captured Reep last week after determining that he was living in Morganton.

Smith praised the weeklong operation's success and what can happen when law enforcement agencies work together.

"When we share information and pool our resources towards a common goal, the results are safer communities," Smith said. "We in law enforcement find it particularly rewarding to arrest and isolate sexual offenders, especially those which target our children."

Two earlier stings -- Falcons I and II -- were held in April over the last two years. In Washington, Gonzales and Marshals Service Director John Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"Getting 3,000-plus officers and agents and everybody together to do this just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding he wanted to do the roundup before winter weather hit.

Authorities said some of the fugitives might be charged under the Adam Walsh Child Protection Act, signed by President Bush in July. The law makes it a felony, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, for convicted sex offenders to fail to register.

The law was named for 6-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida mall and murdered in 1981.

In upstate New York, some fugitives hid in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district, according to The Associated Press. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets."

Among local law enforcement agencies that participated were the FBI, the Mecklenburg, Gaston and Iredell sheriff's offices, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg, Gastonia and Statesville police departments and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"There are over 10,700 people in jail tonight because of the efforts of the U.S. Marshals Service and about 3,000 law enforcement officers," U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said. "These are dangerous federal and state felons."

How Many Arrests?

DOJ_NMG_0090852

N.C.: 543, including 61 sex offenders.
S.C.: 392,
including 55 sex offenders.
24-state total: 10,773,
including 1,659 sex offenders.

86 Nabbed In Fugitive Manhunt (GREENREF)

By Corey G. Johnson, The Daily Reflector
Greenville (NC) Reflector, November 3, 2006

Local authorities working with a federal task force arrested 86 Pitt County fugitives as part of a nationwide effort to capture wanted sex offenders and gang members, officials said.

The manhunt, code named Operation Falcon III for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally, occurred Oct. 22-28 in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, The Associated Press reported.

The roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, ensnared nearly 11,000 and targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Albert Gonzales said Thursday. Falcons I and II were held in April 2004 and 2005, respectively.

Local participation in the program featured officers with the Greenville Violent Fugitive Task Force working with law enforcement agencies in Pitt, Lenoir and Martin counties to track down tips and leads to pinpoint the location of felons, Detective T.S. O'Neil of the Pitt County Sheriff's Office said.

The task force was organized in July by the U.S. Marshals to lend federal resources to local law enforcement in order to catch fleeing persons accused of murder, kidnapping and other violent crimes.

Since its creation, the group has arrested approximately 40 to 50 violent offenders, said O'Neil.

During Operation Falcon III, 1,000 fugitives were identified within the eastern portion of the state, a U.S. Marshals' news release stated.

Greenville task force members gathered unserved warrants for the targeted offenders and fanned out across the state, knocking on doors and arresting those wanted, O'Neil said.

By the conclusion of the effort, the Greenville task force arrested 86 people, including one in Martin County and four in Lenoir County. They also served 159 warrants and cleared 266 outstanding charges, according to a Sheriff' Office news release.

From Oct. 22-25, the task force booked 37 of those arrested into the Pitt County Detention Center. Booking logs show:

-five were held on theft charges
-four were held on sex charges
-three were held on assault charges
-two were held on weapons charges
-one was held on a traffic violation
-one was held for breaking and entering and animal cruelty

The remaining 49 fugitives were jailed in other counties.

Similar fugitive task force teams in Wilmington, Fayetteville, Raleigh, Greensboro and Asheville arrested 378 people across the state, O'Neil said.

Corey G. Johnson can be reached at cjohnson@coxnc.com or 329-9565.

Massive Sting Targets 'worst Of The Worst' (DURHS)

By Brianne Dopart
Durham (NC) Herald-Sun, November 3, 2006

DURHAM -- Durham was home to the lion's share of arrests in the Middle District of North Carolina during last week's Operation Falcon III, a seven-day sting led by the U.S. Marshals Service in conjunction with local law enforcement.

In the Middle District, some 81 local members of law enforcement were involved, according to U.S. Marshal Richard Carleton Thursday.

The U.S. Marshals Service divides North Carolina into three enforcement districts, each running north to south -- the Eastern District based in Raleigh, the Middle District based in Greensboro and the Western District, based in Asheville.

Operation Falcon III -- Falcon is an acronym for "Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally" -- was the third stage of a three-year roundup U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country."

Falcon III took place in 47 districts across 24 states east of the Mississippi River.

DOJ_NMG_0090853

In total, law enforcement made 71 arrests in the Middle District, and also cleared 152 warrants. The operation focused on sex offenders and gang members, but resulted in the arrests of several individuals not originally targeted by the operation, Carleton said.

Some 20 local law enforcement officers worked with about eight U.S. marshals in the Middle District and focused on Durham County, Carleton said.

Cpl. Raheem Aleem of the Durham Sheriff's Office Narcotics Unit said U.S. marshals helped Durham law enforcement to find more "elusive" fugitives, including Zacchaeus Keewon Ormond, a Durham teen wanted on a murder charge in High Point.

"They have a means to track these people down that we don't have access to," Aleem said.

Of the 47 districts targeted nationally, the Middle District saw the sixth-highest number of gang arrests -- 11, Carleton said.

Aleem said the gang arrests are part of a trend being observed by the Sheriff's Office which shows a direct parallel between violent crime and gang activity, that is "rapidly changing America's heartland."

Eight members of the Durham Sheriff's Office participated in the roundup, working in collaboration with several more Durham police officers, he added.

The Durham Police Department, an active member of the Middle District's Violent Fugitive Task Force according to Carleton, was responsible for 36 of the arrests made last week, combining for a total of 82 criminal charges.

Across the eastern U.S., nearly 11,000 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives were arrested. One of those arrested was Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was babysitting several young children when arrested on Oct. 24.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The weeklong sting led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive who was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, officials said. Additionally, the neighbor of a fugitive in Florida fired at -- but missed -- police approaching her home. Both incidents are under investigation, said John F. Clark, U.S. Marshals director.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Attorney General Gonzales said Thursday.

Two earlier stages of the sting -- Falcons I and II -- were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall -- before the winter weather hit.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,773 fugitives -- including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives -- even at their homes in the early-morning hours -- proved to be a hit-or-miss mission for the federal, state and local authorities.

A six-hour sting in Washington, D.C., just over a week ago, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents from the U.S. Marshals, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State Department and the city's Metropolitan Police Department.

"He was there a week or so ago," muttered Marshals Inspector Robert Hoffmaster, after a pre-daybreak search of a house for an accused drug dealer.

In upstate New York, some fugitives tried to hide in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets that a person shouldn't be able to fit in, but they end up fitting in and we have had to call the fire department to get them out."

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law -- what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress last summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail register with communities.

The law was named for 6-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Falcon III showed the marshals "have proven their extraordinary ability to quickly capture thousands of sexual predators," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Normally, the marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

-- The Associated Press contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0090854

Dozens Of Accused Sex Offenders Arrested (WCNC)

By Glenn Counts

WCNC-TV, NBC 6, Charlotte, NC, November 3, 2006

A mission called "Operation Falcon" involved the arrest of dozens of alleged sex offenders, and some of the suspects live in Charlotte.

For the past couple of weeks US marshals have been targeting gang members and child sex offenders. Michael Goins from Gastonia and Sammie Lee Washington from Charlotte are just two of the more than 100 suspects that were rounded up from our area. They were arrested on numerous sex charges involving children.

For the past couple of weeks marshals and many other agencies fanned out across the area and the eastern seaboard looking for suspects. At an afternoon news conference Thursday, US Attorney Gretchen Shappert talked about Operation Falcon III and how it will make our streets safer.

“Let me emphasize, this is not low hanging fruit. This is not people on speeding tickets or traffic tickets,” she said. “These are serious federal and state criminals charged with major offenses. Murder, robberies, gang related offenses, particularly sex related offenses pertaining to children.”

Nationally more than 10,000 fugitives were arrested including 400 from north Carolina. Some of them could be punished under the Adam Walsh child protection act, which makes it a felony for sex offenders who fail to register and travel across state lines. It carries a maximum 10 year sentence in a federal prison.

77 Central Ohio Fugitives Pulled In (COLDIS)

By John Futty, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus (OH) Dispatch, November 3, 2006

U.S. Marshals Service, local authorities sweep up 10,773 ‘worst of the worst’

A 64-year-old man wanted for three counts of rape and various crimes against minors was among 77 fugitives from central Ohio arrested last week during a roundup by federal and local agents.

Members of a task force dubbed Operation Falcon III found Clarence R. Harris in Martins Ferry. He was being held in Belmont County awaiting a transfer to Franklin County, where he was indicted.

Law-enforcement officials said Harris was an example of the fugitive sex offenders targeted in the sweep, which netted 10,773 felony arrests in the eastern half of the United States from Oct. 22 through Saturday.

It was the third time since April 2005 that the U.S. Marshals Service has teamed with local law-enforcement agencies under the Operation Falcon banner to target what agents call "the worst of the worst" fugitives.

"The marshals office is relatively small," said Thomas McCombs, chief deputy marshal for the Southern District of Ohio. "We can't do it ourselves. If we combine in a task force operation, we can see the results."

Nationally, the fugitives rounded up included 1,659 sex offenders and 364 documented gang members, the Justice Department reported.

For the first time, the task force sought those in violation of the Adam Walsh Child Protection Act, signed by President Bush in July. The act makes it a federal crime, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, for convicted sex offenders to fail to register or update their registration.

The 77 arrests of central Ohio fugitives included one for a sex-offender registration violation and at least three for sex offenses against children. Drug offenses were the most common charges.

In addition to rape charges, Clarence Harris was wanted for one count of gross sexual imposition of a minor, one count of distributing harmful materials to a minor and one count of pandering obscenity to a minor.

State Highway Patrol troopers and deputy sheriffs assisted in the arrest of William Anderson Maley in Peebles, Ohio, on 20 felony charges out of Franklin County for pandering obscenity involving a minor. Troopers said Maley threatened to kill himself with a shotgun when approached by officers, but he was persuaded to put the gun down.

The Franklin County sheriff's office has a 16-member warrants and extradition unit, but Chief Deputy Steve Martin said smaller agencies have limited resources for pursuing fugitives.

"We can combine all our resources for a week and really hit it hard," he said. "Cooperation among agencies is becoming more and more common. That's the way it should be. It's what taxpayers expect. We're all working toward the same goal."

Sweep Nabs 584 In Region (ABJ)

By Carl Chancellor

Akron Beacon Journal, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090855

During the last week of October, U.S. Marshals worked with federal, state and local police agencies in a multistate effort to round up thousands of felony fugitives resulting in nearly 11,000 arrests.

News of the massive police action, code-named Operation Falcon III, was made public Thursday in coordinated news conferences held across the country and at the Oliver Ocasek government building in Akron.

``We took some meat-eaters -- some real serious predators -- off the streets," said Summit County Sheriff Drew Alexander, who was one of the 20 law enforcement officials representing as many departments.

In Northeast Ohio, 584 arrests were made during a six-day period from Oct. 22 through Oct. 28. Included in that number were 59 sex offenders and 18 gang members.

Akron Police Chief Michael Matulavich said the Akron prong of Operation Falcon III, which focused on neighborhoods with recent incidents of gun violence, resulted in the arrest of nine wanted felons and the seizure of two semiautomatic handguns and one fully-loaded semiautomatic machine gun.

``You have to wonder what he was going to do with that," Matulavich said of the machine gun.

Alexander credited the joint task force operation for the apprehension of ``one of Summit County's most-wanted sex offenders."

The sheriff said John R. Coffe,

64, who has an extensive arrest record that includes a conviction for sexual battery, was wanted most recently for failing to register as a sex offender.

``These types of joint efforts bring more resources to bear on getting known criminals off the street," Alexander said.

Apprehending violent sexual offenders and gang members was the focus of Operation Falcon III, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a news conference Thursday in Washington, D.C.

Gonzales said the roundup was carried out in 24 states east of the Mississippi River.

Two earlier stings -- Falcons I and II -- were held in April this year and last.

Gonzales and U.S. Marshals Service Director John Clark said the elections next week played no part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

``I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," said Clark, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall -- before the winter weather hit.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,733 fugitives -- including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store and construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives -- even at their homes in the early morning hours -- proved to be a hit-or-miss matter.

A six-hour sting in Washington a week earlier, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents.

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law -- what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress this summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail to register with communities.

The law was named for 6-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Normally, the Marshals' regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

Butler Fugitive Caught In Sweep (HAMJN)

By Mary Lolli, Staff Writer

Hamilton (OH) Journal-News, November 3, 2006

HAMILTON — One of Butler County's "Most Wanted" fugitives was among thousands nabbed by federal authorities during a weeklong dragnet that concluded Oct. 28.

The U.S. Marshals' office on Thursday released details of the round-up that blanketed the eastern half of the country, but also resulted in the arrest of a local convicted child rapist in Texas.

Frederick Gholston, labeled a sexual predator in 1998 after his conviction on charges of forcible rape and gross sexual imposition involving a minor, was arrested at the Pilgrim's Pride Chicken Packaging Plant in Tyler, Texas, on an escape warrant issued by the Butler County Sheriff's Office in September after Gholston failed to register his address with authorities.

Sheriff's Sgt. Monte Mayer said Gholston had been on the sheriff's "Most Wanted" list.

DOJ_NMG_0090856

Federal officials said Gholston is being held in Texas and awaiting extradition to Ohio where he may be facing additional federal charges.

Gholston was one of nearly 11,000 fugitives arrested during Operation FALCON III — Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally.

In the operation, deputy U.S. Marshals teamed up with state local and other federal agents in what officials said was the largest fugitive sweep ever focusing on violent sex offenders.

The sweep resulted in 10,773 arrests — including 1,659 sex offenders and 364 documented gang members. In addition, the sweep cleared 13,333 outstanding warrants, including 140 homicide warrants and 3,609 narcotices/organized crime warrants, according to James. M. Wahlrab, U.S. Marshal for the Southern District of Ohio.

Four deputies from the Butler County Sheriff's Office were assigned to special detail assisting in the round-up which resulted in the arrests of 20 fugitives found living within the county.

Dragnet Snares 108 Fugitives In Valley (DAYDN)

By Rob Modic, Staff Writer

Dayton (OH) Daily News, November 3, 2006

Area child-sex fugitive caught in federal dragnet

DAYTON — Deputy U.S. marshals led other law enforcement agencies across half the states in the country, all this side of the Mississippi, last week rounding up almost 11,000 fugitives including 108 in the Miami Valley region.

Among those was Robert Farris on Jasper Road in Greene County, where task force officers forced open a door and had to Taser an aggressive dog before they took Farris into custody for multiple counts of sex crimes against children, according to James M. Wahlrab, U.S. Marshal for the Southern District of Ohio.

Farris lives next door to a day care center, according to the U.S. Marshals Service.

Marshals and other officers assigned by local jurisdictions were tasked in teams of seven or eight officers to seek out each fugitive, Wahlrab said.

Code-named Operation FALCON III (Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally), the organized effort this time targeted sex offenders and gang members in 24 states and netted 1,659 sex offenders and 364 gang members.

Gregory G. Lockhart, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Ohio, said the operation was sending the message, "We will find you; we will track you down."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a prepared statement that the sweep "has made our nation's neighborhood and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members."

In the Miami Valley, about 40 to 50 law enforcement officers each day were assigned to hunt fugitives, Wahlrab said.

The Oct. 22-28 roundup snared more fugitives than similar operations in April 2005 and April 2006, the Justice Department said.

The most recent dragnet was boosted by the 2006 Adam Walsh Act, approved by Congress last summer, which created stricter requirements for sex offenders to register with communities. Six-year-old Adam Walsh was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

More Than 25 Arrested In Stark In A Nationwide Fugitive Round-up (CANTREP)

By Lori Monsewicz, REPOSITORY STAFF WRITER

Canton (OH) Repository, November 3, 2006

AKRON Federal, state and local officers arrested 25 people in Stark County on general felony warrants last week as part of Operation Falcon III, a national fugitive round-up.

“This was a great cooperative effort ....more productive than such an operation in any other region in the country,” said Canton Police Chief Dean McKimm.

McKimm was among the more than 50 police chiefs, sheriff’s deputies, task force officers and other law enforcement officers who gathered for an afternoon press conference in Akron that was hosted by the U.S. Marshals Service, which spearheaded the cooperative effort.

Cathy Jones, assistant chief deputy marshal, said the most notable Stark County arrest last week was the arrest of double homicide suspect, Edward Lee Lang III. The 19-year-old was charged with two counts of aggravated murder in connection with the execution-style deaths of a couple in what police called “a drug deal-robbery gone awry.”

Lang’s arrest was among the 10,773 felony fugitive arrests nationwide resulting from Operation Falcon, Jones said.

Reach Repository writer Lori Monsewicz at (330) 580-8309 or e-mail: lori.monsewicz@cantonrep.com

DOJ_NMG_0090857

Operation Falcon Snares Felons In Sweep (SPRINGNS)

Springfield (OH) News-Sun, November 3, 2006

Local officers arrest 34 of the nearly 11,000 fugitives arrested in the 24-state operation.

They began at 6 a.m. Oct. 22 — 51 law enforcement officers ready to serve warrants as part of Operation Falcon.

By the time they were done, Clark County Sheriff Gene Kelly said, 34 people were arrested locally, one runaway child was found and stolen property was recovered.

The locals were part of a 24-state operation last week that netted almost 11,000 fugitives, the Justice Department announced Thursday. That included about 260 in Ohio.

One fugitive was hiding in the attic of a Springfield home and another near Dayton was found in a closet with a handgun and a pit bull.

Among the fugitives caught nationally were 1,659 sex offenders — including 971 who failed to register with authorities as required by law — in what the government called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Local offenses ranged from criminal trespassing and soliciting to complicity to robbery and felony robbery.

The sweep, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, "has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the worst sex offenders, violent felons and gang members," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a prepared statement.

The Oct. 22-28 roundup was code-named Operation Falcon III. It snared more fugitives than similar operations in April 2005 and April 2006, the Justice Department said.

Two earlier stings — Falcons I and II — were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall — before the winter weather hit.

Fugitive Roundup Nets 83 (CINE)

By Dan Horn, Enquirer Staff Writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, November 3, 2006

U.S. marshals enlist local officers in sweep

Dozens of accused sex offenders and gang members in Greater Cincinnati are in jail today after one of the largest nationwide roundups of fugitives in history.

Law enforcement officers from across the region announced the arrests Thursday as part of a U.S. Marshals Service operation that caught 10,773 felony fugitives in at least 26 states.

The operation, which took place Oct. 22-28, resulted in the arrest of 83 fugitives in Greater Cincinnati.

The Marshals Service has conducted similar operations in the past - most recently last year - as a way to focus local and federal law enforcement agencies on tracking down fugitives.

More than 50 local officers were temporarily deputized by the Marshals Service so they could cross jurisdictional boundaries to pursue fugitives, something they ordinarily cannot do.

"The citizens of our community are safer at this point because of the number of people taken off the street," said Chris Riley, supervising deputy of the Marshals Service in Cincinnati.

Riley said the focus on fugitives allows the officers to follow tips and other information that they otherwise might not pursue because of jurisdictional problems or other responsibilities.

"Criminals are becoming more and more mobile," said Major Dale Menkhaus of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Office. "Everyone is frustrated by jurisdictional boundaries."

The Marshals Service focused on violent gang members and sex offenders. Sheriffs' departments, Cincinnati police and other local and federal agencies participated in the sweep.

Many of the fugitives are charged with violating a new federal law, the Adam Walsh Act, which makes it a felony for paroled sex offenders to flee states that require them to register their names with authorities.

Fourteen accused sex offenders were arrested in Greater Cincinnati.

Those arrested last week include Rayshane Fears, who was wanted by Springfield Township police. He is accused of shooting a man while attempting to rob him in July. He was arrested in Newport.

Another, Fredrick Gholston, has been wanted for a parole violation in Butler County since 2002. Authorities say he is a sexual predator who abused a child in 1998. Police tracked him down last week in Texas.

Hundreds Of Area Fugitives Arrested In Nationwide Bust (WEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0090858

WEWS-TV, IBS 5, Cleveland, OH, November 3, 2006

Authorities Round Up 584 Fugitives In Sex, Gang-Related Offenses

AKRON, Ohio -- A nationwide sting operation involving several law enforcement agencies yielded the largest fugitive sex offender bust ever.

Almost 11,000 were arrested, including more than 1,600 unregistered sex offenders and 360 gang members.

Many of those arrested are from northern Ohio, where authorities targeted 10 counties, reported NewsChannel5's Jonathan Costen.

The fugitive roundup was conducted by deputy U.S. marshals along with other federal, state and local law enforcement agents. The program is named Operation FALCON III, an acronym for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally.

In northern Ohio, authorities obtained 894 warrants in connection with sex and gang-related offenses, making 584 fugitive arrests and seizing nine firearms.

Akron Detective Bertina King assisted In FALCON III, helping police in Shreve catch alleged sexual predators over the Internet.

She said working on Akron's task force for the past two years has been challenging.

"It's very intense because when you go to the house, you never know who's inside, how cooperative they're going to be," she said.

In a Thursday news conference, the organizers of the operation talked about the success of FALCON III.

"We continue to be one of the leading task forces in the nation our success is built on our local and federal partners," said Ohio U.S. Marshal Peter Elliott.

But officials said there's no room for complacency, and there are plenty of suspects walking freely on the streets.

"Yes, we have two individuals we want to have profiled: Bruce Klingsgale and Jack Manigold, two very dangerous individuals known to carry a lot of weapons, both are being sought in Mahoning County, Ohio," said the task force's Dean Michael.

More Than 100 Rounded Up In Federal Operation (WHIO)

WHIO-TV, Channel 7, Dayton, OH, November 3, 2006

DAYTON, Ohio -- Authorities said more than 100 wanted, suspected criminals are off the streets of the Miami Valley.

Investigators said they were arrested during the U.S. Marshals' Operation FALCON 3. For one week, law enforcement agencies teamed up to track down the area's most wanted suspects.

On Thursday, they held a news conference about the operation's success.

A Springfield woman was one of the dozens of people arrested during the operation.

Armed officers surrounded homes and came out with people in handcuffs. That was a common site all across the Miami Valley last week.

Federal authorities said a total of 107 people were arrested, while 174 active warrants were cleared.

U.S. marshals who work in the Dayton area teamed up with dozens of surrounding cities and counties to capture fugitives.

Authorities targeted sex offenders and gang members during the operation. They took into custody anyone they considered to be a most wanted suspect by local police agencies.

This was the third year in a row that all of the agencies joined forces.

120 Fugitives Rounded Up In Region (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 3, 2006

One hundred twenty fugitives were rounded up in Western Pennsylvania during the past week during a nationwide dragnet for sex offenders, gang members and others.

State, local and federal officials announced today in Pittsburgh that 350 officers and federal marshals took part in the roundup in 14 counties.

Of the 140 arrests in the region, 120 were wanted on felony warrants, including 12 sex offenders such as Megan's Law violators.

A gang member from New Jersey wanted for homicide was also snared.

Nationwide, nearly 11,000 were apprehended in what the Justice Department called an effort against the "worst of the worst."

Among those arrested was Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0090859

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala.

Fugitives Flagged Here (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 3, 2006

William Knight had been arrested in December 2000 on charges of sexual assault, corruption of minors and indecent exposure.

His trial was supposed to start in March 2002, but Knight, 24, skipped the proceeding.

Last month, the law caught up with him when he was arrested at a home on Melville Street near Walnut.

He was one of 194 local fugitives snared in Operation Falcon III, a nationwide roundup of fugitives from Oct. 22-28 coordinated by the U.S. Marshals Service.

In addition to the fugitives arrested in the Philadelphia region, marshals also announced yesterday that 55 other cases had been closed. Philadelphia figured in more than 80 percent of all fugitives apprehended and cases closed in the region.

Among those apprehended were 101 sex offenders, 73 of whom were not registered with the appropriate authorities.

U.S. Marshal Gary Shovlin said 80 drug cases and two homicides in the region also were closed.

Overall, the number of unregistered sex offenders rounded up here represented the second-highest total in the country, he said.

In addition to Philadelphia, fugitive roundups occurred in Allentown, Reading and Lancaster.

Authorities said communities were safer as a result of Operation Falcon III.

"Taking these people off the street has made our city safer for children and some of our most vulnerable citizens," said James Carpenter, assistant chief of the Family Violence and Sexual Assault unit of the Philadelphia district attorney's office.

The roundup was a continuation of "Operation Falcon," which began last year. That nationwide effort targeted mainly violent fugitives.

This year, the marshals did two roundups, one in the western states in June and the other last month in the 49 judicial districts east of the Mississippi River, targeting sex offenders and gang members.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said yesterday the latest roundup resulted in the arrests nationwide of 10,733 fugitives, 1,600 sex offenders, most unregistered, and 360 gang members.

Nobody was hurt during the roundup here, he said.

The task force typically has 10-12 officers on the streets every day looking for fugitives.

Authorities said the fugitive roundup here also netted 1,775 grams of pot, an ounce of cocaine, 119 ecstasy pills, three assault rifles, six semiautomatic handguns and $42,000 in cash.

Sweep Rounds Up Crime Suspects In Area (PAPN)

By Carrie Cassidy, Of The Patriot-news

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), November 3, 2006

Eastern U.S. operation focused on sex offenses

While children were slipping into Halloween costumes last week, convicted sex offender John R. Spangler was trying to find out various municipalities' trick-or-treat times, authorities said.

When the West Hanover Twp. man walked into a television news station asking about trick-or-treat times, it aroused the suspicion of some employees, who wrote down his vehicle's license plate number and called police.

Spangler, 75, turned out to be wanted for failure to register with police as required by Megan's Law, authorities said -- and he was one of 10,773 fugitives arrested in what federal authorities dubbed a "historic" multistate sweep of criminals on the run.

Operation Falcon III involved 3,000 federal, state and local authorities. Among people rounded up in the weeklong sting were 1,659 sex offenders, 364 alleged gang members and thousands of others wanted on burglary, carjacking, kidnapping, robbery and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

In the U.S. Middle District, which covers the midstate, the arrests included 13 suspected sex offenders, three alleged gang members and dozens of people wanted on drug, assault and other charges.

The roundup in Pennsylvania and 23 other states east of the Mississippi River targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said yesterday at a Washington news conference. "America's neighborhoods are safer today thanks to Operation Falcon III."

Operations Falcon I and II were held in April in other parts of the country during the past two years. This year's operation focused on child molesters, said Michael Regan, marshal for the Middle District.

DOJ_NMG_0090860

Regan said it comes on the heels of the 2006 Adam Walsh Act, which was approved by U.S. Congress this summer. The law created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail to register with communities. It was named for Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981 when he was 6.

While sex-offender suspects were the main focus, Dauphin County Sheriff Deputy Kevin Martin said they took a few other bad guys off the streets, including some they weren't looking for.

While searching for a man wanted for robbery, officers found a member of the Latin Kings gang, Angel Morales, 32, Martin said.

Martin said Morales was found in a Market Street boarding house with 42 bundles of suspected heroin marked "Bee Happy," along with scales, a rifle, a pistol and an ounce of cocaine.

Getting criminals off the streets is the reason he volunteered for the operation, Martin said.

"I like the work. It's interesting. It takes you all over the place," Martin said. "But the best part is getting these guys off the streets, keeping our communities safe."

The Associated Press contributed to this report. CARRIE CASSIDY: 255-8244 or ccassidy@patriot-news.com

Hundreds Of Fugitives Rounded Up In R.I., Mass. (WJAR)

WJAR-TV, NBC 10, Providence, RI, November 3, 2006

Marshals Service Announces Results Of Sting Operation

PROVIDENCE -- Nearly 11,000 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives were swept up in what the U.S. Justice Department on Thursday called a sting targeting the "worst of the worst" criminals on the run.

NBC 10's Larry Estepa reported that last week's roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, resulted in the capture of 81 fugitives in Rhode Island, including arrests in a first-degree sexual assault case and a sealed indictment in a murder case.

In Massachusetts, agents made 433 arrests, which included 67 sex offenders.

The weeklong sting in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, code-named Operation Falcon III, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said.

Falcon stands for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally. Officials said cooperation, not competition, among law enforcement agencies made it work.

"It's been extremely successful. They've arrested thousands of people and brought them to justice. It's had a huge impact because we knock down the barriers of turf wars and jurisdiction," Col. Steven Pare of the Rhode Island State Police said.

Two earlier stings -- Falcons I and II -- were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall, before the winter weather hit.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,733 fugitives -- including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives -- even at their homes in the early-morning hours -- proved to be a hit-or-miss mission for the federal, state and local authorities.

A six-hour sting in Washington, D.C., last Thursday morning, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents from the U.S. Marshals, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State Department and the city's Metropolitan Police Department.

"He was there a week or so ago," muttered Marshals Inspector Robert Hoffmaster, after a pre-daybreak search of a house for an accused drug dealer.

In upstate New York, some fugitives tried to hide in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets that a person shouldn't be able to fit in, but they end up fitting in and we have had to call the fire department to get them out."

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law -- what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress last summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail register with communities.

The law was named for six-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

DOJ_NMG_0090861

Falcon III showed the Marshals "have proven their extraordinary ability to quickly capture thousands of sexual predators," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Normally, the Marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

Nationwide Sweep Nabs Nearly 400 SC Fugitives (WSPA)

WSPA-TV, News Channel 7, Spartanburg, SC, November 3, 2006

State and federal police announced Thursday that they've completed the largest roundup ever focused on violent sex offenders and gang members. It was called Operation FALCON III, and 10,773 fugitives were arrested nationwide.

FALCON is short for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally. This particular operation covered the eastern half of the country from October 22 through the 28th.

Here in South Carolina, marshals and local police arrested 392 wanted felons, including 51 sex offenders.

U.S. Attorney for South Carolina Reginald Lloyd says the streets are safer tonight because of the roundup. "They're not just bringing those individuals to justice. They are, in my opinion, absolutely preventing future crimes and future victims," he says.

Johnny Mack Brown, U.S. Marshal for South Carolina, says fugitives are dangerous already because they've already eluded police, but there's more. "I have found out that all these people who commit crimes and get out on bond or are fugitives, they don't quit just because they're a fugitive or they've got a warrant for them. They continue to do their trade, and that is sell drugs, buy guns, rob people and those kind of things," he says.

--971 Unregistered sex offenders arrested
--364 Documented gang members arrested
--140 Homicide warrants cleared
--3,609 Narcotics warrants cleared
--292 Firearms seized

The focus of this operation was on sex offenders after President Bush in July signed the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act. It makes it a federal felony, punishable by up to ten years in prison, for convicted sex offenders to fail to register and then travel in interstate or foreign commerce.

Mark Lunsford, who's daughter Jessica was kidnapped and murdered last year by a sex offender, says, "The message being sent to the sex offenders is, we've had enough. We're not taking no more from you. We're looking for you. We're turning the tables. Instead of you stalking our kids, we're stalking you. We're going to be a predator's worst nightmare instead of them being a parent's worst nightmare."

Operation FALCON Sweeps ET Snatching 284 Fugitives In Net (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 3, 2006

Mission has moments of drama, ironic twists

Sure, capturing those 284 fugitives was sweet, but rescuing a toddler?

For Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Ron Gibbs, it doesn't get much sweeter than that.

"His biological mother had abducted him and brought him to East Tennessee," Gibbs said of the 19-month-old child rescued during what was a secret nationwide hunt for fugitives unveiled Thursday.

Florida authorities had put out an alert for the child. Texas authorities got a tip that the child was in East Tennessee. The Smoky Mountains Federal Fugitive Task Force was asked to add the case to its Operation FALCON III list. On Oct. 24 - two days into the fugitive roundup - the task force agents found the child in Sneedville, Tenn.

The toddler's rescue was just one highlight of a fugitive hunt organized and led by the U.S. Marshals Service, involving cases in 25 states including Tennessee. Nationally, the six-day operation netted the arrest of 10,773 felony fugitives.

Locally, Gibbs said the task force, made up of deputy U.S. Marshals and local law enforcement partners, nabbed 284 fugitives in 41 counties in its East Tennessee district.

Operation FALCON, an acronym for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, involves a periodic sweep of the wanted by the U.S. Marshals Service in partnership with other federal, state and local law enforcement officers.

The Marshals Service itself has long been recognized as the nation's most elite fugitive hunting force.

Gibbs said that the recent fugitive sweep specifically targeted sex offenders who had failed to register with the appropriate authorities and came on the heels of the enactment of the Adam Walsh Child Protection Act.

DOJ_NMG_0090862

Named for the slain son of "America's Most Wanted" television program founder John Walsh, the law has several provisions designed to protect children. Chief among those provisions is a section that makes it a federal crime for a sex offender who travels from one state or country to another to fail to register as required by law.

The Marshals Service has been tasked with hunting down violators of the law, passed in July.

"We have been tasked as the agency to track down fugitives who have failed to register," Gibbs said. "I know our headquarters is working on getting more staffing to enforce the act and track down these fugitives."

Of the 284 fugitives nabbed by the Smoky Mountains task force during Operation FALCON III, 65 were sex offenders and 47 of those were specifically accused of failing to properly register.

The task force also nabbed fugitives wanted in violent crime cases ranging from assault to murder, drug suspects and gang members.

Tough offenders, tough arrests, to be sure, but not every hunt was serious. Just ask Deputy U.S. Marshal Richie Bradley, who recounted the nabbing of a fugitive at a Knoxville bowling alley.

As the task force walked in - decked out in full fugitive-finding gear - a bowling tournament was about to begin and the "Star Spangled Banner" was played.

The task force agents removed their hats, put their hands over their hearts and sang.

"Then we arrested the guy," Bradley said.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

163 Fugitives Here Caught In Operation Falcon (CHATT)

Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan, November 3, 2006

There were 163 fugitives in Chattanooga and Hamilton County caught in the nationwide "Operation Falcon" net, officials said at a Thursday afternoon press conference.

Those included Tommie "Wild Thing" Loyons, identified as a member of the Vice Lords gang, and Donald Yardley, sought for failing to register as a sex offender.

The campaign was mainly against sex offenders and gang members, but spread to include other wanted criminals, Federal Marshals Service Director John Clark said.

A number of local law enforcement agencies took part.

Lyons was wanted for firing at a car occupied by four people on Sept. 30. He was also wanted for failing to appear to answer a vandalism charge.

Yardley was convicted in Kansas in 1986 of sodomy against a child, communicating threats to a witness, and assault and battery.

A warrant for his arrest for failing to register as a sex offender was issued in early October.

Officials said, "The arrest of this sexual predator makes Chattanooga a safer place to live."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Marshals Service (USMS) Director John F. Clark said the operation nationwide led to the arrest of 1,659 sex offenders.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said, “I applaud the U.S. Marshals Service and all federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies that contributed to capturing these dangerous criminals. Sexual predators are an insidious threat to our nation’s children, and thanks to this historic effort thousands of them will be taken off the streets. Creating a national sex offender registry and focusing federal resources toward capturing sexual predators sends a clear message to these criminals that you can run but you can’t hide.”

Officials said Operation FALCON III produced the largest number of captured offenders ever in a single law enforcement effort. The operation was conducted in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, in the District of Columbia and in Puerto Rico and led to the arrests of 10,733 fugitives.

Deputy Marshals joined thousands of officers, deputies, troopers, agents and investigators from other federal, state and local agencies to conduct the operation which ran all last week.

Those targeted for arrest included fugitives wanted for committing sexual offenses, homicide, kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking, weapons offenses and major narcotics distribution.

The operation received support from the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, sponsored by Sen. Frist and named after the murdered son of “America’s Most Wanted” host John Walsh. The new law creates a national sex offender registry and directs federal resources to rounding up sexual predators, helping state and local governments catch convicted individuals who failed to register in communities where they live.

Of the 1,659 fugitive sex offenders apprehended, 971 were wanted on charges of failing to register as a sex offender. One such arrest took place on Oct. 24, 2006, when investigators arrested Allen Marksberry in Rickman, Tn. Marksberry was an unregistered sex offender, stemming from a 1996 conviction of sexual assault of a child who was under eight years old. Marksberry is now in custody facing additional charges.

DOJ_NMG_0090863

260-plus Nabbed In Shelby County (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, November 3, 2006

Police hit the jackpot when they chased Roderick Thomas into his house to arrest him for violating probation.

They found evidence of identity theft, vehicle ID fraud and counterfeit money. Elsewhere on the Barnes Court property in South Memphis they found a chop shop with stolen vehicles and parts. Thomas now faces charges of altering vehicle ID numbers, theft over $10,000, identity theft and forgery.

Thomas was one of more than 350 people arrested last week in West Tennessee on warrants in a nationwide sweep under the auspices of the U.S. Marshal Service called Operation Falcon III.

More than 260 came in Shelby County. In West Tennessee, more than 100 suspected sex offenders were arrested.

"Any time you can lock up 262 suspects -- sex offenders, gang members -- it's a good day," Memphis Police Director Larry Godwin said during a news conference Thursday.

"We always have room for one more," joked Shelby County Sheriff Mark Luttrell.

Nationally, 10,773 people were arrested, including 1,659 sex offenders and 364 documented gang members.

Included was Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested.

Of the sex offenders, 971 failed to register with authorities as required by law -- what U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

West Tennessee led the nation in arrests for sex offender registration violations: 103.

Six were arrested in Tipton County: Randy Johnson, 39, of Mason; Gary Blankenship, 47, of Covington; Ottway Burnett, 49, of Memphis; Robert Maclin, 26, and Chauncey Ruble, 28, both of Millington; and Elvis Warren, 33, of Brighton.

Arrested in Memphis on a 33-year-old homicide warrant from Milwaukee was Ray Curtis Hudson. Local authorities got a tip from Wisconsin that Hudson was here under an assumed name, and they found him at a house on Chelsea.

Police here were able to get a current picture of Hudson from the state of Tennessee. He had gotten a driver's license under the assumed name.

The fugitive team waited for Hudson to show up on Chelsea and arrested him, according to Memphis officer Chris Wages, who is assigned to the marshals' fugitive task force. Hudson sits in Shelby County Jail waiting to be extradited to Milwaukee.

"We saw him coming home," said Wages. "And he was surprised." The gray-haired Hudson is now in his 60s.

Another team was sorting paperwork in a gas station lot in Whitehaven when a citizen tipped them that suspicious men were sitting in a car next to an ATM, Deputy Marshal Brian Monson said.

The team found a sawed-off shotgun and a mask in their car, charging four people with possession of an illegal shotgun.

"This operation, along with our past Falcon efforts, provides a clear indication of what law enforcement agencies can accomplish when there is cooperation at all levels ... ," U.S. Marshal David Jolley said.

Sweep Nets 'worst Of The Worst' (HENSN)

By SHEILA BURKE And CLAY CAREY, Staff Writers

Hendersonville (TN) Star News, November 3, 2006

National effort leads to arrest of 862 fugitives in Midstate

RICKMAN, Tenn — Children's bicycles, balls and toys littered the yard of Allen Marksberry's home in this Overton County community.

Marksberry, 38, a convicted sex offender, was cited Thursday by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as one of the "worst of the worst" fugitives caught in a sweep that spanned 24 states and captured more than 10,000 wanted felons.

A neighbor said he saw Marksberry around children often.

"There's been half a dozen or more all during the week … pretty much all the time," said Jerry Peek, who lives in the house directly behind Marksberry.

Marksberry made national news when Gonzales used him as example of the most dangerous predators captured in the sweep last week, dubbed Operation Falcon III.

Agents in Middle Tennessee captured more fugitives than any other federal district, including two of the 15 most significant arrests nationwide — Marksberry and a Nashville gang member wanted for murder.

News of Marksberry's arrest swept through this town just south of Livingston, Tenn., and shocked those around him.

DOJ_NMG_0090864

"I had no idea there was a child sex offender this close," said Anna Randles, who has lived on Circle Lane since 1984. "I'd never expect anything like that to happen in this neighborhood."

Randles and her husband have teenage children.

Marksberry was baby-sitting three children, ages 3, 5 and 10, when law enforcement agents went to his 140 Circle Lane home on Oct. 24.

Police found pornographic videos and pictures in his home, along with two police scanners, narcotics, a .25-caliber semi-automatic pistol and scales used to weigh marijuana, law enforcement officials said.

They also found a pair of binoculars in a trailer behind the house that is less than a mile away from the Rickman School, a pre-kindergarten through 8th-grade school.

Just across the street from the home are a baseball field and an old playground, where neighbors said children play.

"This one case, this Marksberry case, was worth every bit of effort that we put into it," said Denny King, the U.S. Marshal for the Middle District of Tennessee, at a news conference at TBI headquarters Thursday.

King said he believes that agents rescued the three children with Marksberry.

"Did we get to them quick enough? I don't know."

The Tennessee Department of Children's Services took the children into custody. The mothers of two of the children arrived immediately after Marksberry was arrested.

Marksberry was charged with violation of probation, failure to appear in court and violation of the sex offender registry. He registered when he moved to Tennessee but stopped reporting his address and moved to different counties in the northern area of Middle Tennessee, the Marshals Service said.

He was one of 862 fugitives captured in the Middle District of Tennessee, more than any other federal judicial district involved and more than in the entire state of New York.

The large number of arrests was due to the sheer amount of manpower involved in the operation, King said in an interview. More than 90 Midstate law enforcement agencies and 500 officers were involved.

More than 300 of the officers were deputized as special U.S. Marshals so they could cross jurisdiction lines.

"I think without a doubt, it was the largest delegation that's ever been put together in recent history," King said.

Police agencies from all over the district sent officers, he said. Metro sent twice as many officers as were used on the last fugitive sweep.

One of the fugitives caught was Eric Dewayne Meneese, wanted in an Oct. 10 slaying police say was a botched robbery involving two gang members. Meneese, 18, is a member of the "Crips" gang and has a long criminal record in Nashville, police said.

He was arrested Oct. 26 after three Falcon III teams working with the Metro SWAT team converged on three Nashville addresses at night. They found him hiding in the attic of his sister's Hermitage home.

Another Nashville man, Eric Turner, was wanted on an outstanding charge of rape of a child. He was taken into custody on Oct. 23 and is being held in the Metro Jail.

There were 332 fugitives from Davidson County arrested, though some may have been captured in another county, the Marshals Service said.

Arrests like that in Nashville didn't surprise some residents of Rickman, but they never dreamed that a man with Marksberry's past would be living in their rural area.

"It scares me, the fact that someone that close could attack kids like that," said Teresa Clark, a mother of four children, ages 4 to 7, at the Rickman School.

"That's something like you would hear in Nashville or Knoxville, not in our small town." ·

Fugitives Seized (JCP)

By Kristen Swing, Press Staff Writer

Johnson City (TN) Press, November 3, 2006

Massive effort on national, state, local levels brings arrests of sex offenders, gang members

Nearly 11,000 wanted felons were put behind bars recently in what is being called the single largest roundup of fugitive sex offenders and gang members in the nation's history.

Operation FALCON III, headed up by the U.S. Marshals Service, was a weeklong collaborative effort between the Marshals Service and more than 1,000 different law enforcement agencies. The effort took place between Oct. 22 and 28 and culminated with the arrest of 10,773 felons, according to USMS officials.

DOJ_NMG_0090865

"Our primary target in this effort was sex predators, unregistered sex offenders and wanted gang members," said W. Warren Mays Jr., supervisory deputy U.S. Marshal in East Tennessee. "I think the statistics speak for themselves as far as the success of Operation Falcon III."

In East Tennessee, 284 fugitive felons were arrested. Of those, 65 were sex offenders and seven were documented gang members. Along the way, authorities also arrested fugitives wanted on local, state or federal arrest warrants for murder, kidnapping and other serious offenses.

In Washington County alone, 20 fugitives were taken into custody during the operation. Those arrested throughout Washington County were wanted on warrants for a number of crimes including aggravated sexual battery, a parole violation for first-degree murder, aggravated robbery, arson and schedule II narcotics offenses.

"The resources that the federal government gives us with this kind of thing and us being able to partner up with other law enforcement agencies in our area, definitely is a good thing for us," said Washington County Sheriff's Office Chief Deputy Patrick Littleton. "Without their resources, it would take much longer to get these guys."

Operation FALCON III comes on the heels of the Adam Walsh Child Protection Safety Act, which was signed into law in late July. The act makes it a federal felony, punishable by up to 10 years imprisonment, for convicted sex offenders who fail to register and then travel in interstate or foreign commerce. The Marshals Services was designated by the act as the agency to lead the national effort to track down and arrest these fugitives.

"There is no question the collective criminal investigative resources of the marshals and our federal, state and local partners made a major contribution to this important crime initiative," said Arthur D. Roderick, Marshals Service assistant director for investigative services.

Nearly 1,700 sex offenders were arrested within the 25 Eastern states participating in Operation Falcon III, along with 364 documented gang members and several other wanted felons.

"These numbers mean safer streets for the citizens of communities all over this country," Marshals Service Director John Clark said. "We have not only brought those wanted fugitives to justice, but we have hopefully brought a bit of peace to their communities."

Authorities at a news conference held Thursday at the James H. Quillen U.S. Courthouse in Greeneville noted that the cooperative effort among law enforcement agencies is what made the operation a success.

"We had eight different police departments, 18 sheriff's departments, five state agencies and six federal agencies participating (in East Tennessee)," Mays said. "It is necessary for partnership and cooperation in 21st century law enforcement. Without it, this bird would have never flown."

For more information regarding the accomplishments of Operation Falcon III or to see which law enforcement agencies were involved in the effort, visit www.usmarshals.gov/falcon3/.

Law Enforcement Pools Resources To Round Up Fugitives (DICKSH)

By Teri Burton, The Dickson Herald

Dickson (TN) Herald, November 3, 2006

Operation nets 29 wanted in Dickson County

More than two dozen Dickson County fugitives from justice were among the nearly 11,000 suspects captured during last month's Operation FALCON III.

The U.S. Marshals Service went after people wanted on warrants ranging from theft to failure to register as a sex offender to statutory rape and gang-related crimes.

Results of the roundup were kept under wraps until yesterday when federal officials announced in Washington, D.C. that 10,733 fugitives were arrested during the FALCON III sweep across 24 states and 49 federal districts east of the Mississippi River simultaneously Oct. 22 through Oct. 28.

FALCON, an acronym for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally, was the third in a series of roundups across the nation since 2005.

Twenty-nine Dickson County fugitives were captured during the roundup as nine teams swept Dickson and surrounding counties during the weeklong operation, according to federal officials.

The effort involved more than 500 law enforcement personnel from 99 agencies, including the Dickson County Sheriff's Office and the Dickson Police Department.

"It was the most successful operation that I've ever been a part of in arresting fugitives in my entire 33-plus years of service," U.S. Marshal Denny King said yesterday.

Tommy Thompson, chief deputy marshal for Middle Tennessee, said during the sweep that the cooperation between federal, state and local law enforcement agencies was key to the success of the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0090866

"Most of the (Dickson County) fugitives were arrested in other counties," Thompson said. "We had very good cooperation. Each unit was composed of people from several different agencies and they jelled together, went out and did a great job.

"The sheriff (Dickson County Sheriff Tom Wall) was very accommodating and made it easy for the officers when they took them (fugitives) in to be processed so our guys and ladies could get back out and look for somebody else," Thompson said. "We just appreciate the effort of the Dickson Police Department and all the law enforcement agencies. They have given us officers and we were out serving each others' warrants, not worrying about who gets the credit or the fact that a Dickson County officer is serving a Montgomery County warrant. The object was to make these people come to justice."

Wall said he thought FALCON III was very effective because of the combined forces.

"The marshal's task force has been one of the best bargains I've seen since the 25 years I've been in law enforcement," the sheriff said. "It's a good thing to see all of the local, state and federal agencies working together to get these people off the streets. Together, you can do a lot versus everybody trying to do their own thing. It's really good to see that kind of cooperation."

Dickson Public Safety Director Rick Chandler, who serves both as police chief and fire chief, said the Dickson police officers assigned to the operation "found it enjoyable and it gave them a little different perspective on things."

Chandler said that by combining forces more fugitives were brought in and booked.

"I think the advantage of something like that is that you've got a lot of resources in from different areas and you can actually do some things," Chandler said. "It's difficult sometimes to track people down with all the other stuff going on. When you put a task force together like that you can center on some of the people and take some time and effort to locate them."

The previous FALCON operations, conducted in April 2005 and in April of this year resulted in the capture of more than 19,000 dangerous fugitives in less than two full weeks, according to information provided by the United States Marshals Service.

The U.S. Marshals Service has designated the FALCON series as the single most successful fugitive interdiction effort in U.S. law enforcement history.

Hundreds Of Local Fugitives Arrested In Round-up Led By U.S. Marshals (WATE)

By Erica Estep

WATE-TV, ABC 6, Knoxville, TN, November 3, 2006

KNOXVILLE (WATE) -- Hundreds of violent criminals are off East Tennessee streets and in jail thanks to a massive federal round-up.

During Operation Falcon III, U.S. Marshals, state and local police arrested more than 10,000 fugitives nationwide. Nearly 300 were arrested in East Tennessee.

During the last week of October, local and state police were sworn in as U.S. Marshals for the operation. That means they could legally cross county, city and state lines to arrest fugitives, just like federal officers can.

Officers concentrated on 41 counties in East Tennessee, arresting fugitives in Knox, Anderson, Blount, Sevier, Cocke, Claiborne and Hamblen counties, just to name a few.

Thursday, U.S. marshals released details of the operation, saying it was a huge success in East Tennessee with 284 criminals arrested.

This fugitive sweep concentrated on sex offenders and gang members, but murderers, thieves and arsonists were also taken off the streets during the round up.

It was a seven-day, around-the-clock operation," Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Ron Gibbs explains. "It's something you just cannot keep up day in and day out. But for a week's focus, I'm very proud of everyone. There were not any incidences in our arrests. Everyone stayed safe, including those who were arrested and we're very proud of that."

6 News got exclusive behind the scenes access during Operation Falcon III. We spent about 12 hours with U.S. Marshals, TBI agents and local law enforcement officers rounding up sex offenders and violent criminals.

We expected a lot of running, doors broken down and criminals fighting. But that's not what we found. Before sunrise, officers tested tasers, checked weapons and suited up in bullet proof vests.

They are prepared to fight if necessary, but admit they spend most of their time planning and investigating. That includes studying mug shots, tracking down addresses and making contacts before ever hitting the streets.

The first stop of the day is the home of a convicted drug dealer in Knoxville. Officers surrounded the home with their guns drawn.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Becky Gambill knocked on the door, "Police, police, open the door!" The door opened, police went in and minutes later, Sherise Sloan was brought out in handcuffs. Marshals say she sold drugs in a school zone.

Gambill adds, "She didn't put up a fight, was very cooperative, admitted that's who she was and it went on without a hitch."

Between each arrest, the marshals meet briefly to talk about their next target and plan the take down.

DOJ_NMG_0090867

It's the element of surprise that works in their favor. One Knoxville man wanted for a seven-year-old aggravated burglary charge never expected U.S. Marshals at his door.

The biggest catch of the day was a convicted sex offender from North Carolina hiding out in Morristown. Officers say Wilton Bethel violated a child. Now he's back behind bars for not registering as a sex offender.

Nationwide, agents hauled in 10,773 fugitives. Of those caught in East Tennessee, 65 are sex offenders.

862 Fugitives Captured In Middle Tennessee (WSMV)

WSMV-TV, NBC 4, Nashville, TN, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Nearly 11,000 sex offenders, gang members and other fugitives were swept up in what the Justice Department on Thursday called a sting targeting the "worst of the worst" criminals on the run.

Across Tennessee, 1,372 fugitives were arrested and 1,686 warrants were cleared. 862 fugitives were taken into custody in middle Tennessee alone.

Tennessee led the country for capturing the most fugitives as part of this nationwide effort to crack down on accused criminals hiding from police.

Last week's roundup, led by the U.S. Marshals Service, included Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several young children when he was arrested on Oct. 24.

Including in the roundup was 36 sex offenders who are accused of failing to register.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The weeklong sting, code-named Operation Falcon III, also led to the shooting death of a Georgia fugitive who was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, officials said. Additionally, the neighbor of a fugitive in Florida fired -- but missed -- police approaching her home. Both incidents are under investigation, said John F. Clark, director of the Marshals Service.

The 32 counties of Tennessee's middle district, where Marksberry and Meneese were captured, saw more arrests and warrants cleared than any other district in the 24 states east of Mississippi River where the roundup took place, authorities said.

U.S. Marshal Denny King said at a Nashville news conference that the arrest of sex offender Marksberry alone was worth "every bit of effort" the operation required.

"We rescued three kids. ... How many other kids did we save from Marksberry?" King said.

Marksberry was convicted in 1996 of sexually assaulting an 8-year-old child. When he was arrested this time, agents found pornography and drugs inside his home and were led to a separate trailer that had a clear view of a playground and a pair of binoculars inside.

Over 500 officers from 90 law enforcement agencies in the district participated in the middle Tennessee sting, which King said was the largest operation he had ever heard of in his 34 years in law enforcement.

The roundup targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Albert Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said.

Two earlier stings -- Falcons I and II -- were held in April over the last two years. Gonzales and Clark denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

"I can assure you that the coordination of getting 3,000-plus officers and agents, and everybody together to do this, just takes a lot of coordination," Clark said, adding that he wanted to do the roundup in the fall -- before the winter weather hit.

In all, Gonzales said officials caught 10,733 fugitives -- including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Those totals represent a fraction of doors knocked on, liquor store drive-bys, construction site surveillances and tips chased down by agents during the weeklong sweep. Finding the fugitives -- even at their homes in the early-morning hours -- proved to be a hit-or-miss mission for the federal, state and local authorities.

A six-hour sting in Washington, D.C., last Thursday morning, for example, netted none of the accused drug dealers sought by a team of seven agents from the U.S. Marshals, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State Department and the city's Metropolitan Police Department.

"He was there a week or so ago," muttered Marshals Inspector Robert Hoffmaster, after a pre-daybreak search of a house for an accused drug dealer.

In upstate New York, some fugitives tried to hide in unusual places.

"We grabbed one guy out of the shower," said Joe Ciccarelli, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals fugitive task force in New York's northern district. "We found people hiding in between insulation, rolled up in rugs, inside of cabinets, inside of closets that a person shouldn't be able to fit in, but they end up fitting in and we have had to call the fire department to get them out."

DOJ_NMG_0090868

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law -- what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Gonzales said prosecutors likely would seek to charge some of them under the 2006 Adam Walsh Act. That law, approved by Congress last summer, created federal penalties for sex offenders who fail register with communities.

The law was named for six-year-old Adam Walsh, who was abducted from a Florida shopping mall and murdered in 1981.

Falcon III showed the Marshals "have proven their extraordinary ability to quickly capture thousands of sexual predators," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Normally, the Marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

'Operation FALCON III' Takes Down Local Sex Offenders (WMC)

WMC-TV, Action News 5, Memphis, TN, November 3, 2006

More than 10,000 fugitives found themselves in custody Thursday after a nationwide round-up code-named 'Operation FALCON III.' Many of the suspects were from the Mid-South.

Action News 5 went along for some of the local arrests, as teams led by U.S. Marshals swept the streets of Memphis. Arrests were made for a wide variety of crimes, but nowhere else were there as many convicted sex offenders wanted for not being registered: The Western District of Tennessee ranked number one.

"We were very, very aggressive here in West Tennessee of going out and getting these guys," said U.S. Marshal David Jolley at a press conference Thursday.

Many of the sex offenders arrested were supposed to check in with local authorities on a regular basis, but didn't.

"The public needs to always be sensitive to the fact that this problem exists," said Shelby County Sheriff Mark Luttrell. "That we do have sex offenders that are out there."

Luttrell has a full-time officer assigned to sex offenders, and said there is always a red flag when one fails to register. Deputy Marshals who participated in this latest sweep said they got a sense of satisfaction by taking potential child predators off the streets.

"I'm a father of three myself, so it's kind of close and dear to my heart as well," said Shelby County Sheriff's Deputy Chris Crozier.

Most of the sex offenders that were arrested will be in more trouble if they fail to check-in again. Officials said they hope Operation Falcon taught them a lesson.

In addition to unregistered sex offenders, a number of people wanted on murder charges were also arrested locally.

Nationwide, the 'Operation FALCON III' round-up encompassed 24 states, mostly in the eastern United States. 10,773 fugitives were arrested during the six day sting, and more than 13,000 warrants were cleared. Most of the fugitives were wanted for sexual offenses.

Roundup Captures 11,000 Fugitives (RUTHER)

By Alan J. Keays, Herald Staff

Rutland (VT) Herald, November 3, 2006

A weeklong fugitive sweep of the eastern and central United States has led to almost 11,000 wanted criminals taken into custody, including 83 from Vermont and eight from Rutland County.

In Vermont, the roundup was led by the U.S. Marshals Service and included several local and law enforcement agencies around the state. The sting was codenamed "Operation FALCON III."

National figures on fugitives captured were released Thursday in Washington, D.C, while the numbers from the Vermont operation were announced at a press conference in Burlington attended by federal, state and local law enforcement officials.

"When we share information and pool our resources toward a common goal, the results are safer communities for our children and a more secure homeland," Vermont U.S. Marshal John Edwards said in a written statement released Thursday.

In total, the operation in Vermont led to the capture of 83 people and cleared 110 arrest warrants for various offenses, ranging from failing to register as a sex offender to drug offenses, Bill Gerke of the U.S. Marshals Service in Vermont said after the press conference.

Several teams of local, state and federal law enforcement officials worked each day in different parts of the state searching for fugitives. An average of 32 officers worked daily during the weeklong operation that ran from Oct. 22 to 28.

In Vermont, there are 8,400 outstanding arrest warrants. Prior to the sweep, Vermont officials worked to prioritize the list down to 300 of the most wanted individuals, and of those, 83 were located, Gerke said. In addition, authorities discovered that six of the wanted people in Vermont have died.

DOJ_NMG_0090869

Gerke said the top priority of the warrant roundup in Vermont involved sex offenders and sex registry violators.

Twenty-eight sex offenders were captured in the roundup in Vermont, including 22 sex registry violators. Eighteen people were taken into custody wanted on assault charges, 15 wanted for drug offenses, two for burglary and one for robbery.

"There was a very active effort in the southern part of the state," Gerke said of the warrant sweep.

In Rutland County, authorities last week rounded up eight fugitives, including four wanted for failing to properly register as sex offender, Rutland City Police Sgt. Kevin Stevens said Thursday.

City police as well as the Rutland County Sheriff's Department, Vermont State Police and federal authorities took part in the operation in Rutland County.

"Too bad we couldn't do it more, but with budgets, we just don't have the resources," Stevens said of the fugitive roundup.

In Washington D.C., authorities highlighted the arrest of Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was babysitting several young children when he was arrested on Oct. 24.

Also nabbed were Demetrius Avery Jackson, an accused cop killer in Birmingham, Ala., and Eric Dewayne Meneese, a Crips gang member, in Nashville, Tenn.

The roundup, in 24 states east of the Mississippi River, targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Albert Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

Two earlier stings — Falcons I and II — were held in April during the last two years.

In the latest operation, Gonzales said officials caught 10,733 fugitives — including 1,659 sex offenders, 364 gang members and thousands of others sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking and weapons charges. More than 230 weapons were seized.

Of the sex offenders nabbed, 971 had failed to register with authorities as required by law — what Gonzales called the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

Normally, the Marshals regional task forces round up about 1,000 fugitives each week, officials said. An estimated 1 million fugitives are on the loose nationwide.

Sweep Nabs 59 Fugitives Locally (RTD)

By Tom Campbell, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 3, 2006

Arrests, from Petersburg to Henrico, are part of annual Justice Department effort

Freedom ended suddenly for 59 fugitives in the Richmond area during seven days in October as U.S. marshals led a law-enforcement sweep of alleged criminals from the streets.

The Henrico-to-Petersburg arrests were just a few of nearly 11,000 captures of suspects during Operation Falcon III, a weeklong Justice Department effort that concentrated on arresting documented gang members and convicted sex offenders in 24 states east of the Mississippi River.

"These numbers mean safer streets for the citizens of communities all over this country," said John F. Clark, director of the U.S. Marshals Service.

This was the third annual Operation Falcon and involved more than 3,000 officers and agents.

This year's Operation Falcon follows up on the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, signed by President Bush in July. The new law makes it a felony, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, for sex offenders to fail to register and then travel out of state or outside the U.S.

Stings and coordinated arrest operations picked up 10,773 fugitives on outstanding warrants. Of those, 1,659 were sex offenders -- many wanted for alleged failure to register -- and 364 were documented gang members.

One Georgia fugitive was killed by authorities as he came out of his house, The Associated Press reported.

Kevin Connolly, the U.S. marshal who leads the Regional Fugitive Task Force here, said no fugitive arrested in Richmond during Operation Falcon III resisted physically -- officers got "just some nasty attitude from some of them," he said.

About two-thirds of the Operation Falcon arrests here were of men, Connolly said.

Three teams of 10 marshals, agents and officers worked each of the seven days, starting with some early-morning pounding on doors at the homes of fugitives thought likely to be there and proceeding with arrests at workplaces and other locations.

Connolly said Operation Falcon was preceded here by weeks of research and investigation to determine which defendants would be on the list for arrest and "to come up with the best address to hit at 5 or 6 in the morning."

The 59 people were arrested on 82 outstanding warrants, nearly all of them issued by state courts, Connolly said. The alleged crimes include one murder, four attempted murders, two armed robberies and four assaults or aggravated assaults.

DOJ_NMG_0090870

Besides the marshals service, the criminal investigators who took part came from three other federal agencies; the Virginia State Police; the Virginia Department of Corrections; the Richmond Police Department, sheriff's office and Redevelopment and Housing Authority; and from the Henrico County, Chesterfield County and Petersburg police forces.

Connolly said one of those arrested here was Wayne Jerome Thomas, 36.

On the second day of Operation Falcon III, Richmond police charged Thomas with abducting and raping a 17-year-old female the previous day. Operation Falcon team members located Thomas working on a city trash truck and took him into custody.

Contact staff writer Tom Campbell at tcampbell@timesdispatch.com or (804) 649-6416.

227 Felony Suspects Rounded Up In Hampton Roads (V-P)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Norfolk Virginian-Pilot, November 3, 2006

NORFOLK - Police and federal agents in Hampton Roads arrested 227 felony suspects as part of a nationwide operation called Falcon III that targeted sex offenders and gang members, the U.S. Marshals Service announced Thursday.

Among those arrested was Robert Shells, suspected of raping and sodomizing a 4-year-old girl in Norfolk. He was picked up in New York and will be extradited to face charges here.

Thousands of federal, state and local law enforcement officials in 24 states east of the Mississippi spent last week rounding up 10,773 fugitives, including the 227 arrested in Hampton Roads.

Those arrested here include 16 sex-offense suspects, 11 unregistered sex offenders and five gang members, the marshals service said.

This is the third Falcon operation in two years. Authorities captured more than 19,000 fugitives in previous round-ups.

Law Enforcement Sting Nabs Dozens Of Dangerous Fugitives (WWBT)

WWBT-TV, NBC 12, Richmond, VA, November 3, 2006

Federal, state and local law enforcement are working together to nab dangerous fugitives. The week long sting, called Operation Falcon, covered 24 states including Virginia. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the operation targeted the "worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country."

Among those caught were more than 1,600 sex offenders, including nearly 1,000 who failed to register with authorities as required by law.

"Arresting over 1,600 sex offenders and 360 gang members has to make a difference and sends a strong message that we will bring them to justice," says John Clark, Director of the U.S. Marshal Service.

Among the thousands arrested were dozens of wanted fugitives right here in the Richmond area.

Between Richmond, Petersburg, Henrico and Chesterfield, a total of 59 wanted people were arrested on some 82 outstanding warrants. Of the 59 arrested, U.S. Marshals say two are documented gang members and 17 others were wanted on sex-related offenses.

Up and down the east coast between October 22nd and 28th, hand cuffs being tightened onto the wrists of wanted fugitives.

“The investigators did the research and obtained the photos, so that when we hit that first door at five in the morning we had the best odds of catching that fugitive there,” says Kevin Connolly of the U.S. Marshal Service. Inspector Connolly is one of 30 law enforcement officers who formed a team that spent the week working 10-14 hour-days in our area.

The entire team of federal, state, and local officers was deputized by the U.S. Marshal Service for the operation. The goal, Connolly says, was to help Richmond-area police go after wanted suspects -- especially sex offenders. "For this operation, we sat down and targeted their worst sex offenders and went after them and picked them up one-by-one."

Among those arrested in our area was Wayne Jerome Thomas, 36. He was picked up while working on the back of a Richmond city garbage truck. U.S. Marshals say Thomas is a convicted sex offender who not only failed to register with the sex offender registry when he got out of prison, but he's now facing new charges of raping and abducting a 17-year-old girl.

At a home in Chesterfield, the team says it picked up items, including a sawed off shotgun, when marshals say they arrested Esteban Pittman. Marshals say Pittman is a gang member who belongs to part of the national MS-13 gang.

Tonight, the U.S. Marshal Service is hoping the results of this operation will send a message -- especially to sex offenders who are not registered with law enforcement.

'Operation FALCON III' Nets 227 Felony Arrests Locally (WVEC)

WVEC-TV, ABC 13, Hampton Roads, VA, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090871

A nationwide round-up fugitives has resulted in the nets hundreds of local fugitivesroundup of fugitives has resulted in the arrest of thousands of people wanted by the law.

Operation FALCON III helped round up over 200 fugitives in Hampton Roads.

In Hampton Roads, what is being called "Operation FALCON III" netted 227 felony arrests, including 5 gang members, 11 unregistered sex offenders, and 16 who were wanted on sex charges.

The roundup also resulted in the seizure of four handguns and 40 capsules of heroin, according to the United States Marshals Service.

Authorities say federal and local authorities teamed up on the operation, which was the largest ever fugitive round-up of its kind. FALCON stands for Federal And Local Cops Organized Nationally.

Nationwide, task force members arrested 10,773 felony fugitives, including 1,659 sex offenders and 364 gang members.

National Fugitive Sweep Includes Many Local Arrests (HHD)

By Curtis Johnson, The Herald-Dispatch

Huntington (WV) Herald-Dispatch, November 3, 2006

CHARLESTON — A one-week focus on nabbing fugitives cleared more than 200 warrants across Southern West Virginia, part of a nationwide sweep that brought in nearly 11,000 fugitives.

At least 77 of the area warrants were cleared from the books in Cabell and Wayne Counties, as authorities spent most of last week looking for sex offenders, drug traffickers and other fugitives.

Brad Sellers, a supervisory deputy working locally for the U.S. Marshals Service, explained most cases were cleared by way of police making an arrest or locating the fugitive at another correctional facility.

The local activity was part of the much larger, nationwide effort dubbed "Operation Falcon III". The roundup was organized by the U.S. Marshals Service, but enlisted help from other federal, state and local agencies. Federal authorities touted the clearing more than 13,000 warrants nationwide.

About 170 of those arrests were made in Cabell, Wayne, Kanawha, Fayette and Raleigh Counties, but authorities did not provide a list of those arrested on Thursday.

"It's my opinion that everyone that is a fugitive may not be actively avoiding apprehension, but they are definitely not taking the initiative to turn themselves in," Sellers said. "The longer they stay out there and can avoid apprehension, the more brazen they become that they're not going to be arrested."

Sellers hopes a one-week effort such as "Operation Falcon III" will help local agencies allocate the resources needed to dedicate officers to hunting fugitives.

The roster of participating agencies included the Marshals Service, FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

On a state level, the West Virginia State Police and Department of Corrections participated.

Local participants included Cabell and Wayne County Sheriff's Departments, the Huntington and Milton Police Departments, along with the Marshall University Police Department.

345 Warrants Issued Across State (CHASGAZ)

By Dave Gustafson, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, November 3, 2006

Nationwide, more than 10,000 arrested

Law enforcement officers served 345 warrants, including 35 for sex offenses, across West Virginia as part of a recent national fugitive roundup headed by the U.S. Marshals Service.

In the state's Southern District, burglary or larceny, drugs and assault accounted for most of the 216 warrants served during the six-day operation in Kanawha, Fayette, Cabell, Raleigh and Wayne counties.

The warrants also included 22 for sex offenses, including 15 for failure to register as a sex offender.

- advertisement -

"The success of this operation could only have been accomplished through the determination and dedication of many federal, state and local officers that teamed up to make the communities of Southern West Virginia safe," U.S. Marshal James Dawson said.

The roundup was dubbed "Operation Falcon III," with Falcon standing for "Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally." Two earlier efforts — Falcons I and II — were held in April over the last two years.

Nationally, deputy U.S. marshals worked with local and state police in what is being called the biggest roundup of fugitive sex offenders and gang members ever.

DOJ_NMG_0090872

The roundup targeted "the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Washington news conference.

"America's neighborhoods are safer today, thanks to Operation Falcon III," Gonzales said. He denied that next week's elections played any part in scheduling the latest crackdown.

Among those captured in last week's roundup in 24 eastern states was Allen Marksberry, an unregistered sex offender in Rickman, Tenn., who was baby-sitting several children when arrested Oct. 24.

Across the country, 10,773 felony fugitives were arrested including 1,659 sex offenders and 364 documented gang members, according to a U.S. Marshals Service report.

Fugitive Task Force Teams Arrest 129 In West Virginia (WOWK)

WOWK-TV, CBS 13, Huntington, WV, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. - A seven-day nationally coordinated fugitive roundup led by the U.S. Marshals and hundreds of partners from state, local and other federal agencies has led to the arrests of almost 11,000 fugitives.

In West Virginia, Operation Falcon III, led to the arrest of 129 people.

With such a large operation the state was divided into two regions; north and south.

In the northern region the Bridgeport, Martinsburg and Morgantown Police Departments were among those taking part.

In the southern region the Charleston, Huntington and Beckely Police Departments joined a much larger group that included state agencies.

Among those arrested nationwide during Operation FALCON III were 1,659 fugitive sex offenders, the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement effort.

High-priority targets for arrest were fugitives wanted for committing sexual offenses, including unregistered convicted sex offenders.

Of the 1,659 fugitive sex offenders apprehended, 971 were wanted on charges of failing to register as a sex offender. Other priority targets were fugitive gang members and violent offenders wanted for homicide, kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking, weapons offenses and major narcotics distribution.

During FALCON III, agents apprehended 364 gang members, cleared 140 open homicide cases and arrested thousands of fugitives sought on kidnapping, robbery, burglary, carjacking, weapons offenses and other violent charges. Additionally, more than 230 weapons were also taken off the streets.

Sweep Nets 65 Area Fugitives (MARTJ)

By Edward Marshall, Journal Staff Writer

Martinsburg (WV) Journal, November 3, 2006

MARTINSBURG — A total of 65 wanted fugitives were arrested in the Eastern Panhandle during a weeklong, nationwide roundup headed by the U.S. Marshals Service with the help of local, state and federal law enforcement.

News conferences were held across the country Thursday to announce the success of Operation Falcon III, an acronym standing for "federal and local cops organized nationally."

Nationally, deputy U.S. marshals and their law enforcement partners arrested a total of 10,773 fugitives and cleared 13,333 felony warrants during the seven-day operation, including 3,609 for narcotics violations and 140 homicide warrants. Also arrested nationally were 1,659 fugitive sex offenders, 971 unregistered sex offenders and 364 documented gang members.

In the Eastern Panhandle, 65 people were arrested on outstanding warrants and 111 warrants were cleared, Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul T. Camilletti and Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Ulrich announced Thursday at a news conference at Martinsburg's U.S. District Court.

In the Northern District of West Virginia as a whole, 129 people were arrested, and 299 outstanding warrants were cleared, Camilletti said.

"Because of this effort, we have been very successful in apprehending our fugitives and getting them back into court and keeping the process going. We haven't had very many slip through the cracks. We've also been able with our task force to assist Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia in apprehending some of their fugitives," Camilletti said.

There are two ad hoc task forces currently, the Eastern Panhandle Fugitive Task Force and the Clarksburg Fugitive Task Force, operating in the district under the auspices of the U.S. Attorney and the U.S. Marshals Service.

"Our office has always supported the task force concept, and Operation Falcon III is an excellent example of how well task forces can work to benefit our communities," said Sharon L.Potter, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia, during a separate press conference Thursday. "By combining the resources and intelligence available to local, state and federal agencies, we greatly enhance our ability to apprehend fugitives. Successful task force approaches in the Northern District of West Virginia have included drug trafficking, cyber crimes, crimes against children and now Operation Falcon III."

DOJ_NMG_0090873

The Eastern Panhandle Fugitive Task Force consists of representatives from the Berkeley County Sheriff's Department, the Charles Town Police Department, Harpers Ferry Police Department, the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, the Martinsburg Police Department, the Ranson Police Department, the Shepherdstown Police Department, the West Virginia State Police, the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the U.S. Department of State's Diplomatic Security Service and the U.S. Marshals Service.

"This year since January here in the Eastern Panhandle ... we've made an additional 107 arrests and cleared 152 warrants. Now that's a combined effort federal, state and locally. ... It's the local task force, it's the local officers that are really doing this work," Camilletti said.

Among the 129 total arrests in the Northern District of West Virginia, two were wanted for sex offenses, eight were wanted for sexual assault, three were wanted for being unregistered sex offenders, 28 were arrested for assault, 27 were arrested for burglary or larceny, 28 were arrested for financial fraud, one was arrested for homicide, nine were arrested for narcotics, four were arrested for robbery, three were arrested for weapons violations and seven were wanted on other charges.

"This effort certainly couldn't have been accomplished without state and local agencies. They all worked together," Ulrich said.

The number of arrests during the operation highlighted the manpower burden currently faced by local law enforcement.

It's like trying to put a forest fire out with a garden hose, said Berkeley County Sheriff Randy Smith, who was also at the press conference.

Camilletti also noted how growth is affecting the area.

"Our population is growing, and along with those populations, what we've seen in the counties to the east of us will occur here or it's already occurring. Our local officials here are addressing that problem every day," Camilletti said.

The roundup was conducted in 24 states east of the Mississippi River as well as Washington, D.C., and Puerto Rico. Deputy Marshals teamed up with thousands of officers, deputies, troopers, agents and investigators from other federal, state and local agencies to conduct the operation.

The operation received a major boost from the Adam Walsh Act, named after the murdered son of America's Most Wanted host John Walsh. The law directs federal resources to tasks of rounding up sexual predators and helping state and local governments catch convicted individuals who failed to register in communities where they live.

"Operation Falcon has once again proven how much we can accomplish with our network of federal, state and local law enforcement," U.S. Attorney Roberto Gonzales said at another press conference in Washington. "This operation has made our nation's neighborhoods and children safer by taking off the streets some of the works sex offenders, violent felons and gang members."

— Staff writer Edward Marshall can be reached at 263-8931, ext. 215, or emarshall@journal-news.net. The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Leaks About Lawmakers Prompt Warnings (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 — Director Robert S. Mueller III of the F.B.I. has issued a stern message to the bureau's nearly 30,000 employees warning them against leaks of confidential information after recent news articles disclosed criminal inquiries involving incumbent lawmakers, mainly House Republicans.

"There have been a number of recent stories in the press attributing sensitive law enforcement information to 'federal law enforcement officials,' " Mr. Mueller said in an Oct. 26 e-mail message. "While I cannot say they have come from F.B.I. employees, such disclosures do serious damage to our investigations and risk unfairly tarnishing the subjects of our investigations who enjoy the presumption of innocence."

In similar election season warnings, senior Justice Department officials sent messages on Wednesday to prosecutors reminding them of departmental rules against leaks. One was sent by Alice S. Fisher, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's criminal division, to prosecutors in her unit. Another was issued by Michael A. Battle, director of the Justice Department office that coordinates with federal prosecutors throughout the country.

Mr. Mueller has tried, during his five-year tenure, to keep a tight lid on the Federal Bureau of Investigation's activities in advance of elections, and is said by some associates to have been "livid" at the recent disclosures. In some cases, the F.B.I. investigations have been made into campaign issues that have threatened the re-election prospects of incumbents.

DOJ_NMG_0090874

"He was angered by it because he understands how the leaks can damage investigations," said John Miller, the F.B.I.'s spokesman.

Aides said Mr. Mueller, a former United States attorney and longtime courtroom prosecutor known for his strict adherence to secrecy rules, had written the e-mail message to communicate his strong views on the topic, although F.B.I. officials deny that agents were sources for the articles. The contents of Mr. Mueller's message have not been previously reported.

Other administration officials said Mr. Mueller had initially contemplated sending an even sharper message after getting complaints from Justice Department officials about the unauthorized disclosures. They said the grousing seemed to have intensified as it appeared that control of the House could be decided by a handful of bruising contests in which accusations of ethical impropriety have become pivotal.

In a larger sense, the complaints underscore the tension inherent in Mr. Mueller's roles as the F.B.I. director. On counterterrorism issues, he is an important White House team player responsible for deterring threats. At the same time, he is the country's chief law enforcement official — managing public corruption investigations, including those that have centered on Republicans.

The sequence of events that irked Mr. Mueller began on Oct. 1 with the F.B.I.'s confirmation that the bureau had opened a preliminary inquiry into sexually explicit computer messages sent by Mark Foley, the Republican former representative from Florida, to under-age Congressional pages.

Some of the disclosures have thrown the F.B.I. off balance, among them an Oct. 14 report by McClatchy Newspapers that said federal agents had opened a criminal inquiry into whether Representative Curt Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, had obtained jobs and other favors for his daughter in exchange for helping overseas firms expand their business in the United States. On Oct. 16, F.B.I. agents raided six sites in Pennsylvania and Florida in the inquiry. Investigators were forced to conduct the searches much sooner than they had planned, fearing evidence might be destroyed after publication of the article, officials said.

Not all of the leaks involving incumbent lawmakers have been about Republicans. On Oct. 20, Time magazine reported on its Web site that Representative Jane Harman, Democrat of California, had been the subject of an investigation, which is no longer active, into her dealings with the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or Aipac, a pro-Israel lobbying group.

The inquiry examined whether she had improperly sought to assist Aipac in return for the group's help in trying to persuade Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, to appoint Ms. Harman to lead the Intelligence Committee if the Democrats win control of the House.

The latest leak came on Oct. 24, when news organizations reported that Representative Rick Renzi, Republican of Arizona, was under investigation by the United States attorney's office in Phoenix over land deals.

Coach Is Charged In Balco Case (NYT)

By Michael S. Schmidt

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

Trevor Graham, the track coach who trained several elite Olympic athletes who have been linked to performance-enhancing drugs, was indicted yesterday in the investigation he helped begin three years ago.

A federal grand jury in San Francisco returned a three-count indictment accusing Graham of making false statements to special agents in the investigation into performance-enhancing drugs and related money laundering. The charges arise from the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal, a sweeping investigation of sports doping.

The indictment alleged that Graham obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source and gave them to athletes he coached. It also said that Graham referred athletes to an unnamed source so they could obtain performance-enhancing drugs directly.

San Francisco Giants outfielder Barry Bonds, who holds the single-season home run record, remains under investigation by the same grand jury. Investigators are trying to determine if Bonds lied when he testified before an earlier grand jury that he had not knowingly used steroids and are also seeking to determine whether he paid taxes on cash sales of memorabilia.

Bonds's lawyer, Michael L. Rains, said by phone yesterday that the implications of Graham's indictment on Bonds in the continuing investigation are unclear.

Graham led prosecutors to begin the investigation into performance-enhancing drugs when he anonymously mailed a syringe to the United States Anti-Doping Agency in June 2003. When the contents of the syringe were analyzed, chemists found a previously undetectable steroid, "the clear."

Graham said he mailed the syringe because he wanted to clean up the sport, but witnesses brought before the grand jury have said that Graham did it in an effort to implicate athletes and coaches that his athletes competed against.

DOJ_NMG_0090875

Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California, said in a statement that Graham had lied to agents "who were pursuing the original source of the illegal performance-enhancing drugs taken by many of the athletes tied to Balco."

The United States attorney's office said that although Graham had spoken with investigators, he had not been granted immunity from prosecution for making false statements.

Graham was issued a summons to appear for arraignment on Nov. 16. If convicted, he could face 15 years in prison and $750,000 in fines.

Graham's lawyer, Joseph Zeszotarski, said in a statement that Graham looked forward to clearing his name in court.

"We are confident that when all of the evidence is revealed, not just the selected snippets leaked to the press, it will show the truth, and the truth is that Trevor has not made any false statement to the government," Zeszotarski said.

He said the allegations were even more troublesome because "it was Trevor who had the integrity and courage to turn in the sample that led to the Balco investigation in the first place."

Graham operates the North Carolina-based Sprint Capitol USA, a training center for elite track-and-field athletes. While several athletes trained by Graham have received suspensions for drug use, he has always denied direct knowledge or involvement.

One of Graham's top athletes was Justin Gatlin, who claimed a share of the world record in the 100-meter dash in April only to have it taken away after he tested positive for elevated levels of testosterone. Graham has also coached and trained the Olympic athletes Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and C. J. Hunter.

Jones failed a preliminary drug test but was cleared by a second sample, and she has maintained that she has not used performance-enhancing substances. Hunter tested positive for a steroid. Montgomery has been suspended from competition until June 2007 for using a steroid, and his world record in the 100 meters has been taken away.

In a lengthy statement to federal investigators in 2004, Graham denied providing any of his athletes with illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

In July, The New York Times reported that a man who worked with Graham told the grand jury and federal investigators that he was the main supplier of performance-enhancing drugs to Graham and many of his athletes, including Jones and Montgomery.

The Balco investigation has led to five convictions — of Balco's founder, Victor Conte Jr.; its former vice president, James Valente; Greg Anderson, Bonds's trainer; Patrick Arnold, a chemist; and Remi Korchemny, a track coach.

Graham Indicted In BALCO Scandal (LAT)

By Philip Hersh, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Track coach who turned in the syringe that led to the doping case is accused of lying to federal agents, becoming the sixth indictment.

U.S. sprinter Justin Gatlin had just finished the news conference after winning the 100 meters at the 2004 Olympics when his coach, Trevor Graham, added a surreal dimension to the celebratory moment.

With Gatlin standing a few feet away in the basement of the Athens Olympic Stadium, Graham told a group of reporters he was the coach who turned in the syringe that triggered the BALCO doping scandal.

An ironic dimension was added Thursday, when a federal grand jury in San Francisco indicted Graham on charges of lying to federal agents investigating the BALCO affair. He faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Gatlin, meanwhile, faces a possible eight-year ban after testing positive for the anabolic steroid testosterone April 22. He is among 10 athletes suspended for doping violations that occurred while Graham was their coach. In addition, Olympic champion Marion Jones has been under suspicion for doping that allegedly occurred while she trained with Graham.

Now that the federal investigation of Graham has ended in the indictment, the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency is likely to charge the coach with a doping offense.

"No one has a license to break sports rules or federal laws just because they turn in a drug dealer to the authorities," USADA general counsel Travis Tygart said Thursday.

Following USADA policy, Tygart said his comments were not related to a specific case.

In 2003, Graham sent USADA a syringe containing traces of a then-undetectable drug the coach said athletes were getting from BALCO founder Victor Conte. Analysis by the anti-doping lab at UCLA showed the substance was the steroid THG, a drug Illinois chemist Patrick Arnold created for Conte's clients.

Graham is the sixth person indicted in the BALCO investigation. The other five have been convicted after making deals with prosecutors that kept any of the cases from going to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0090876

The question now becomes whether Graham cuts a deal that will prevent a trial in which many of his athletes and former athletes, including Jones and Gatlin, could be called to testify.

Because federal prosecutors had granted Graham immunity in return for his cooperation in the investigation, any deal the government makes now probably will hinge on that cooperation. The indictment specifies Graham was not given immunity from prosecution for making false statements.

Graham's attorney, Joseph Zeszotarski of Raleigh, N.C., said his client is not guilty and has not made any false statement.

"It is particularly troublesome the government has chosen to take this course when it was Trevor who had the integrity and courage to turn in the sample that led to the BALCO investigation. ... Yet this is how he is rewarded," Zeszotarski said in a statement.

When he publicly acknowledged having turned in the syringe, Graham said, "I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time. I have no regrets."

Skeptics contended Graham acted because he was concerned rival athletes were reaping benefits from THG while it was undetectable. He denies giving drugs to his athletes.

The indictment alleges Graham gave illegal performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes after obtaining them from "Source A," whom published reports have identified as Angel Guillermo Heredia, a shot putter from Laredo, Texas. The indictment says Graham also referred athletes to "Source A" to get the drugs directly from the source.

U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel declined comment on the indictment but said, "We've already made our position on Mr. Graham clear."

In August, the USOC banned Graham from using any of its training facilities.

Philip Hersh covers the Olympics for The Times and the Chicago Tribune.

Track Coach Trevor Graham Indicted (SFC)

By Mark Fainaru-wada And Lance Williams, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, November 3, 2006

(11-02) 16:03 PST -- A track coach whose clients have included some of the world's greatest sprinters -- such as U.S. Olympic champions Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin -- was indicted Thursday for lying to federal agents when he told them he had never provided his athletes with performance-enhancing drugs in connection with the BALCO steroids case.

Trevor Graham, who has portrayed himself as a whistle blower for giving authorities the steroid-laced syringe that helped propel the BALCO probe in 2003, was indicted by a federal grand jury in San Francisco on three counts of making false statements to government agents.

Graham's indictment was another blow to American track and field, which has labored unsuccessfully to put the BALCO steroids scandal behind it. In the past two years, 14 track and field stars with ties to BALCO -- including Tim Montgomery, former world record holder in the 100 meters and a former Graham client -- have been disciplined for doping offenses. In July, Gatlin, a Graham protege, was suspended after testing positive for steroids.

Neither Graham nor his attorney, Joseph Zeszotarski, could be reached for comment.

The grand jury that indicted Graham for his statements in a 2004 interview with federal agents is also investigating whether Giants slugger Barry Bonds committed perjury for denying under oath that he knowingly used banned drugs from BALCO. There was no indication Thursday when or whether the grand jury might complete its probe of Bonds.

Graham is the coach of the elite Sprint Capitol organization in North Carolina. Several of his athletes have tested positive for steroids, but he has repeatedly denied distributing the drugs.

However, at least three people connected with BALCO have told the government that Graham was a steroid dealer. Both BALCO ringleader Victor Conte and shot-putter C.J. Hunter told federal agents the coach distributed the drugs to his athletes, and Montgomery testified before a grand jury that Graham provided his athletes with steroids he had received through a "connection" in Mexico.

Thursday's indictment alleged that Graham lied to special agents from the Internal Revenue Service's Criminal Investigations unit when he told them he had never set up any of his athletes with performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source.

The indictment also alleged that Graham lied when he said he had never met the unidentified source, referred to as "Source A," in person. The third count against the coach claimed that he lied when stating his last contact with "Source A" had been a phone conversation in 1997.

Based on a reading of Graham's statement -- which was obtained and previously reported on by The Chronicle -- the unidentified source is Angel Guillermo Heredia, known throughout the BALCO case as "Memo." In his 2004 interview, Graham said Memo was a shot-putter from Laredo, Texas. According to the statement, Graham said he was not aware of any of his athletes obtaining drugs from Mexico; he had no connections with a Mexican lab; he only had spoken with Memo by phone, and hadn't talked with him since 1997.

The New York Times previously reported that Heredia told the grand jury in San Francisco that he provided steroids, human growth hormone and other performance enhancing drugs to Graham and his athletes between 1996 and 2000.

The indictment alleges that Graham met Source A in person for the first time in 1996 or 1997 and thereafter referred "numerous athletes coached by Graham to Source A to obtain illegal performance-enhancing drugs from Source A." The indictment also charged that Source A provided performance-enhancers to Graham and his athletes between the time of their first meeting and the 2004 interview with agents. Some of the athletes, the indictment, alleged, were associated with BALCO.

"Today's charges demonstrate this office's ongoing commitment to investigate and prosecute not only those involved in the illegal doping of our nation's athletes, but also those who lie to federal agents involved in a criminal investigation," said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan.

In June 2004, four months after four men were indicted in what the government termed a conspiracy to distribute performance-enhancing drugs to elite athletes, investigators interviewed Graham for nearly three-and-a-half hours with his lawyer present in Raleigh, N.C.

During the interview, Graham acknowledged he was the man who sent the now-famous, steroid-laced syringe to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in the summer of 2003 to expose Conte and BALCO. Graham also admitted he attended a meeting at BALCO in late 2003, where Conte hatched what became known as "Project World Record," a plan devised to turn Montgomery into the world's fastest man. Also at the meeting were sprint coach Charlie Francis -- the man who coached steroid cheat Ben Johnson -- and Milos Sarcev -- a bodybuilder and self-described anabolic expert.

Graham, however, insisted to the agents that he had never provided any illegal or banned performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes. For example, he stated the only things he had ever given Marion Jones were "Gatorade, protein and potassium for cramps," according to a copy of his statement. Graham told the investigators that as a coach he believed he had always "done the right things."

However, Hunter, the shot-putter and ex-husband of Jones, told agents Graham had provided Jones with the endurance-boosting drug EPO in the lead-up to the 2000 Sydney Games, where she won five medals, three of them gold.

At the Summer Olympics in Athens in 2004, Graham said he was the person who had sent the needle-less syringe with traces of a steroid in it to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency in Colorado Springs. He said he was "just a coach doing the right thing."

However, many others connected to the BALCO probe have characterized Graham's action much more a result of a turf war between his athletes and those aligned with Conte, who he named as the originator of the steroid in the syringe.

The same day Graham sent the syringe to USADA, Conte drafted a letter to the anti-doping group and to the international governing body for track and field detailing allegations of Graham doping his athletes with "oral testosterone undeconate." Conte offered details about how Graham's athletes were avoiding being Conte, and, at the end of the letter, he named four sprinters he said were cheating. Among those was Gatlin, who currently shares the 100-meter world record. Conte ultimately didn't send the letter, but it was found in his trash by the lead BALCO investigator.

After Gatlin was caught cheating this summer -- adding to a list of nearly a dozen of Graham's current or former clients who either tested positive or were implicated for doping -- the coach lost his contract with Nike and was banned from U.S. Olympic Committee training centers.

E-mail the writers at mfainaru-wada@sfchronicle.com and lwilliams@sfchronicle.com

Graham Indicted For Role In Probe (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Trevor Graham, the former coach of Marion Jones and other track and field stars, was indicted yesterday on federal charges of lying to investigators involved in the steroid probe that already has ensnared dozens of high-profile athletes.

In the five-page indictment from U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, the government alleged that Graham lied about his relationship with an unnamed source of performance-enhancing drugs. The indictment said Graham met the source in 1996 or 1997, sent athletes to him for drugs and relied upon him for illegal drugs "for years."

The source is believed to be former athlete and nutritionist Angel Guillermo Heredia of Mexico and Laredo, Tex., who testified that he provided steroids, human growth hormone and the performance-enhancing drug EPO under Graham's direction from about 1996 through 2000, according to the New York Times.

A public records search showed that Graham's assistant coach, Randall Evans, shared an address in Laredo with Heredia in 1999.

Graham did not return a call seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0090878

Graham's Raleigh, N.C.-based attorney, Joe Zeszotarski, said in a statement his client is the victim of false accusers possibly motivated to retaliate for Graham's role in kicking off what has been a historic crackdown on drugs in sports in the United States.

In the summer of 2003, Graham anonymously sent in a syringe that led the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency to uncover the designer steroid THG, which led to drug bans for more than a dozen athletes.

"Trevor's response is that he is not guilty, and he looks forward to clearing his name at trial," Zeszotarski said in the statement. "Given the money, reputation and freedom lost by many as a result of Trevor's integrity in turning in the sample, it is not at all surprising that people are now trying to say otherwise in an effort to harm Trevor."

Graham, who competed for Jamaica as a sprinter in the 1988 Summer Games, faces a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each of the three counts of making false statements. The indictment said investigators asked Graham about the source during a meeting in his attorney's office in Raleigh on June 8, 2004.

Graham has coached more than a half-dozen athletes who have been charged with doping violations, including Olympic champion Justin Gatlin and sprinter Latasha Jenkins, both of whom failed tests this summer.

Graham, who said Gatlin was the victim of a vengeful massage therapist, was fired from his contract at Nike and barred from the U.S. Olympic Committee's training centers. The USADA and world track and field governing body (IAAF) began a joint investigation of Graham in connection with doping allegations.

Graham was issued a summons to appear for arraignment Nov. 16 before Magistrate Judge Edward M. Chen.

"Today's charges demonstrate this office's ongoing commitment to investigate and prosecute not only those involved in the illegal doping of our nation's athletes, but also those who lie to federal agents involved in a criminal investigation," U.S. attorney Kevin V. Ryan said in a statement.

Sprinter's Coach Indicted For Lying To Feds (CHIT)

By Philip Hersh, Tribune Olympic Sports Reporter

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

U.S. sprinter Justin Gatlin had just finished the news conference after winning the 100 meters at the 2004 Olympics when his coach, Trevor Graham, added a surreal dimension to the celebratory moment.

With Gatlin standing a few feet away in the basement of the Athens Olympic Stadium, Graham told a small group of reporters he was the coach who turned in the syringe that triggered the BALCO doping scandal.

An ironic dimension was added Thursday when a federal grand jury in San Francisco indicted Graham on charges of lying to federal agents investigating the BALCO affair. He faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Gatlin, meanwhile, faces a possible eight-year ban after testing positive for the anabolic steroid testosterone April 22. He is among 10 athletes suspended for doping violations that occurred while Graham was their coach. In addition, Olympic champion Marion Jones has been under suspicion of doping that allegedly occurred while she trained with Graham.

Now that the federal investigation of Graham has resulted in the indictment, the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency is likely to charge the coach with a doping offense.

"No one has a license to break sports rules or federal laws just because they turn in a drug dealer to the authorities," USADA general counsel Travis Tygart said Thursday.

Following USADA policy, Tygart said his comments were not related to a specific case.

"We know athletes rarely dope on their own," Tygart said.

In 2003, Graham sent USADA a syringe containing traces of a then-undetectable drug the coach said athletes were getting from BALCO founder Victor Conte. Analysis by the anti-doping lab at UCLA showed the substance was the steroid THG, a drug Illinois chemist Patrick Arnold created for Conte's clients.

Graham is the sixth person indicted in the BALCO investigation, a group that includes Barry Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson. The other five have been convicted after making deals with prosecutors that kept any of the cases from going to trial.

The question now becomes whether Graham cuts a deal that will prevent a trial in which many of his athletes and former athletes, including Jones and Gatlin, could be called to testify.

Because federal prosecutors had granted Graham immunity in return for his cooperation in the investigation, any deal the government makes now probably will hinge on that cooperation. The indictment specifies Graham was not given immunity from prosecution for making false statements.

Graham's attorney, Joseph Zeszotarski of Raleigh, N.C., said his client is not guilty and has not made any false statement.

"It is particularly troublesome the government has chosen to take this course when it was Trevor who had the integrity and courage to turn in the sample that led to the BALCO investigation. … Yet this is how he is rewarded," Zeszotarski said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0090879

When he publicly acknowledged having turned in the syringe, Graham said, "I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time. I have no regrets."

Skeptics contended Graham acted because he was concerned rivals were reaping benefits from THG while it was undetectable. He denies giving drugs to the athletes he has coached on a Raleigh-based team called Sprint Capitol, USA.

The indictment alleges Graham gave illegal performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes after obtaining them from "Source A," whom published reports have identified as Angel Guillermo Heredia, a shot putter from Laredo, Texas or referred them to "Source A" to get the drugs directly from him.

U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel declined comment on the indictment but said, "We've already made our position on Mr. Graham clear."

In August, the USOC banned Graham from using any of its training facilities.

phersh@tribune.com

Graham Charged With False Statements In Steroid Probe (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, November 3, 2006

Nov. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Track coach Trevor Graham, who helped spark a federal inquiry into steroid use by athletes, was charged with making false statements to federal agents about getting steroids for his athletes.

Graham, coach to Olympic sprinters Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin, obtained illegal performance enhancing drugs from an unnamed source and lied about it to U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents who interviewed him in June 2004, according to a statement today by the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco. Graham also lied about never meeting the source in person, and about his last contacts with the unnamed supplier, the statement said.

The defendant said ``he never set up any of his athletes with drugs" when ``in fact Graham obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from Source A and thereafter provided them to athletes he was coaching and also referred athletes he was coaching to Source A," said the statement.

Graham was a witness in a federal investigation into Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, lab known as Balco, the U.S. Attorney said. The lab's founder and four others, including Greg Anderson, trainer to baseball player Barry Bonds, have pleaded guilty to distributing steroids. No athletes have been charged. Joseph Zeszotarski, Graham's attorney in Raleigh, North Carolina, didn't return a message left on voicemail after hours. Bonds has denied using steroids.

False Statements

Graham made the false statements while being interviewed about his relationship with ``Source A," who provided Graham and his athletes, some of whom were associated with Balco, with illegal drugs, prosecutors said. He was indicted on three counts of making false statements, each carrying a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Graham wasn't charged with distributing steroids.

The U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers Aug. 3, the first time the organization has levied such a penalty, after Olympic 100-meters champion Gatlin tested positive for testosterone at a meet in April.

Graham, who is based in North Carolina, is the coach of sprinters Jones and Gatlin. Gatlin faces an eight-year ban after failing a second drug test in August, and Jones was cleared of using banned substances.

Graham is also being investigated by the International Association of Athletics Federations after Gatlin failed a doping test, the group said in August. Graham is fighting the Olympic ban and Gatlin has denied wrongdoing.

Trained

Graham has also trained twins Alvin and Calvin Harrison, Jerome Young, Michelle Collins and Tim Montgomery, who have all received doping suspensions.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office launched an investigation three years ago into steroid use by athletes, including baseball player Barry Bonds. The probe was sparked in part by Graham, who anonymously mailed a syringe containing a sample of tetrahydrogestrinone, known as THG or the Clear, a synthetic ``designer steroid" that was once undetectable and is banned in baseball.

``I was just a coach doing the right ting at the time," Graham said in a 2004 interview with the Associated Press at the Athens Olympics.

The case is U.S. v Trevor Graham, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Graham Charged With Hindering Probe (SFC/AP)

By David Kravets And Paul Elias, Associated Press Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090880

(11-02) 22:34 PST San Francisco (AP) --

The elite track coach who trained Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery was charged Thursday with hindering the federal steroids probe he helped launch three years ago when he mailed a syringe of a designer drug to anti-doping agents.

Trevor Graham was charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents in an indictment issued by the grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports.

If convicted, Graham faces a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison and a $750,000 fine. He was summoned to appear for arraignment Nov. 16 in U.S. District Court.

Graham operates Raleigh, N.C.-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April.

He also coached sprinters Jones, who won five medals at the 2000 Sydney Games, and her ex-boyfriend, Montgomery, formerly the world's fastest man. He was suspended from competition for two years, although he never has tested positive for a banned substance.

Three years ago, Graham anonymously mailed a syringe containing "the clear," a previously undetectable steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. At the 2004 Athens Olympics, Graham acknowledged mailing the drug, saying: "I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time." He did not say why he turned in the syringe or how he got the material.

According to the indictment, Graham lied to federal investigators in 2004 when he told them he didn't provide his athletes with performance-enhancing drugs.

It said he obtained those drugs from a person identified only as "Source A" and that he "provided them to athletes he was coaching and also referred athletes he was coaching to Source A to obtain illegal performance-enhancing drugs directly from Source A."

Graham was granted immunity for his cooperation but not from prosecution for making false statements, prosecutors said.

"Today's charges demonstrate this office's ongoing commitment to investigate and prosecute not only those involved in the illegal doping of our nation's athletes, but also those who lie to federal agents involved in a criminal investigation," San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

Graham's Raleigh-based attorney Joseph Zeszotarski said his client was innocent and has cooperated with federal authorities.

"It is particularly troublesome that the government has chosen to take this course, when it was Trevor, who had the integrity, and courage, to turn in the sample that led to the BALCO investigation in the first place," he said. "Yet this is how he is rewarded."

The move touched off the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative investigation. It since has netted five convictions, including that of Patrick Arnold, the Illinois chemist who produced the clear for the now-defunct Burlingame supplement company that served as a front for a steroids ring.

"We know athletes rarely dope on their own," said Travis Tygart, general counsel for the USADA. "I can't comment on any active USADA case but to the extent that criminal laws and sport rules can be harnessed together to eradicate the root of the problem by stopping coaches and others who prey on our athletes, it's a great day for all of us who are interested in clean sport."

In August, the U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers, because many of his athletes have been suspended for doping offenses.

USOC spokesman Darryl Seibel declined comment on the indictment.

Jill Geer, spokeswoman for USA Track & Field, said the sport's governing body "has always believed that anyone involved in doping, whether an athlete, coach, support staff or other person, should be held accountable.

"We are not familiar with the investigation or the particular evidence in Mr. Graham's case," she said, "so we will wait for the justice system to run its course."

Barry Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, also was convicted in the BALCO investigation. The grand jury also is examining whether the slugger committed perjury when he told a grand jury in 2003 that he never knowingly used steroids. He told the panel he believed Anderson had supplied him with flaxseed oil and arthritis balm.

___

Associated Press sports writer Bob Baum in Phoenix contributed to this report.

Track And Field Coach Graham Indicted (SN)

Sports Network, November 2, 2006

San Francisco, CA (Sports Network) - Trevor Graham, a track and field coach of Olympic athletes, was indicted Thursday by a federal grand jury for his role in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative (BALCO) steroid distribution case.

DOJ_NMG_0090881

Graham was charged with three counts of making false statements to special agents of IRS-Criminal Investigation (IRS-CI). According to United States Attorney Kevin Ryan, during the criminal investigation, Graham was a witness in determining the ultimate source for illegal performance-enhancing drugs taken by many athletes who were connected with BALCO.

The indictment states that on June 8, 2004, Graham was interviewed by federal agents about his relationship with a source, who provided Graham and the athletes he was coaching, some of whom were associated with BALCO, with illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

The indictment alleges Graham lied to special agents by saying he never arranged for any of his athletes to obtain drugs from the source. The indictment also alleges that Graham got illegal performance-enhancing drugs from the said source and then provided them directly to athletes he was coaching. Graham also allegedly lied that he never met the source in person and, according to the indictment, falsified that he last spoke with the source in 1997.

"The charges allege that Graham intentionally lied to IRS-CI agents who were pursuing the original source of the illegal performance-enhancing drugs taken by many of the athletes tied to BALCO," Ryan said. "Today's charges demonstrate this office's ongoing commitment to investigate and prosecute not only those involved in the illegal doping of our nation's athletes, but also those who lie to federal agents involved in a criminal investigation. As made clear today, intentionally making false statements to federal agents in the course of a criminal investigation is a serious federal felony."

Graham's arraignment is set for November 16 before Magistrate Judge Edward M. Chen. He faces 15 years in prison and a fine of $750,000 if convicted on all three counts.

"We can't turn a blind eye to the use of performance enhancing drugs and the money laundering associated with it," said Diane Carter, IRS-CI assistant special agent in charge. "When you lie or mislead investigators regarding the use or distribution of illegal steroids, those actions will be aggressively pursued by the IRS as well other law enforcement organizations and the U.S. Attorney's Office."

Graham operates Sprint Capitol USA, which was formed in 1993, and is based in Raleigh, North Carolina. Athletes such as Marion Jones and former 100-meter world record holder Tim Montgomery have all trained under Graham.

Montgomery was charged with using illegal performance-enhancing drugs, by the United States Anti-Doping Agency (USADA), even though he did not return a positive drug test. Montgomery was banned for two years. Although Jones had reportedly received banned drugs from BALCO, she was cleared of a separate doping allegation this past summer after reportedly failing one drug test for Erythropoietin (EPO), a banned performance-enhancer.

Graham has also worked with sprinter Justin Gatlin, who in August received an eight-year suspension for testing positive for a prohibited anabolic agent. Gatlin won the gold medal in the 100 meters at the 2004 Olympics.

Several other athletes who have worked with Graham have been banned for illegal substances.

Sports Track Coach Charged With Obstruction In Balco Case (NPR)

NPR/ATC, November 2, 2006

All Things Considered, November 2, 2006 · Track and field coach Trevor Graham has been charged with impeding the Balco investigation of drug use by some of the world's best athletes. Graham, one of the highest-profile track coaches in the world, has coached stars such as Marion Jones, Justin Gatlin and Tim Montgomery.

The indictment alleges that Graham lied to agents in 2004 by stating that he never supplied any of his athletes with drugs. The indictment says that, in fact, Graham obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs and provided them to athletes he was coaching. And, it alleges, Graham also referred athletes he was coaching to an unnamed source to obtain illegal performance-enhancing drugs directly.

An odd fact of his case is that it was Graham who tipped off anti-doping authorities about the Balco lab three years ago, by anonymously sending them a syringe with an undetectable steroid.

Graham's prize pupil Justin Gatlin, admitted this past summer that he'd tested positive for testosterone. Gatlin, the co-world record holder in 100 meters and the reigning Olympic and world champion, was banned from the sport by U.S. Ant-Doping Agency for up to 8 years.

The grand jury that handed out the indictment against Graham is the same one that continues to investigate baseball star Barry Bonds.

At least one sports analyst says that Graham's indictment is good news for Bonds, as it means that the grand jury is taking action against the coach -- but still apparently doesn't have enough evidence to issue charges against Bonds.

Bonds, the record-setting outfielder, is being investigated for possible perjury and tax evasion.

Graham Indicted In Steroids Probe (BBC)

BBC Sports, November 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090882

Sprint coach Trevor Graham has been charged with hindering a US government investigation into steroids in sport.

Graham, whose stars included disgraced Olympic 100m champion Justin Gatlin, was indicted on three counts of making false statements to federal agents.

The North Carolina-based coach was summoned to appear for arraignment on 16 November in a US District Court.

If convicted of all three counts, he faces a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison and $750,000.

Sheriff, Aides Indicted In Federal Drug Investigation (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

A federal grand jury has indicted 20 persons, including Henry County, Va., Sheriff Harold Frank Cassell and 12 of his current or former deputies, in connection with a major drug, weapon and money-laundering conspiracy in southern Virginia.

Fourteen persons were arrested yesterday as a result of a Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. The county law-enforcement officers are accused of stealing, selling and using cocaine, crack, marijuana, steroids and date-rape drugs and confiscating weapons being held as evidence.

Several also are accused of using a drug drop house for extramarital sex.

Police had been in contact with the rest of those indicted except for one, U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee said.

At a bail hearing yesterday afternoon, U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael F. Urbanski released Sheriff Cassell on $25,000 bail and ordered that he have no contact with the other defendants.

At the prosecution's request, Judge Urbanski also told Sheriff Cassell, 68, not to discuss the case with any county employee because an investigation of corruption in Henry County's government is ongoing.

Former county administrator Sid Clower went to prison for embezzling more than $818,000 from 1993 to 2002 as the county sank into economic despair. He used the money for gifts, trips and to support an out-of-wedlock child.

State police and officers from Martinsville, Va., are helping run the Henry County department in the meantime.

According to a 48-count indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Abingdon, Va., at least four law-enforcement officers stole firearms, money, electronic equipment, illegal drugs and other items held by the department as evidence and that at least 10 others sought to impede and obstruct a federal investigation into the suspected conspiracy.

Hundreds of pounds of cocaine, crack and marijuana are thought to have been seized and later sold.

Sheriff Cassell was quoted by investigators as saying that the only way to acquire wealth is to be "a little crooked and not get caught."

He owns large tracts of land and a trucking company and has reported more than $20,000 in dividends yearly, the government said.

"As a public servant, I am deeply disturbed by the actions of these individuals, especially the law-enforcement officers arrested today," said Shawn A. Johnson, special agent in charge of the DEA's Washington division. "Those who betray the public trust insult the integrity and honor of all police officers who risk their lives upholding the law."

A U.S. Postal Service employee and a county probation officer were among those charged in the case.

The indictment, which was made public yesterday, states that the conspiracy began in 1998 when sworn officers, employees and associates of the sheriff's office took part in a "continuous scheme" to distribute the date-rape drug Ketamine, cocaine, crack and marijuana.

The indictment states that members of the conspiracy used their connections with the sheriff's office to obtain drugs and avoid arrest. It also states that they took seized firearms for their own use.

Sheriff Cassell, according to the indictment, was advised by authorities of drug deals going on in his department but chose not to take any action. It states that he covered up several illegal activities by making false statements to federal investigators and by aiding and abetting the money-laundering aspect of the operation.

Sheriff Cassell was with the state police before being elected sheriff in 1992. He earned a salary of about $90,000, according to state figures The county of about 58,000 residents is best known for the Martinsville Speedway, where NASCAR races are run twice a year.

The sheriff has 122 employees, including 96 sworn officers.

The county supervisors last night asked Sheriff Cassell to resign, saying they thought his ability to manage his department had been "irreparably damaged."

John Lichtenstein, Sheriff Cassell's attorney, said his client would assess the issues and "make a decision that he believes reflects the best interests of the people."

DOJ_NMG_0090883

Mr. Brownlee said a major break in the investigation came as a result of Operation Cyber Chase. In March 2005, DEA agents in the Philadelphia field office notified agents in Roanoke that they made a controlled delivery of two kilograms of Ketamine -- a sedative -- to a residence in Martinsville, Va.

Agents arrested William Reed, who rented the residence from a sergeant with the county sheriff's office. Mr. Reed was charged with possession with intent to distribute Ketamine. Facing criminal charges and a lengthy sentence, Mr. Reed agreed to cooperate in the DEA probe, Mr. Brownlee said. The sergeant has been indicted in the case.

Sheriff And Several Deputies Charged In Drug Trafficking (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The longtime sheriff of Henry County, Va., and 12 former and current deputies have been charged with participating in a drug-trafficking ring in the rural county on the North Carolina border, Drug Enforcement Agency officials said yesterday.

Harold F. Cassell, 68, who has been sheriff since 1992, was alerted to the illegal activity but did nothing to stop it, instead making false statements and aiding in money laundering to cover it up, federal officials said.

Twenty people, including sworn officers, employees and associates of officers, dealt in illegal drugs, including cocaine, crack, steroids, ketamine and hundreds of pounds of marijuana, over a five-year period beginning in 1998, federal officials said. Participants in the conspiracy also trafficked in seized weapons, including a machine gun, according to a 48-count indictment returned Wednesday in Abingdon and unsealed yesterday.

"The accusations are very serious, and we're taking them seriously. He's presumed innocent," said Cassell's attorney, John E. Lichtenstein. "He has a great deal of faith, both personal and religious."

Cassell, who goes by Frank, patrolled Henry County for years as a state trooper before becoming sheriff. He has been married for 44 years and has two daughters and several grandchildren, Lichtenstein said.

The mayor of Martinsville, which has about 15,500 residents and is the county seat, said people were distressed by the allegations. The sheriff's office, with 122 employees, including 96 sworn officers, is the primary law enforcement agency in Henry, which has no county police department.

"Without question, there is a lot of talking, and more than a little disbelief, and I think there's a lot of disappointment," said Mayor Kimble Reynolds Jr. The mayor, who is a defense lawyer, said he had heard courthouse whispers about "strong-willed personalities bumping heads" inside Cassell's department but never any word that deputies might be engaged in illicit activity.

DEA officials said a major break came in March 2005 during a large investigation, dubbed Operation Cyber Chase, into illegal online prescription drug sales.

While investigating more than 200 Web sites that illegally sold drugs around the world, DEA agents intercepted an express mail package containing 2 kilograms of ketamine, an animal tranquilizer known as Special K, that was shipped to a Henry residence, the indictment says.

DEA agents set up a sting for its intended recipient, who told them he was working as a middleman for Sgt. James A. Vaught of the sheriff's office, the indictment says. The middleman said the residence was used for drug deals and extramarital affairs, the indictment says. From there, federal agents built a case against 20 people, including the former head of the vice unit in the sheriff's office.

Cassell, who lives in Axton, allegedly agreed not to pursue investigations and to pass on tips of outside law enforcement activity to the conspirators. He also cosigned a loan for Vaught to help launder $10,000 in drug proceeds that Vaught received, federal officials said.

Vaught, 33, of Ridgway, resigned from the sheriff's office in March 2005 and agreed to cooperate with state and federal investigators, the indictment says.

Cassell has a reputation as a seasoned sheriff who runs his office in a blunt-talking, no-nonsense fashion.

The news comes as the region struggles with the loss of textile and furniture-making jobs and with recent attention from the national news media over a massive mortgage fraud case involving a Martinsville native. The nation's largest home lender recently filed suit, saying that Robert Penn, a Martinsville native who now lives in Indianapolis, tricked dozens of Virginia residents into purchasing Indiana homes at inflated prices.

"We're trying to battle back against the current," Reynolds said.

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Virginia Sheriff Indicted In Gun, Drug Case (AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press

AP, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090884

ROANOKE -- Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell and 12 of his uniformed employees have been indicted in a federal investigation into drug and gun dealing.

A U.S. Postal Service employee, a probation officer and five residents also were charged in the 34-count indictment, which was issued Tuesday and unsealed today.

Charges include a racketeering conspiracy, narcotics distribution, obstruction of justice and perjury plus firearms charges.

The indictment states that drugs and guns seized by the sheriff's office were sold to residents for distribution. The conspiracy began in 1998, the indictment reads.

"It is disgraceful corruption," John Brownlee, U.S. attorney for western Virginia, said at a press conference.

Sheriff Cassell was charged with money laundering and impeding the investigation by the FBI and federal drug enforcement agents. He was in custody and faced an afternoon bond hearing today.

Fourteen others also were in custody, and police had been in contact with the rest of those indicted except for one defendant who was at large, Mr. Brownlee said.

The indictment states that one of the residents, William R. Reed, told investigators that a house owned by one of the sheriff's officers was used for drug distribution. Mr. Reed cooperated in the investigation following his arrest last year on charges of possession of narcotics with intent to distribute.

Mr. Reed said he was a middleman in the distribution ring and paid James A. Vaught, a sergeant with the sheriff's office, to use the house he owned for drug distribution.

According to the indictment, drugs involved in the conspiracy were narcotics, cocaine, steroids and marijuana.

The Henry County Sheriff's Office declined to comment.

A county sheriff's dispatcher referred questions to the state police office in Salem. An officer who answered the phone there referred calls to the U.S. attorney.

Sheriff Cassell has been sheriff since 1992 in the rural county of about 58,000 residents along the North Carolina line. The area is a former textile and furniture region that has fallen on hard times with the closing of many factories.

The sheriff's department has about 122 employees, including 96 law enforcement officers, according to the indictment. State police and officers from the neighboring city of Martinsville are helping the county, a state police official said.

'Disgraceful' Suspects Rounded Up By Federal Agents In Pre-dawn Raid. (ROT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke Times, November 3, 2006

One year into a corruption investigation targeting his department, Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell reportedly told a federal agent:

"If you think I'm crooked or if I got a bunch of crooked people, by God you investigate it and put me in court."

Seven months later, Cassell was shuffling into a federal courtroom in ankle chains.

A 48-count indictment brought down this week accuses sheriff's office employees of using and dealing drugs; stealing narcotics and guns from evidence and redistributing them in the community; and lying to federal investigators.

Cassell himself is accused of trying to throw federal agents off the trail to protect officers he knew were involved in illegal activity.

Most of the 20 defendants in the case, seven of whom are civilians, were rounded up from their homes before dawn Thursday by agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The investigation began in March 2005 with a tip from the Philadelphia DEA office about a package containing the illegal drug ketamine, known as a date rape drug. Undercover agents brought the package to a house in Martinsville, where it was accepted by William Randall Reed of Fieldale.

Reed later told agents he rented the house from James Alden Vaught, then a sergeant with the Henry County Sheriff's Office, and paid Vaught in cash and ketamine to use the house as a drug drop, the document states. He added that he had helped Vaught sell 2 kilograms of cocaine the sergeant had seized from a drug dealer as part of an investigation.

According to the indictment, Reed also told agents that he and Henry County Deputy Bradley Scott Martin had jointly used and sold ketamine and steroids for about eight years.

Vaught resigned from the sheriff's office soon after and began cooperating with authorities in July 2005, records show. He shared mountains of evidence about corruption at the department and wore a wire during conversations with Cassell.

Here are some of the allegations in the indictment:

n School resource officer and vice officer David Allan King stole seized drugs, falsified destruction orders for them and then sold them through Vaught and civilian associates. Estimates are that multiple kilograms of cocaine, ounces of crack and hundreds of pounds of marijuana were stolen.

n Canine officer Walter R. Hairston on 10 occasions illegally took seized drugs that he was supposed to use for dog training purposes and gave them to others for sale.

n A deputy got steroids and prescription pills from Mexico for his own use and for sale to users at local gyms.

n Vaught's house was used as a spot for fellow officers to conduct extramarital affairs.

n Deputies stole guns, money and other evidence from the property room. Others were caught in possession of unregistered guns with obliterated serial numbers.

n At least 10 defendants, including the sheriff, lied to federal agents and to the grand jury and passed sensitive information on to co-defendants to help them avoid apprehension.

"It is disgraceful corruption," U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said.

Prosecutors believe Cassell knew about Vaught's distribution of cocaine and embezzlement of money and was aware of the use of steroids by members of his staff but failed to pursue investigations. In a covertly recorded conversation, Vaught told Cassell about the cocaine and Cassell said, "that's not particularly shocking" and "that's water over the dam" and nobody else needed to know about it, court records claim.

In a later conversation, according to the documents, Vaught and Cassell met in an isolated spot behind the sheriff's house. There, Vaught reported to Cassell that he thought one deputy was a "stooge" and Cassell replied that he should have fired that deputy a long time ago because he knew he used steroids.

"I said you come in here looking like King Kong. I said I'm, I'm stupid but I ain't plum foolish. I said don't insult my intelligence by denying it, it's over with," Cassell reportedly said.

When Vaught told the sheriff about the shipments of ketamine to his rental house and drug money he had earned, then told him he "lied through his teeth" to the DEA, the sheriff allegedly responded:

"See I had no damn idea or I'd of stonewalled ... at least to give you a chance to get your act together."

Prosecutors say Cassell also helped Vaught figure out a way to hide thousands of dollars in drug money.

Brownlee declined to say how much money may have been made through the alleged corruption.

On Thursday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael Urbanski released all but two of the 16 defendants who appeared before him, including Cassell, on bond. Brown and Trantham were detained temporarily until they can get attorneys for a bond hearing.

Some of the defendants resigned from the sheriff's office during the investigation. Unlike the other current sheriff's office employees, Cassell was allowed to return to work under stringent conditions.

Among others, he may not carry a firearm or talk with any co-defendants or possible witnesses.

Cassell had no comment as he left the federal courthouse, but one of his attorneys, John Lichtenstein, said he expected his client to return to work today.

Although the Henry County Board of Supervisors asked for Cassell's resignation Thursday, Lichtenstein said, "All those decisions are under way."

State law allows a circuit court judge to remove an elected official such as a sheriff if the judge receives a petition from voters who live in the official's district. The petition must be signed by enough people to equal 10 percent of the votes cast for the office in the last election.

Even with a petition, the decision is up to the judge's discretion, said Salem attorney and state House Majority Leader Morgan Griffith. He said that's unlikely without a criminal conviction or absolutely clear evidence of misconduct.

The arrest of 13 out of 94 sworn officers, including two of the top-ranking ones, put a significant dent in the department's ranks. Additionally, just this fall, Lt. Kimmy Nester was demoted from major for unknown reasons. He was not named in the indictment.

Virginia State Police Superintendent Steven Flaherty said additional troopers have been assigned to Henry County.

"I want to reassure the people of Henry County that their law enforcement response is in sound hands," he said.

Gov. Tim Kaine said he approved the decision.

"We're not going to leave the people of Henry County shorthanded at a time which will be a real challenging time for their community," he said.

Deputy County Administrator Tim Hall said Capt. Lane Perry was running the sheriff's office on Thursday and he believed everyone else scheduled to work who had not been arrested had reported.

Although County Administrator Benny Summerlin said he had been aware of the federal investigation for "some time" and his office had cooperated, it came as a shock to Hall.

He said he found out only after driving to work and seeing the sheriff's office surrounded by a swarm of law enforcement vehicles and a helicopter.

Only a few citizens had called the administration office Thursday morning, Hall said, but many may have questions in the coming days.

DOJ_NMG_0090886

"Anybody that's elected, by definition people have given you their faith," Hall said, "and I'm sure there are some people who feel like they've been wronged."

The Associated Press and staff writers Mike Allen, Michael Sluss and Mason Adams contributed to this report.

Henry Co. Sheriff Arrested On Federal Charges (RTD)

Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, November 2, 2006

ROANOKE -- Henry County officials are asking for the resignation of Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell, who was indicted along with 12 of his current and former employees on charges in a drug-related racketeering case.

Cassell is among 20 people who have been indicted, federal authorities announced yesterday.

The indictment alleges that since 1998, sheriff's office employees took drugs and firearms that had been seized and sold them back to the community or kept contraband for themselves. Multiple kilograms of cocaine and hundreds of pounds of marijuana were taken and resold, according to the indictment.

"The members of this conspiracy took advantage of the trust placed in them as law-enforcement officers," U.S. Attorney John Brownlee said in a statement.

The current and former employees of the sheriff's office who were charged include two sergeants, one from the vice unit; a major who was a captain at the time of the alleged offenses; a probation officer; two deputies; and a vice officer. A U.S. Postal Service employee, a probation officer and five other people were also charged in the indictment, which was unsealed yesterday.

Charges include a racketeering con- spiracy, theft of firearms, drug distribution, money laundering, obstruction of justice and perjury.

Cassell, who has been sheriff since 1992, was charged with impeding the investigation by the FBI and federal drug-enforcement agents. He was released on $25,000 unsecured bond and told not to discuss the case with any county employees and not to have contact with other people named in the indictment or potential government witnesses.

H.G. Vaughn, chairman of the Henry Board of Supervisors, said the board passed a resolution yesterday evening asking Cassell to resign immediately. He said the board had met with FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Virginia State Police officials in a closed-door meeting.

The two-paragraph resolution said that while the supervisors did not intend to determine guilt or innocence, "it is this board's firm belief that Sheriff H.F. Cassell's ability to manage his department is irreparably damaged in light of these events."

As Cassell walked out of U.S. District Court with his lawyer, John Lichtenstein, reporters asked whether the sheriff plans to resign. "All those decisions are under way," Lichtenstein said.

Vaughn said that if the sheriff resigns, a circuit court judge would appoint someone to act as sheriff until the next general election. A sheriff's captain, Lane Perry, was running the department yesterday.

Vaughn said he learned about the indictments just after 8 a.m. when he received a call from the county administrator's office.

"We're trying to do a lot of things to promote a good, positive image and promote quality of life -- and something like this happens," Vaughn said. "It's devastating."

"It's just an awful day," echoed Del. Ward L. Armstrong, D-Henry, who represented one of the indicted officers at a bond hearing yesterday.

Armstrong said the indictments are bad for community morale and a distraction from economic-development efforts, given recent losses in area manufacturing jobs. He also mentioned former county administrator Sidney Clower's conviction on embezzlement and tax-evasion charges in 2002 and 2004.

"You don't want to be repeatedly in the national news for something like this," Armstrong said, adding that the community will weather this storm as it has others.

Deputy County Administrator Tim Hall said of the indicted employees, "People put their faith in them. I guess there'll be some people who feel like they've been done wrong."

Vaughn said the supervisors are emphasizing to county residents that the sheriff's office employees who are indicted make up a small part of the department, which has a staff of more than 120.

It's not the first time Henry County has made headlines for its drug woes.

"We feel like we're sticking our thumb in a dike -- we're not stopping it, but we're slowing it down," Cassell told The Associated Press in 1992 after dozens of area residents were indicted on charges related to a wide-ranging drug investigation for the third time in less than two years. "We've got a serious drug problem in this area."

In 1996, U.S. News & World Report chronicled the Sandy Level community's crack-cocaine fever, driven by heavily armed 13- to 17-year-old dealers selling to Virginians and North Carolinians in the border community. That remote section of the county long had a tough, blue-collar reputation for bootlegging and nip joints.

DOJ_NMG_0090887

A series of sweeps and undercover operations followed the "Crack Invades A Small Town" magazine article. In 2001, Cassell reflected on the impact of the 1996 article, which "got us the help we were asking for. People were throwing money and manpower at us for two or three years."

The county's continuing drug problems led to two long-term investigations that ended in March 2001 by Henry County deputies, state police and the FBI that brought nearly 100 indictments in the county's Bassett, Oak Level, King's Village, Axton and Horespasture areas.

During the summer of 2001, Cassell announced another successful raid based on a yearlong investigation in Sandy Level, Piedmont Estates and Ridgeway neighborhoods. A half-kilo of cocaine was seized along with numerous vehicles during that raid.

Some area residents were stunned by news of the indictments yesterday.

"I just think it's a damn shame," said Jessie Knight, a 25-year-old employee at the Fasmart in Collinsville, just down Kings Mountain Road from the sheriff's office. "They can't say anything about [criminals] because the cops are doing it, too."

Knight said she was "very, very surprised, especially knowing that it was somebody who was supposed to serve and protect the citizens."

Ebar Hopkins, a 23-year-old who identified himself as a music producer was shopping at the Fasmart. He said he moved to Henry County from Atlanta two months ago.

"You'd expect we'd have good sheriffs," he said. "It's a trip. You never know what to expect out of people."

Hopkins' mother, Anna Schoefield, said people at the call center where she works had been talking about the announcement. "I'm really shocked," she said.

'Corrupt To The Core' Virginia Sheriff Indicted On Drug And Racketeering Charges (ABC)

ABC News, November 2, 2006

The federal government has declared a Virginia sheriff and his deputies corrupt to the core.

Today Henry County Sheriff Harold Cassell and 12 of his deputies were charged with dealing crack-cocaine, marijuana and ketamine, which is commonly called the "date rape drug."

Cassell has been the sheriff of Henry County since 1992 . The indictments culminate a five-year Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into accusations of corruption. More than 20 individuals, including the 12 deputies, have been indicted in the drug distribution and money laundering ring.

A key allegation is that officers took confiscated drugs, issued fake destruction orders and then sold the stolen contraband.

Officials said this is one of the more disturbing, systemic cases of police corruption they have ever seen. According to an indictment unsealed today, the group allegedly sold multiple kilograms of cocaine and hundreds of pounds of marijuana. "As a public servant, I am deeply disturbed by the actions of these individuals, especially [those of] the law enforcement officers arrested today," said Shawn A. Johnson, special agent in charge of the DEA's Washington division.

"Those who betray the public trust insult the integrity and honor of all police officers who risk their lives upholding the law. The DEA joins with the Virginia State Police, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Postal Inspection Service to send a clear message that their disgraceful acts will never be tolerated," Johnson added. Henry County is in south-central Virginia, near the Carolina border. It is best known for the Martinsville Speedway. In March 2005, the DEA became aware that members of the sheriff's office may be linked to the ketamine drug ring and sent a controlled delivery of the drug to a house that had been a key distribution point. That house was owned by James Vaught, a sergeant who worked for Cassell.

Vaught's house was rented by William Reed, a drug dealer who helped Vaught sell 2 kilograms of cocaine confiscated from a drug dealer while Vaught had been on duty.

Vaught resigned from the police force that month and began to cooperate with federal investigators after federal agents arrested Reed.

Drug Bust Leads To Huge Police Corruption Probe (CNN)

By Ann O'Neill

CNN.com, November 3, 2006

(CNN) -- The investigation that exposed an allegedly corrupt Virginia sheriff's department began with a package containing vials of a date-rape drug.

Although Drug Enforcement Administration agents didn't know it at the time, the package was shipped to a house that belonged to a sergeant with the Henry County Sheriff's Office.

According to a grand jury indictment, the DEA intercepted the package, delivered it undercover and arrested self-described middleman William Randall Reed in March 2005. Reed agreed to cooperate and quickly pointed the finger at Sgt. James Allen Vaught.

DOJ_NMG_0090888

Reed said he paid Vaught with cash and Ketamine, the so-called date rape drug, to use the house as a drug drop. The house also was used by other members of the sheriff's office for parties and extramarital trysts, the federal indictment states.

Reed also told authorities that he had helped Vaught sell cocaine the deputy had seized from a suspect.

Vaught resigned from the department soon after Reed's arrest and, a few months later, agreed to cooperate with investigators. He admitted to Reed's allegations and agreed to wear a wire to record conversations with his former colleagues.

The result was a 48-count indictment unsealed Thursday with the arrests of longtime Sheriff Harold Franklin Cassell and 17 others. A dozen of them wore or had worn the uniform of the Henry County Sheriff's Office. (Watch a prosecutor describe 'disgraceful' corruption -- 2:13)

Some of them are accused of stealing cocaine, marijuana and weapons from suspects and the sheriff's evidence property room and selling the contraband to criminals, who put it back on the street.

Others are accused of distributing steroids and weapons, including a machine gun with an obliterated serial number.

"These were drugs and guns that were seized as part of their law enforcement duties that were then stolen from the property room and put back out on the streets," U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee said.

"You have law enforcement [officers] risking their lives to take these guns off the streets and then a very few members of law enforcement putting them right back out there."

Cassell was elected sheriff of county, population 58,000, in 1992. His department employs 122 people, 96 of them sworn law enforcement officers.

Today, in the wake of the indictment, the sheriff's office is being run by the Virginia State police.

Besides the sheriff, those named in the indictment include a captain, three sergeants, eight deputies -- including two vice officers -- a former employee of the U.S. postal service and a former probation officer.

One deputy, Walter R. Hairston, allegedly gave Vaught marijuana and cocaine he used to train the department's drug-sniffing dogs. The contraband was then sold, the indictment says.

According to the indictment, the DEA called to report a drug shipment to a "Brad Martin's house" in 2001. The call was taken by Martin, a sheriff's deputy.

Martin, Hairston and four other deputies, along with alleged drug dealer Wilbert Herman Brown, are accused in the indictment of racketeering. They allegedly made up a corrupt organization that stole and distributed drugs, including crack cocaine, and obstructed justice.

Cassell was told by authorities about the shipment to Martin's house, as well as other allegations of illegal activity in the department, and did nothing, the indictment alleges.

Instead, according to the indictment, Cassell tipped off targets of the investigation, lied to investigators and helped Vaught launder drug profits.

Henry County, hard against the North Carolina line in Virginia's southern Piedmont region, is perhaps best known for the Martinsville Speedway, where NASCAR races are held twice a year. It used to boast it was the "sweatshirt capital of the world," according to The Associated Press.

The county's textile and furniture industries have seen better times, and its unemployment rate is higher than the state average.

Timeline From The Indictment (WSLS)

WSLS-TV, November 2, 2006

Today's 50-page indictment alleges the following events:

In or about 1998: earliest known date drug ring is in operation

August 12, 1999: dealing of anabolic steroids and ketamine begins

Mid-1990s to October 5, 2006: James Keaton owned and hid a stolen gun, shipped across state lines.

Late 1990s to April 6, 2006: Patrick Martin and Cornelia Cox have two stolen guns together. Martin has two other of his own stolen guns. Cox has one of her own stolen guns. Five guns total.

2001: DEA agent from TX calls Henry CO Sheriff's Office, says drug package intercepted from Mexico, on it's way to "Brad Martin's" house in Martinsville. Brad Martin, Deputy with Henry Co, happened to take call at Sheriff's office. DEA didn't make connection. Martin tells David King and James Vaught about call. Sheriff Harold Franklin Cassell told about drug activity, did nothing.

The indictment also alleges Cassell knew about other illegal activities, including, Vaught selling cocaine, Vaught stealing money, and use of steroids by several members of Henry Co. Sheriff's office. He lied to federal investigators and VA state police, and tried to help Vaught in a money laundering scheme to hide source of money made from selling cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0090889

Jason Burton, Jonathan Roberson and Travis Wilkins, all employees of Henry Co. Sheriff's Officer, along with Mark Roberson, possessed, hid and transferred an unregistered short barrel machine gun with an obliterated serial number, according to the indictment.

February 13. 2002: Kandy Deshazo and William Reed lie in order to get a PO Box, used a fake name and wanted to get box for illegal activities. Got P.O. Box

November 1, 2002: Kandy Deshazo and William Reed, lied again to get a PO BOX, used a different fake name. Got P.O. Box.

October 20, 2003: Deshazo and Reed lie, use a 3rd fake name to get a P.O. box. Got P.O. Box.

December 16, 2003: Reed tries to get 100 vials of a mixture containing ketamine in order to sell. Also, Martin and Preston tell Reed they had gotten call to Sheriff's Office that USPS intercepted package with 100 vials of ketamine mixture, planned to have agents deliver package to Reed and arrest Reed. As a result, Reed refused to accept package.

December 1, 2004: Mark Roberson owns stolen gun, that had been shipped in interstate or foreign commerce, serial number on gun fake or removed

January 1, 2005: Travis Wilkins gets short barrel machine gun and doesn't register it. Serial number on gun obliterated.

March 4, 2005: DEA agents tell Roanoke DEA agents that express mail package containing 2 kg of ketamine being delivered to home in Martinsville. Ketamine is sedative/date rape schedule 3 controlled substance

-DEA agents intercepted package of ketamine and conducted undercover controlled delivery to Martinsville home

-Arrested William Randall Reed

After Reed's arrest, he provides the following information

-Says he received drugs at Martinsville home and $ from outside VA, took his cut, then shipped remaining drugs outside VA (explained in more detail above)

-Martinsville home owned by James Alden Vaught, a Henry co sergeant

-Reed says he paid Vaught in cash and drugs to use home

-Reed says he helped Vaught sell 2 kg of cocaine that Vaught had seized as part of a drug investigation with Henry Co.

-Reed says Bradley Scott Martin, a Henry Co deputy, has been using and selling ketamine and steroids for 8 yrs

-Vaught resigns from Henry Co in march 2005

-Agrees to work with federal investigators in July 2005, agrees to secretly record conversations

-Says Martinsville home also used as a place for officers to cheat on their spouses

-Says he, Martin and David Allen King, vice officer and SRO with Henry Co involved in selling cocaine, cocaine base, pot, steroids

August 2005 - June 2006: Deputies encourage possible witness to lie

King made agreements with potential witnesses to lie in the investigation, made false statements about his own drug activity to agents. Trantham told potential witnesses how to avoid detection, threatened to shoot one if that person talked to investigators, and lied himself. Brown told witness to lie and lied himself to agents. Hairston tells witnesses to lie and lies to agents himself. Martin agrees with witnesses to withhold evidence, tells possible witnesses to lie, and lies to agents himself.

November 2005- April 2006: Keaton did not investigate criminal conduct in his department, violating duties as law enforcement officer. Keaton gave advice on how to hide stolen money and make it look legitimate, lied to FBI agent and grand jury. False statements are in a written report.

October 2005 - April 2006: Sheriff Cassell tried to help a Sheriff's Office employee hide drug money, lied about helping to federal agents. False statements from Cassell in a written report.

December 1, 2005: Jason Burton has illegal machine gun, not registered

February 24, 2006: The indictment alleges Sheriff Cassell did"knowingly and willfully" tried to cosign a loan for a person with $10,000 from selling drugs, then would help that person deposit small amounts of money into a checking account to pay off loan -- tried to help hide drug money

March 22, 2006: According to the indictment, Cassell made a false material statement and representation to an FBI special agent - says he has no knowledge of money laundering or drug activity in his department

March 23, 2006: King says he knows nothing about drug activity in Henry Co.

March 24, 2006: Robert Adams lies to FBI: says doesn't know why James Vaught wanted to find Wilbert Brown. Indictment also claims Adams knew Vaught wanted to sell half kg of cocaine to Brown.

March 30, 2006: Hairston says he knows nothing about illegal activity

April 4, 2006: The indictment says Keaton lies under oath to a Federal Grand Jury during an investigation into the Henry Co. Sheriff's Office. Grand Jury looking into a conversation between Keaton and Vaught about hiding stolen money.

April 25, 2006: Carlton Riley tries to get one kg of cocaine substance in order to sell it.

May 2, 2006: Cornelia Cox tells agents she did not steal money that had been seized as evidence by Henry Co. Indictment says she took $500.

May 30, 2006: Martin says he knows nothing about illegal activity, and is not personally involved in selling 2 kgs of cocaine with an employee of the Sheriff's Office

May 31, 2006: Trantham says he knows nothing about illegal activity at Henry Co. Sheriff's office

July 11, 2006, Brown says he knows nothing about illegal activity

Details From Henry Co. Press Conference (WSLS)

WSLS-TV, November 2, 2006

In a news conference this morning U.S Attorney John Brownlee addressed the indictments and recent arrests of more than a dozen Henry County Deputies including Sheriff Frank Cassell.

In the indictments, Cassell is accused of helping members in his department with money laundering and distributing narcotics. Brownlee says several members of Henry County Sheriff's office stole narcotics, contraband and firearms that had been seized and then sold the items back into the community. John Brownlee responded, "It is disgraceful corruption that they would take narcotics from the community and that members of law enforcement would put it back out there."

The drugs taken include multiple kilos of cocaine, multiple ounces of crack cocaine and hundreds of pounds of marijuana, also steroids and the drug ketamine known as a date rape drug. Brownlee also stated several deputies used the steroids.

The arrests were made this morning by Virginia State Police, the DEA office and federal agents.

Feds Raid Pot Dispensary Second Time In A Month (RPE)

By David Olson, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside Press Enterprise, November 3, 2006

Authorities on Thursday raided a Palm Springs medical-marijuana dispensary for the second time in a month.

An affidavit supporting the search warrant that authorized the raid accused Palm Springs Caregivers of illegally selling marijuana for profit, said Special Agent Sarah Pullen, of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, which carried out the raid with officers from the Palm Springs Narcotics Task Force. The dispensary continued its illegal sales after a raid on Oct. 4, she said.

State law allows it to provide marijuana only to those who need it for medical reasons.

No one was arrested Thursday.

Employees at the dispensary could not be reached for comment Thursday night. After the Oct. 4 raid, the dispensary's office manager, Tanya Garcia, denied the allegations of illegal sales.

Authorities hauled away hundreds of bags and pill containers that contained marijuana, along with baked goods and liquids that contained the drug, Pullen said. She said the DEA did not have the authority to shut down the dispensary in the 2100 block of North Palm Canyon Drive, but its entire inventory of marijuana was seized Thursday.

The investigation into Palm Springs Caregivers began in September, after a man who police say "has a working relationship" with the dispensary left a bag of "marijuana edibles" as a tip for an employee of the Spa Resort Casino in Palm Springs.

California voters legalized marijuana for medical use in 1996. It is one of 11 states where medical-marijuana initiatives have passed.

But the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that medical-marijuana users can be prosecuted under federal law.

Riverside County supervisors entered the debate over medical marijuana in September, when they voted to join a lawsuit with San Bernardino, San Diego and Merced counties challenging a 2003 state law that requires counties to issue identification cards to medical-marijuana patients who have a doctor's recommendation.

Reach David Olson at 760-837-4411 or dolson@PE.com

Afghan Farmers Likely To Match Harvest (AP)

AP, November 2, 2006

(AP) Afghan farmers now planting opium poppies will probably reap a harvest comparable to this year's record crop, in part because insurgents are preventing effective counter-narcotics work, officials said Thursday.

Planting is under way in southern regions responsible for the bulk of the estimated 6,100 tons of Afghan opium produced in the 2005-06 growing season. Anti-drug officials say that despite anti-cultivation campaigns, they foresee little improvement by harvest time next spring.

DOJ_NMG_0090891

Drug production has skyrocketed since a U.S.-led offensive toppled the Taliban regime five years ago for giving refuge to Osama bin Laden and al-Qaida camps. Last spring's poppy harvest accounted for 92 percent of the global opium supply and was enough to make 610 tons of heroin _ more than all the world's addicts consume in a year.

Police and government officials are deeply implicated in the trade, which adds to the corruption and lawlessness threatening Afghanistan's fledgling democracy. Taliban militiamen had all but eradicated opium cultivation by 2000 but now profit from it, protecting poppy farmers.

Deteriorating security in the countryside makes it difficult to monitor how much poppy has been planted, a senior U.S. official said. Taliban-led militants have increased attacks this year, particularly in Afghanistan's southern opium heartland.

Gen. Khodaidad, a deputy minister in Afghanistan's Ministry of Counter-Narcotics, said some provincial governors and police chiefs have been doing effective anti-drug work.

"But unfortunately, in some provinces, especially in the south and southwest, we haven't been doing as well," said Khodaidad, who like many Afghans uses one name. "The reason is very clear _ fighting. Some of the districts are under the influence of the Taliban or al-Qaida."

Khodaidad said he hoped for a successful anti-cultivation campaign this fall followed by an eradication campaign in the new year, but he said he couldn't promise a reduction in the harvest. "I can tell you there will be no increase," he said.

However, the senior U.S. official said the new poppy crop probably will be similar to the one planted a year ago, "maybe a little under _ we were so high last year." He spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak on the record.

The United Nations' anti-drug chief said recently that proceeds from Afghan opium production are being used to finance terrorist groups. The U.S. official said the country's drug trade was a $3.1 billion business this year and it doesn't "take much of that to fund terrorism."

Seeking to counter corruption that hinders anti-drug efforts, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency is training special units of Afghan policemen who must pass polygraph exams and investigations of their backgrounds, Karen P. Tandy, the DEA administrator, said during a visit Sunday.

"DEA is very accustomed to working in countries where corruption is rampant," she said. "We have a method that has been extremely successful. ... You have patriots in every country who care about the future of their country, and that is no less true here in Afghanistan."

Khodaidad said President Hamid Karzai has warned government officials they will be removed if they help drug trafficking. He said a district chief and an administrator from the same district in Badakhshan, a remote and rugged northern province favored by drug producers, were recently fired.

The U.S. official said if there is no reduction in the opium harvest this year, Afghanistan would come under strong U.S. pressure to start spraying poppy fields with herbicide, an idea that Afghans, including Karzai, deeply oppose because of fears the chemicals could harm people.

Man Gets Life Sentence On Drug Charges (MUCHRONICLE)

By John S. Hausman, Chronicle Staff Writer

Muskegon Chronicle (MI), November 3, 2006

A 35-year-old Muskegon man has been sentenced to life in federal prison without chance of parole after a jury convicted him of large-scale drug trafficking and firearms offenses.

U.S. District Judge Robert Holmes Bell on Wednesday ordered Lakento Brian Smith of 1484 Albert to prison for life for conspiracy to distribute at least 500 grams of cocaine and at least 50 grams of "crack" cocaine, and for possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of "crack." Smith also was sentenced to 30 years in prison for possession with intent to distribute at least 500 grams of cocaine and 10 years for being a felon in possession of firearms -- three semi-automatic pistols.

A federal jury convicted Smith of all four counts June 29 after a three-day trial in Grand Rapids.

Smith was arrested Oct. 28, 2005, at his home after an extended investigation by the Grand Rapids and Detroit offices of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the West Michigan Enforcement Team, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Muskegon Police Department.

During a search of Smith's home on that date based on a search warrant, officers found the three loaded pistols and more than $17,000 in cash, suspected to be the proceeds of drug sales.

In a subsequent search of the trunk of Smith's Pontiac Grand Am, officers found approximately 1,500 grams of powder cocaine, approximately 300 grams of "crack," a hand mixer and a digital scale bearing Smith's thumbprints, according to a DEA agent's sworn affidavit in Smith's court file.

DOJ_NMG_0090892

In an interview after his arrest, Smith waived his Miranda rights and told officers he had been "waiting on this day," referring to the search warrant, because word on the street was that he was being investigated, and several of his acquaintances had been arrested.

Smith's no-parole life sentences were mandatory because he had two prior state of Michigan convictions for drug trafficking, both in Muskegon County's 14th Circuit Court: a 1993 conviction for cocaine delivery and a 1996 conviction for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, second offense.

"This is not a low-level dealer," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Phil Green. "This is a major bust."

Green said two independent investigations, each spanning many months, came together in the Smith bust.

One was an investigation of Smith by Muskegon police in cooperation with the West Michigan Enforcement Team, a multiagency drug-fighting police unit; the other was a Detroit-based federal drug investigation that uncovered West Michigan ties.

"Muskegon had some of the pieces, the DEA had some of the pieces," Green said. "It's a testament to the good cooperative relationship between the federal and the state and local law enforcement agencies."

That cooperation extended to the decision to prosecute Smith in federal court, with its potential of the stiffest possible prison sentence -- not an option under state law.

IMMIGRATION:

Tacoma Pastor Deported From South Korea To Face Fraud Sentence (AP)

AP, November 3, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. - A pastor who fled to South Korea after he was convicted of helping Korean nationals file fraudulent visa applications has been returned to Washington state for sentencing.

Dong Wan Park, 53, was convicted of conspiracy, visa fraud and obstruction of justice in June.

Prosecutors said that Park, pastor of Hope Korean Church, advertised in a Korean language newspapers that immigration visas were available through his church. He charged as much as $30,000 to provide people with visa paperwork including phony transcripts from a Korean seminary and a certificate of ordination from a Korean bishop.

None of the applicants was ever employed at the church, and none had any religious training.

During his trial, Park claimed the money received from visa applicants was either a loan or a donation to the church. Authorities said Park, who was released on bond, fled the country less than three weeks after the verdict.

The Department of Justice on Wednesday announced that he was returned to the country after Park's native South Korea decided to deport him back to the United States.

The Justice Department said that Park had wired $290,000 to a bank in South Korea after he persuaded church elders to authorize the sale of the church, which netted him $350,000.

Park, who faces up to 10 years in prison, is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 15 by U.S. District Judge Ronald Leighton.

TAX:

Snipes To Feds: Let's Make A Deal (EONLINE)

By Josh Grossberg

E! Online, November 3, 2006

Is Wesley Snipes ready to pay the piper?

A Justice Department spokesman told E! Online Thursday that the government has been working with the Blade star's lawyers on a deal in the actor's multimillion-dollar tax fraud case.

"We have been in contact with his representatives and are making progress as far as getting him to return to the U.S to face criminal charges," said Steve Cole of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Tampa, where the indictment was filed. "No timetable has been set."

Snipes is currently in Namibia filming the horror flick Gallowwalker. Although there is a warrant out for his arrest, the African country does not have an extradition treaty with the United States.

Meanwhile, Cole said his office was "not confirming or denying" a report in Thursday's Daily Variety that Snipes had reached a settlement with the Internal Revenue Service, which would keep him out of the big house and churning out B-grade action thrillers for years to come.

DOJ_NMG_0090893

Per the trade paper, Snipes will supposedly surrender to authorities when he returns to the States in December but won't be locked up. The report claims the actor has agreed to make good on millions of dollars in back taxes; in exchange, federal prosecutors purportedly have agreed to allow him to continue working to erase his debt.

Snipes' manager, David Schiff, declined to comment on the report.

The 44-year-old actor was indicted Oct. 17 for attempting to scam the IRS out of $12 million in fraudulent refunds from 1996 to 1997. Additionally, the actor was accused of not filing any returns from 1999 to 2004.

Prosecutors say Snipes conspired with two men, Eddie Ray Kahn and Douglas Rosile, to swindle the government using a discredited scheme known as the 861 Argument.

Kahn is the founder of two defunct organizations, the Florida-based American Rights Litigators and Guiding Light of God Ministries, which the indictment claims "promoted and sold fraudulent tax schemes." He had hightailed it to Panama following the indictment but was tracked down earlier this week and appeared at a bond hearing in a Florida federal court on Wednesday.

Rosile, an accountant for Kahn, turned himself in Oct. 17 and was released by a federal judge in Ocala. Prosecutors say Rosile and Kahn have a history of filing false tax returns to obtain huge windfalls for their clients, of which they'd collect upwards of 20 percent.

All told, Snipes faces charges of conspiracy to defraud the IRS, presenting a fraudulent claim for payment to the IRS, as well as six counts of failing to file income tax returns—and a warrant was issued for his arrest. If convicted on all charges, the actor could receive up to 16 years in prison.

Following the indictment, the feds immediately obtained a warrant, claiming they didn't know the actor's whereabouts. Days later, as Snipes was spotted working in Namibia, his lawyers reportedly began talks with prosecutors to try and resolve the case by suggesting a repayment plan. (For those playing the home game, it's the same strategy used by Willie Nelson to get him out of tax trouble several years ago.)

Senators Criticize IRS Filing Program (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, November 3, 2006

Leaders of the Senate Finance Committee say a deal between the Internal Revenue Service and private tax preparers that allows people to submit returns by computer is too restrictive and discourages electronic filing.

Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Max Baucus, D-Mont., said declines in participation in the Free File program show it is not working.

"If the tax preparation industry cannot provide free basic filing services without hidden costs and traps, perhaps it is time to consider having the IRS provide a direct filing portal to enable all taxpayers to file electronically without cost," they wrote IRS Commissioner Mark Everson on Thursday.

A recent report by an internal watchdog at the Treasury Department noted that fewer people were using the program after renegotiating of the contract between the IRS and the private industry that went into effect in January.

The IRS contends that report misstated the intent of Free File, which was to help a limited number of people with the most simple tax returns. The agency said a survey in June showed "an overwhelming level of taxpayer satisfaction with this program."

A record 70 million taxpayer transmitted returns through a computer this year, but only 3.8 million used the Free File program. That compared with about 5 million the previous year, when some private software companies offered their programs to everyone.

The new contract limited eligibility for free tax preparation software to 70 percent of taxpayers, which covers people not earning more than $50,000.

Grassley, the committee chairman, and Baucus, the top Democrat, said participating companies have used the Free File Web sites to market an array of other products with little oversight from the IRS. They said one site contained a link for taxpayers to purchase a tax preparation franchise for $15,500.

The senators noted that the Treasury inspector general praised the new contract for extending the program to allow Free File users to file for extensions. But they said companies are not obligated to provide the extension form on their Web sites until April 1. But under a now-disbanded program, taxpayers had the option of filing that form electronically to the IRS by telephone starting in early February.

Congress has been ambivalent about direct electronic filing. Grassley's committee last June backed legislation making it possible for individuals to file returns by computer without buying commercial software or paying a professional preparer.

But the House objected to the IRS competing with private tax preparation software companies. The House this year voted to prohibit the IRS from developing or providing free electronic tax preparation outside the Free File program.

DOJ_NMG_0090894

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Write New Prescription (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The Next Congress

Fifth of five parts

Democrats would use a new majority in Congress next year to highlight contentious health care issues such as high prescription-drug prices and funding for stem-cell research. Republicans, meanwhile, would push for an expansion of consumer-driven health care to reduce U.S. reliance on entitlement programs.

Democrats would face stiff opposition from the Bush administration on their health care agenda, which is why many specialists predict that even if the party wins the majority in Congress in next week's midterm elections, it will use its newfound control to define a health care agenda for the 2008 presidential election.

Gaining a majority would offer Democrats a chance to push their health care priorities at a level they haven't been able to since President Clinton occupied the White House.

"If the Democrats take one or both houses of Congress, the prospects of significant policy changes seem fairly remote," said Scott Lilly, senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Democrat-oriented research organization. "That does not mean the next two years will not be an important period. There is the possibility of a rich debate over policy options that the country has not had in more than half a decade -- in particular on health care."

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Congress, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times has looked at how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

Big plans

At the top of the Democrats' health care agenda is giving the federal government the ability to negotiate Medicare drug prices directly with the pharmaceutical companies.

"First, Democrats would repeal the ban on allowing Medicare to use the bargaining power of its 43 million beneficiaries to negotiate lower drug prices," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California has made it clear in recent weeks that the Democrats would make negotiating Medicare drug prices a high priority. Medicare is the federal health insurance program for seniors.

A Democratic majority also would focus on expanding health insurance for children and stem-cell research.

If Republicans retain their majority in Congress, they would push to improve the private health care system through an expansion of health savings accounts and tax deductions for people in private health plans.

"Republicans will continue to encourage the kinds of reforms that use public money to expand private health insurance," said John Goodman, president for the National Center for Policy Analysis, a Republican strategy firm. "The Democrats are going in the opposite direction."

Specialists agree that moving health care legislation — never an easy task — would be more difficult in a tightly divided Congress. And Democrats are aware that efforts to turn any of their health care priorities into law probably would be blocked by President Bush.

"I think the president's veto pen would certainly get a workout," said Joe Antos, health care policy specialist at the American Enterprise Institute. "But they know that and are looking to 2008."

Democrats are welcoming the opportunity to showcase health care issues that they say have not been given sufficient attention by the current Republican Congress.

"We are not going to blow in and push an overly aggressive agenda that has dim prospects because of the president's veto," said a House Democrat aide, who, citing office policy, spoke on the condition of anonymity. "We will, however, make it clear that we have been locked out for the last six years and we have an agenda."

A new prescription

The most visible confrontation between the parties is forming around the Democrats' push to require the government to use its negotiating power to lower prescription-drug costs for Medicare patients.

The 2003 Medicare law prohibits the government from negotiating with companies to lower the price of drugs for beneficiaries. The drug program has been criticized by Democrats, who say pharmaceutical companies are profiting at the expense of America's seniors.

DOJ_NMG_0090895

Separate deals with every private plan in the drug benefit is highly unlikely. Instead, Democrats hope to set up a single drug plan under Medicare that allows the government to negotiate prices.

"That's how you get at negotiations. Not with the private plans but with a Medicare plan option," the Democratic aide said. "We have a plan to do that."

Democrats would use the savings from lowered prices to close the coverage gap in the drug benefit. Sometimes referred to as the doughnut hole, annual coverage stops once drug costs reach $2,250. Coverage resumes when costs hit $5,100.

Republicans argue that prescription-drug plans are competing with each other to serve Medicare beneficiaries and thereby are lowering drug costs.

"We already have negotiations and drug prices are lower," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and chairman of the Finance Committee, which has oversight over the Medicare program.

Rep. Jim McCrery, a long-standing member of the Ways and Means Committee, which oversees Medicare policy in the House, says price negotiations will not solve Medicare's financial problems.

"There would still be a massive deficit even if we had negotiations," said Mr. McCrery, Louisiana Republican.

Democrats also are eyeing reimportation of low-cost drugs through countries such as Canada.

In the Senate, many Republicans, including Mr. Grassley, have supported reimporting drugs to lower prices. And an amendment to an appropriations bill that would loosen the restrictions was approved in the Senate.

"It is more likely the next Congress will pass a reimportation bill than a negotiation bill," Mr. Antos said. "Passing a negotiations bill would be admitting defeat for the Republicans on the Medicare drug benefit."

Giving insurance

Reaching America's growing number of uninsured residents will be a top priority for both parties next year.

Small employers are increasingly dropping employee health benefits as premiums rise. Thus, the number of uninsured people has risen steadily, reaching a record high 46 million in 2004.

"Our primary challenge next year will be the uninsured," said Rep. Nancy L. Johnson, Connecticut Republican and chairman of the House Ways and Means health subcommittee.

Republicans are pushing the expansion of consumer-driven programs such as health savings accounts, which were introduced in 2003 and allow workers to put their own money into tax-deferred savings accounts.

They want to allow workers to contribute more pre-tax money to the savings accounts to shift the burden off employers.

"Solving the problem of the uninsured should be done in the context of the private health care system, not by expanding Medicare. Health care savings accounts represent the best example of moving toward a better, more efficient health care system," Mr. McCrery said. "If we maintain control, we are going to enhance that product in the market."

Mr. Grassley agreed, saying an expansion of health savings accounts could pass in the Senate.

But Democrats remain opposed to relying on the accounts, which often come with high deductibles.

"There will be a huge fight from us on expanding health savings accounts," a House Democrat aide said.

Instead, Democrats would build on Medicare and Medicaid, the federal health program for the poor, and favor lowering the age for Medicare eligibility.

Protecting the children

The State Children's Health Insurance Program must be re-authorized in the next Congress. Both parties say the program is essential to reducing the number of uninsured.

The program, which covers about 6.1 million children, has reduced the number of uninsured children from nearly 11 million in 1997, when the program was created, to 8.3 million last year. Children up to the age of 19 in families that earn less than $36,200 a year are generally eligible for the program.

"This will be the most important battleground next year because the poster child on this issue is actually a child," Mr. Antos said.

Democrats are likely to push for increased funding and making the program a full-scale entitlement.

"Democrats see a real opportunity to take the next step toward covering all kids," Mr. Manley said.

Republicans, on the other hand, want to ensure that states are using the money on children rather adults, who should be covered through Medicaid, while giving states more freedom to use the federal money to get families into private health care.

"I think Republicans will want to keep the intent of the program intact, and that is covering children," a House Republican aide said. "We have wandered away from that."

A new debate

With additional seats in Congress, Democrats will try to capitalize on the stem-cell debate. Once an issue that Republicans relied on, Democrats are painting opposition to stem-cell research funding as out of the mainstream.

Democrats are using the issue against Republicans in 20 House, Senate and gubernatorial races across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0090896

"Our goal would be to enact the stem-cell bill strongly supported by the American public," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Mrs. Pelosi. "It is crucial that America keeps its No. 1 place in the world in the development of medical cures."

Mr. Bush vetoed a bill that would have permitted federal funding for experimentation with stem cells from donated embryos created for fertility treatments.

In the Senate, where there is strong support for stem-cell research, the Democrats would bring up the same bill that passed Congress last year, Mr. Manley said. Adding a Democrat-controlled House would give the bill a potential majority to override a veto.

"The president has drawn a moral line that said that taxpayer dollars should not support research that destroys human embryos. He will continue to strongly support policies that help us achieve scientific progress while also living up to our ethical responsibilities," said Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman.

Adding to the Democrats' momentum on stem-cell research is the Republican split on the issue. Prominent Republicans such as Sen. Orrin G. Hatch of Utah and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger support such research.

Republicans opposed to stem-cell research are targets for Democrats in the midterm elections. The issue has become a central focus in the Maryland Senate race between Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin Jr. and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele. Sen. Jim Talent, Missouri Republican, is taking heavy criticism for his opposition to a state ballot initiative that would allow such research.

"It is a high-profile issue that could be turned against Republicans in the midterm elections, and if the Democrats get Congress, it will be an issue the president will once again have to deal with," Mr. Goodman said.

Lessons learned

Regardless of the result of the midterm elections, Republicans and Democrats will take away lessons that will help shape their ideologies.

For Republicans, the near certainty of losing seats in both the Senate and House could force the party to look to the past for answers.

"There will be a growing number of Republicans that will argue in the postelection debate that walking away from the principles that defined the party for so many years will hurt them more in these elections than any scandal," said Michael Franc, vice president of government relations at the conservative-oriented Heritage Foundation.

High federal spending under the Republican-controlled Congress has led Americans to question whether the party is the standard-bearer for limited government, Mr. Franc said.

The Democrats, who are likely to fare better in this year's races than they have in more than a decade, could lead to a more moderate than liberal Democratic Party.

"If the lesson learned by the Democrats is don't be afraid of the big tent and they bring in more moderates, it could be a changed party," Mr. Franc said. "They could get a numerical majority rather than an ideological majority."

Part I

Democratic majority ready to go to war over Iraq

Part II

Democrats wait in the wings with subpoenas

Part III

Specter of tax man haunts Democrats

Part III

Bush may find an ally on immigration

From The Top Echelons, A Look Beyond The Elections (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Top policymakers who oversee federal management issues talk all the time in the privacy of their offices and are rarely seen in public together. But yesterday, five officials appeared together in public to discuss internal workings of the government.

They shared no secrets, talking in general terms about the urgency of reshaping the federal workforce, cleaning up the government's financial books and pulling the plug on duplicative technology systems.

It was, for the most part, a comfortable venue for the five -- four from the Office of Management and Budget and one from the Office of Personnel Management. They took questions from a lunchtime audience of about 200 current and former federal officials, scholars and public administration experts.

DOJ_NMG_0090897

Unmentioned were next week's congressional elections and poll-fed speculation that Democrats could take control of one or both houses of Congress. A Democratic Party victory, of course, would probably push the president's management agenda to the sidelines.

Still, a couple of the questioners had an eye to the future, asking the officials what they hoped to accomplish in the last two years of the Bush administration and whether they thought President Bush's management agenda would survive in the next White House.

Karen Evans , the OMB's technology chief, said she would find it hard to believe that the next president wouldn't care about privacy and cybersecurity issues. She promised to keep pushing agencies to shut down overlapping computer networks and produce long-term savings.

But she acknowledged that in the next administration, "you may see that [federal technology] investments will change . . . to support different priorities."

Paul Dennett , in charge of federal procurement policy at OMB, pledged to continue efforts aimed at putting federal work up for private-sector competition to see whether in-house teams or contractors can perform commercial activities at less cost. "It is very important that we make competitive sourcing work," he said.

The contracting initiative has been one of the most controversial workforce efforts undertaken by the administration, prompting union protests and some congressional restrictions.

Robert Shea , who has headed up a project to rate federal programs based on their performance, said he would urge the next White House to use a scorecard to track agencies' progress toward management goals.

Joining Shea, Evans and Dennett were Linda Combs , who handles financial management policy at the OMB, and Solly Thomas , the acting associate director at the OPM who oversees efforts to hold agencies accountable for managing their workforces.

The forum was sponsored by the IBM Center for the Business of Government, which sponsors research on how to improve the effectiveness of federal, state and local governments.Blair Named to Postal Commission

Dan G. Blair , deputy director at the OPM, will be nominated by the president to serve on the Postal Rate Commission and, upon confirmation, would be named as the panel's chairman, the White House announced yesterday.

Before joining the OPM in 2002, Blair was senior counsel for the old Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. He earlier served as staff director of the House government reform subcommittee on the Postal Service. At the OPM, he did a stint as acting director and has overseen efforts to streamline the federal hiring process and to improve recruitment of college graduates into the federal service.

The Postal Rate Commission is an independent agency that reviews Postal Service requests to increase the price of stamps and adjust domestic mail rates. The commission's recommendations are sent to the board of governors for the Postal Service.New Management Chief for DHS

Paul A. Schneider , a defense and aerospace consultant, has been named by the president to serve as undersecretary for management in the Department of Homeland Security, the White House said.

Schneider began his career in 1965 as a project engineer at a naval shipyard and has held several executive positions in the Navy. He also has served as the senior acquisition executive of the National Security Agency.

As management chief for Homeland Security, Schneider will oversee procurement, personnel, technology and budget policies affecting the 22 agencies that merged to become the department.Talk Shows

Robyn Kehoe , Washington representative for the Federal Employee Education & Assistance Fund, will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

R. David Paulison , director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

BearingPoint Could Lose Federal ID Card Contract (WP)

By Chris Kirkham

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The federal government has decided to reopen the bidding to produce hundreds of thousands of universal government identification cards, stripping the McLean consulting firm BearingPoint Inc. of a potential five-year contract.

It is an unusual move for the General Services Administration, coming just two months into the $104 million contract. BearingPoint will continue to develop ID cards for government employees and contractors through early January, after which the GSA will either ask for more bids or allow agencies to choose from an approved list of vendors.

GSA officials said the decision had nothing to do with BearingPoint's performance but rather that the agency felt there were more companies that could develop the appropriate technology. The cards make use of biometric data such as fingerprints and retinal scans and contain computer chips that can store more personal information. GSA officials say that with more options, they can command lower prices.

"I wouldn't say this is a dropping of anybody but an evolution that is underway," said John C. Johnson, assistant commissioner for integrated technology services at the GSA's Federal Acquisition Service. "This is not a judgment on BearingPoint or anyone else."

BearingPoint spokesman Steve Lunceford said the company has been "privileged" to work on the contract and is determined to compete after it expires. The firm has issued about 100 ID cards in Washington, New York, Atlanta and Seattle, according to the GSA.

"We feel we've got the leading solution, and we look forward to welcoming further competition," Lunceford said.

The GSA's announcement is the latest hurdle facing the company. BearingPoint has not filed timely financial statements in more than two years after inheriting accounting and other problems from its days as part of KPMG. More recently, it has been wrangling with its lenders over the terms of bonds worth $200 million.

As part of the White House mandate for universal ID cards across the government, all federal agencies are up against an October 2008 deadline to issue the cards to an estimated 8 million employees and contractors. Each agency may hire its own contractor, but the GSA's smart-card program is meant to be an alternative for agencies that prefer not to. BearingPoint was developing cards for 38 agencies.

Since BearingPoint was awarded the contract in mid-August, competing firms, including Lockheed Martin Corp. and Electronic Data Systems Corp., objected to the selection, forcing BearingPoint to stop work for about 10 days. Some industry experts suspect that the GSA might have feared further protests and decided to move to a different purchasing system.

Under this system, government agencies would buy products from an approved list of vendors under terms already negotiated by the GSA. The alternative purchasing system also would allow state and local governments to buy any ID services offered.

BearingPoint, Lockheed Martin and Electronic Data Systems are among the 10 companies on the approved list, and the GSA said it expects more to qualify in upcoming months.

Thomas Greco, a vice president at Herndon-based Cybertrust Inc., which is working with BearingPoint to develop the ID technology, said more companies have adjusted in recent months to the stringent government requirements on the IDs.

"Some of the thinking within the GSA may be there's more people on the list, so there's more chance to get better pricing," Greco said. "I think this is truly GSA just taking another bite at the apple."

Staff writer Stephen Barr contributed to this report.

Infant-Care Rule Cites Immigrants In U.S. Illegally (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2 — Under a new federal policy, children born in the United States to illegal immigrants with low incomes will no longer be automatically entitled to health insurance through Medicaid, Bush administration officials said Thursday.

Doctors and hospitals said the policy change would make it more difficult for such infants, who are United States citizens, to obtain health care needed in the first year of life.

Illegal immigrants are generally barred from Medicaid but can get coverage for treatment of emergency medical conditions, including labor and delivery.

In the past, once a woman received emergency care under Medicaid for the birth of a baby, the child was deemed eligible for coverage as well, and states had to cover the children for one year from the date of birth.

Under the new policy, an application must be filed for the child, and the parents must provide documents to prove the child's citizenship.

The documentation requirements took effect in July, but some states have been slow to enforce them, and many doctors are only now becoming aware of the effects on newborns.

Obtaining a birth certificate can take weeks in some states, doctors said. Moreover, they said, illegal immigrant parents may be reluctant to go to a state welfare office to file applications because they fear contact with government agencies that could report their presence to immigration authorities.

Administration officials said the change was necessary under their reading of a new law, the Deficit Reduction Act, signed by President Bush in February. The law did not mention newborns, but generally tightened documentation requirements because some lawmakers were concerned that immigrants were fraudulently claiming United States citizenship to get Medicaid.

DOJ_NMG_0090899

Marilyn E. Wilson, a spokeswoman for the Tennessee Medicaid program, said: "The federal government told us we have no latitude. All states must change their policies and practices. We will not be able to cover any services for the newborn until a Medicaid application is filed. That could be days, weeks or months after the child is born."

About four million babies are born in the United States each year, and Medicaid pays for more than one-third of all births. The number involving illegal immigrant parents is unknown but is likely to be in the tens of thousands, health experts said.

Doctors and hospitals denounced the policy change and denied that it was required by the new law. Dr. Jay E. Berkelhamer, president of the American Academy of Pediatrics, said the policy "punishes babies who, according to the Constitution, are citizens because they were born here."

Dr. Martin C. Michaels, a pediatrician in Dalton, Ga., said that continuous coverage in the first year of life was important because "newborns need care right from the start."

"Some Americans may want to grant amnesty to undocumented immigrants, and others may want to send them home," Dr. Michaels said. "But the children who are born here had no say in that debate."

Under a 1984 law, infants born to pregnant women on Medicaid are in most cases deemed eligible for Medicaid for one year.

In an interview on Thursday, Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the new policy "reflects what the new law says in terms of eligibility."

"When emergency Medicaid pays for a birth," Ms. Norwalk said, "the child is not automatically deemed eligible. But the child could apply and could qualify for Medicaid because of the family's poverty status. If anyone knows about a child being denied care, we want to know about it. Please step up and tell us."

Under federal law, hospitals generally have to examine and treat patients who need emergency care, regardless of their ability to pay. So the new policy is most likely to affect access to other types of care, including preventive services and treatment for infections and chronic conditions, doctors said.

Representative Charlie Norwood, Republican of Georgia, was a principal architect of the new law.

"Charlie's intent was that every person receiving Medicaid needs to provide documentation," said John E. Stone, a spokesman for Mr. Norwood, who is a dentist and has been active on health care issues. "With newborns, there should be no problem. All you have to do is provide a birth certificate or hospital records verifying birth."

But Dr. Berkelhamer disagreed. Even when the children are eligible for Medicaid, he said, illegal immigrants may be afraid to apply because of "the threat of deportation."

The new policy "will cost the health care system more in the long run," Dr. Berkelhamer added, because children of illegal immigrants may go without immunizations, preventive care and treatments needed in the first year of life.

Doctors, children's hospitals and advocacy groups have been urging states to preserve the old policy on Medicaid eligibility for children born to illegal immigrants.

Sara Rosenbaum, a professor of health law at George Washington University, said: "The new policy reflects a tortured reading of the new law and is contrary to the language of the 1984 statute, which Congress did not change. The whole purpose of the earlier law, passed with bipartisan support, was to make sure that a baby would not have a single day's break in coverage from the date of birth through the first year of life."

California has objected to the new policy. S. Kimberly Belshé, secretary of the California Health and Human Services Agency, said: "By virtue of being born in the United States, a child is a U.S. citizen. What more proof does the federal government need?"

Health Groups Raise Child Care Fears (WP/AP)

By Kevin Freking, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Several health groups are concerned that babies born to illegal immigrants could be denied essential medical care such as immunizations and physicals because of recent changes to Medicaid.

The babies automatically are U.S. citizens because they were born in U.S. hospitals. Under past policy, the groups said, the government required states to provide the babies with a full year of eligibility for Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poor.

Now, mothers of the newborns will have to apply for Medicaid on behalf of their newborns, which many will not want to risk, say groups such as the American Academy of Pediatrics, the American Academy of Family Physicians and the March of Dimes.

Medicaid officials are skeptical about the groups' claims.

Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said in an interview Thursday that her agency investigated and found no case where a baby was denied care under Medicaid.

DOJ_NMG_0090900

"If people know of an instance where a state has denied eligibility because someone couldn't produce evidence of citizenship in particular among the most vulnerable, we would be interested in knowing about that," she said.

New federal rules say a child born in the United States to "an illegal alien mother is not a deemed newborn" _ and therefore not automatically eligible for Medicaid. States may make exceptions on the basis of income.

The rules were in response to a new law designed to ensure that only citizens or qualified legal immigrants gain access to Medicaid.

The medical groups said denying newborns access to Medicaid would cost the health care system more in the long run.

"Preventive care saves money for states that provide Medicaid coverage and the federal government that helps pay for it," the groups wrote the Medicaid agency. "Some infants require immediate post-delivery care for conditions or illnesses detected immediately after birth."

The organizations said some doctors, already facing reduced Medicaid reimbursements, would be reluctant to care for these children.

The letter did not cite any specific cases where care had been denied. But the American Academy of Pediatrics had singled out four states _ Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia _ as denying health care coverage to babies born to illegal immigrants.

Asked Thursday for specifics, the pediatric group could not provide statistics. Instead, the organization cited the potential for care being withheld.

Norwalk said her agency contacted each of the four states. Medicaid directors there knew of no cases where access to the program had been denied to babies of illegal immigrants, she said.

Dr. Martin Michaels, president of the academy's Georgia chapter, said documenting a baby's eligibility for Medicaid is as simple as submitting a page from the child's medical record showing the child was born in Georgia. But the question is whether families will be willing to do that.

"Some families will be afraid they could get deported and separated from the child," he said.

OTHER NEWS:

US Productivity Growth Stalls (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

US productivity growth stalled in the third quarter, while unit labour costs continued to rise at a strong clip, heightening the dilemma for the Federal Reserve as it seeks to balance the risks from a slowdown in growth and stubbornly high inflation.

The slowdown in productivity, which was flat over the quarter and up only 1.3 per cent over the previous year, was largely the consequence of slowing growth.

But it could also signal that the underlying rate of productivity growth in the US is declining. Unit labour costs rose at an annualised rate of 3.8 per cent, considerably faster than the core rate of inflation as measured by the personal consumption expenditure deflator. But while the increase in unit labour costs is a potential source of concern on inflation, the rate of growth has slowed since the first half of this year.

The latest data on productivity and costs underscores why the Fed is unlikely to cut rates imminently, in spite of continued economic fragility. Further evidence of this came this week with a fall in the ISM manufacturing index, a gauge of manufacturing activity. The ISM index declined for the third consecutive month to 51.2 points. Most regional manufacturing surveys have also come in weak.

Figures released last week showed US third-quarter gross domestic product growth fell to 1.6 per cent. Most analysts expect growth will rebound in the current fourth quarter, as lower oil prices depress imports, though it will probably remain below trend. Some analysts fear an inventory correction could hold back any rebound. There was a further suggestion of the fragility of the economy yesterday as initial jobless claims increased by 18,000 to 327,000 last week, above a consensus forecast of 310,000.

Gary Bigg, an economist at Bank of America Securities, said the rise in new jobless claims was a sign of weakness in demand.

However, Jan Hatzius, an economist at Goldman Sachs, said that the new claims were offset by the drop in continuing claims, which fell 27,000 to 2.4m last week, suggesting “decent hiring continues”.

Mr Hatzius said the data likely to be of more concern to the Fed were those showing that “labour costs continue to grow at a fairly high rate”.

DOJ_NMG_0090901

However, while unit labour costs have been rising over the last two years, partly due to slipping productivity, profit margins remain high by historic standards.

Economic Reports Likely To Complicate Fed's Decision-making (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve's job isn't getting easier.

Recent economic data, including Thursday's report that productivity growth sputtered this summer, while wages rose at the fastest pace in two decades, has the central bank caught between what economist Allen Sinai calls "recessionlike" slow growth and "sticky high" inflation.

"Nobody … can be sure how this is all going to end up. Are we going to bounce back … or is the housing and auto (industry) softness going to spread?" asks Sinai, head of Decision Economics.

The Labor Department said Thursday that productivity, or output per worker, stalled from July to September, as labor costs jumped at an annual rate of 3.8%. Business labor costs spiked 5.3% in the past 12 months, a pace last exceeded in the early 1980s.

While accelerating wages are good for workers, whose compensation has been lagging behind inflation, they can breed inflation.

Other recent data show retail sales lagging. Manufacturing is being slowed by weakness in the auto industry. The housing market, after a record five-year run, is in a rout, with construction off nearly 20% from a year ago. After growing at a 5.6% annual rate in the first quarter, the economy expanded at a lackluster 1.6% pace in the third.

The Fed had predicted a slowdown, expecting more muted growth to gradually cut inflation. Core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy prices because of their volatility, has been 2.9% in the past year, above the Fed's informal 1% to 2% comfort range. After raising short-term interest rates 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to control inflation, the Fed has held steady at 5.25% since August.

Dallas Fed President Richard Fisher in a Thursday speech said inflation seems to be peaking but remains too high. He added that the Fed contributed to the current housing slump by keeping rates at a low 1% too long after the 2001 recession. The Fed's decision was based on data that later turned out to understate inflation.

"Poor data led to a policy action that amplified speculative activity," Fisher said, adding that the slumping housing market is complicating Fed efforts to create "sustainable non-inflationary growth."

If the Fed pushes rates higher to combat inflation, it could further hurt the interest-sensitive auto and housing sectors. A rate cut to combat slowing growth is dicey with inflation still so high.

Economists will be watching October employment figures to be released today by the Labor Department. Because the slowdown is centered in housing and autos while other sectors are growing, unemployment could stay low longer than expected, Sinai says, adding that slower growth so far "isn't showing any obvious effect on inflation other than perhaps to limit its rise."

Sales Cool For Most Retailers Ahead Of Holidays Department Stores Continue To Ring Up Solid Increases (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Department stores kept their momentum heading into the critical holiday season, but many other retailers are finding the going tougher.

Including the likes of Nordstrom Inc. and Kohl's Corp., department stores rang up strong sales of fall fashions as cool temperatures stoked demand for coats, sweaters, leggings and other cold-weather gear, according to October sales results issued yesterday by most major chain stores.

Many specialty retailers and discounters were disappointments. And the slower-than-expected pace of sales overall added to worries about whether middle-income consumers will continue spending amid a shaky housing market.

As shoppers bundled up2 in new clothes in the autumn chill, some major retailers were celebrating but others were left out in the cold. Chart data for a dozen major retailers and see highlights and lowlights from the past year.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said it had its worst showing since December 2000, with only a 0.5% gain in same-store sales, confirming a preview it had given Saturday. Moreover, Wal-Mart said November same-store sales would be flat with a year earlier. The forecast raised concerns that the world's largest retailer would begin discounting heavily, putting pressure on competitors to cut prices.

DOJ_NMG_0090902

"Put it all together and you have a decent picture," said Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group based in New York. "But it's a tale of two consumers: the department-store shopper is buying like there's no tomorrow, but then you have everybody else."

Wal-Mart's showing dragged down the overall monthly tally for the industry. According to an index of 46 major chains compiled by Lazard Capital Markets, sales at stores open at least a year, known as same-store sales, rose 2.3%. That was short of the investment firm's 2.8% estimate, as well as the index's 3.8% gain in September.

SALES CALL

3

See a transcript4 of Wal-Mart's pre-recorded sale call, provided by Thomson StreetEvents (www.streetevents.com5). Adobe Acrobat required6

A number of chains reported that profit margins were healthy, as a shopping frenzy in September left less inventory on their sales floors. J.C. Penney Co. and American Eagle Outfitters Inc. raised their forecasts for third-quarter earnings and Limited Brands Inc. said results would be better than Wall Street's estimates.

Same-store sales are considered key indicators of both the industry's health and trends in U.S. consumer spending. But the figures don't provide a complete picture. They don't include many online purchases, and some large retailers, such as Home Depot Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp., don't report monthly sales.

Wal-Mart blamed its poor showing on a store-remodeling program that disrupted traffic and sluggish demand for fall apparel, including its trendy new Metro 7 line. The retailer said its fashion woes will continue to hurt results through the holiday season.

The chain's flat forecast for November was "a big disappointment," said Arun Daniel, an analyst at ING Investment Management Inc., which owns about four million Wal-Mart shares. Investors were hoping that Wal-Mart's lower-income customers would ramp up spending following a drop in gasoline prices.

"It's taking longer than anybody anticipated -- including me," Mr. Daniel said. He added that he expects Wal-Mart to get more aggressive on pricing this month.

Costco Wholesale Corp. reported a 4% gain in same-store sales. Still, that gain fell short of the 4.6% increase analysts had expected, according to Thomson Financial. Target Corp. posted a 3.9% rise that was in line with its forecast for growth of 3% to 5%, but the gain was below the 4.2% increase expected by analysts, according to Thomson.

Gap Inc. continued to struggle despite its recent "skinny black pants" theme and the launch of "Project Red," a clothing line tied to a campaign against AIDS in Africa. Same-store sales fell 7% in October, steeper than the 2.7% drop analysts had expected.

Teen retailers Pacific Sunwear of California Inc. and Hot Topic Inc. each posted same-store sales declines of more than 7%, while sales at Abercrombie & Fitch Co. fell 3%.

It also was a bumpy month for women's clothiers. AnnTaylor Stores Corp. reported a 0.5% decline amid weakness at its lower-priced Loft chain. Chico's FAS Inc. posted a 4.1% decrease and said third-quarter earnings will fall short of analysts' expectations. Talbots Inc., which doesn't report monthly sales, said same-store sales for the third quarter rose 2.3%, but sales slowed in late October. The company didn't change its third-quarter profit outlook, but its shares fell more than 3%.

Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said same-store sales rose a healthy 7.7%. That figure excludes results from more than 400 stores Federated acquired last year from May Department Stores Co. Those stores, which were converted to Macy's in September and nearly doubled the size of the chain, "continued to lag," Federated said.

The former May stores are likely giving up customers to other chains as Federated takes them more upscale under the Macy's brand, said Stephen Hoch, a marketing professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. Midprice department stores, Kohl's and J.C. Penney among them, also continue to benefit from 78 store closings since the Federated-May merger, he said, adding: "That left a bunch of money on the table."

Retail Sales Show Mostly Rich Shop Till They Drop (USAT)

By Mindy Fetterman

USA Today, November 3, 2006

In the retail world, the holidays are shaping up to be a case study in the haves and have-nots.

Which side a retailer falls on depends on its customers: Do they have money? Or are times tight?

If the customers are “upmarket,” where their incomes are rising and their personal economy is good, retailers are doing well. Such as Saks and Nordstrom.

If customers are “downmarket,” where the cost of gasoline is hurting and raises are few, they aren't doing as well. Such as Wal-Mart and Target.

DOJ_NMG_0090903

On Thursday, that divide became clearer as retailers reported sales for October.

Wal-Mart said U.S. sales at stores open at least a year were basically flat compared with a year ago, while Target's same-store sales rose 3.9%. But Saks' same-store sales were up 9.2% and Nordstrom's 10.7%

"There's a huge split in the consumer base that's really creating a polarization in the market," says Sheila McCusker, editor of Information Resources' Times & Trends, which studies consumer shopping trends.

Higher gas prices have cut sharply into the spending power of lower-income Americans, while job and income growth have been enjoyed mainly by higher-income Americans.

"They're polar opposites in terms of how the economy is affecting them," says Frank Badillo, senior economist at Retail Forward, which studies retail trends.

Looking ahead to the holidays, the majority of shoppers surveyed by Retail Trends said they will spend about the same this year as last. But many more lower-income shoppers than affluent shoppers said they plan to spend much less.

Higher gas prices are fueling a trend that had already begun among all shoppers no matter their income: fewer trips but more spending per trip.

When gas prices hit an average of $2.75 a gallon in the spring, "Shoppers started consolidating trips, trying to do more in any given trip," says McCusker.

Information Resources found that the average number of trips taken fell 4.6% in the spring and 3.9% in the summer, when gasoline was at $2.95 a gallon.

The pain has been felt most by mass retailers such as Wal-Mart and Target. Wal-Mart acknowledges that customers are making fewer trips but says its sales per trip are rising.

The biggest beneficiary of higher gas prices have been drugstores, where hurried consumers can dash in and out quickly for a couple of items, McCusker says. The average number of trips to drugstores rose 1.9% in the summer.

"Supercenters are farther out," says McCusker. "… As consumers start weighing what to do, they've chosen (a closer) location."

Dow Slips Again On Retail, Productivity Data (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average flirted with the 12000 level again, but this time on the downside, as the market fell because of weak economic data.

Reports of surprisingly soft retail sales and productivity, coupled with a bigger increase in jobless claims than analysts anticipated, ratcheted up investors' worries that the current economic slowdown might be worse than expected. In recent months, many on Wall Street have been hoping for a gradual softening, which would shake out excess financial speculation but leave workers and consumers unscathed and keep corporate profits strong.

The part about strong profits has held up so far. Investors are increasingly worried about the rest of the formula.

"Sometimes you get what you want and you realize that maybe you didn't want it," said Michael Cuggino, president and portfolio manager for the Permanent Portfolio Family of Funds. He said he believes the economy "is stronger than a lot of people give it credit for," but he understands why this week's string of tepid data has worried some investors.

At its low yesterday, the Dow was off more than 52 points, below the 12000 level that it closed above for the first time Oct. 19. The blue-chip average trimmed its losses but finished down for the fifth straight day, off 12.48 points, or 0.1%, at 12018.54, up 12.1% on the year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished down at 1367.34, off 0.47 point, but up 9.5% year to date. The Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 0.33 point to 2334.02, up 5.8% year to date.

Wal-Mart Stores, a Dow component, reported that U.S. same-store sales rose 0.5% in October, the slowest growth in nearly six years, and predicted November's sales would be the same as a year earlier. Rivals Costco Wholesale and Target reported disappointing same-store sales, in part blaming difficult comparisons with the year-earlier period, when their stores were bustling amid the Gulf Coast's recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

A decline in crude-oil prices eased the stock market's losses. Crude futures for December delivery slid 83 cents, or 1.4%, to a two-week low of $57.88 a barrel, off 5.2% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell, and bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.602%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.11 yen from 117.04. The euro rose to $1.2777, compared with $1.2755.

DOJ_NMG_0090904

Fed Official Says Bad Data Helped Fuel Rate Cuts, Housing Speculation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

In an apparent and rare in-house critique, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas said that because of faulty inflation data, the Fed kept interest rates too low for too long earlier this decade, fueling speculative housing activity.

A number of critics have said the Fed under former chairman Alan Greenspan kept monetary policy too easy from 2003 to 2004. But Richard Fisher's remarks to the New York Association for Business Economics yesterday mark the first time some Fed watchers could recall a sitting Fed policy maker making such comments.

Mr. Fisher said from 2002 to early 2003, inflation, as measured by the price index of personal consumption expenditures (PCE) excluding food and energy, was running below 1%. That suggested that a serious shock to the economy could turn inflation to deflation, or generally falling prices. Deflation makes it much harder for the Fed to boost growth by engineering deeply negative real, that is inflation-adjusted, interest rates.

To reduce the risk of deflation, the Fed lowered its target for the Fed funds rate -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- to 1% in June 2003 and held it there until mid-2004. It has since raised it to 5.25%.

Mr. Fisher noted that subsequent revisions show PCE inflation was actually a half a percentage point higher than originally estimated. "In retrospect, the real Fed funds rate turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time and was held lower longer than it should have been," Mr. Fisher said.

"In this case, poor data led to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today...the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country. It is complicating the [Fed's] task of achieving...sustainable noninflationary growth."

Mr. Fisher, who took office in April last year, said in an interview that his speech wasn't meant to be a criticism of the decisions Mr. Greenspan and the FOMC made then. He said: "I wasn't at the table at the time -- it's easy to look at things with 20-20 hindsight. The point is we need to continue to improve our ability to develop and work with better data."

Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs, called Mr. Fisher's remarks "pretty striking," while noting it is Mr. Fisher's style to be opinionated. He added that while he agrees the Fed's policy from 2002 to 2004 fueled speculative housing-bubble activity, it was still reasonable "knowing what you knew at the time. You take out some insurance against a really bad, low-probability outcome, and after the fact you regret having paid the insurance premium."

Mr. Fisher said inflation, at about 2.5% now, is still higher than his "comfort zone," but it is possible it "has peaked and is finally heading lower."

Fed governor Susan Bies echoed that sentiment in a speech to Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, saying, "inflation appears poised to decelerate in coming months... but the risks to that outlook seem tilted toward the upside."

The Rich Are Getting Much Richer, Much Faster Than Everyone Else (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Over the past quarter-century, and especially in the last 10 years, America's very rich have grown much richer. No one else fared as well.

In 2004, the richest 1 percent of households - 719,910 of them, with an average annual income of $326,720 - had 19.8 percent of the entire nation's pretax income. That's up from 17.8 percent a year earlier, according to a study by University of California-Berkeley economist Emmanuel Saez.

The study, titled "The Evolution of Top Incomes," also found that the richest one-tenth of 1 percent of Americans - 129,584 households in 2004 - reported income equal to 9.5 percent of national pretax income.

However, median, or midpoint, family income rose only 1.6 percent between 2001 and 2004, when adjusted for inflation, according to the Federal Reserve. Median family real net worth - a family's gross assets minus liabilities - rose only 1.5 percent during those four years.

Those are very sluggish income-growth rates compared with the four years between 1998 and 2001, when median family income grew by 9.5 percent and median family real net worth grew by 10.3 percent.

Experts disagree on the causes, but they're in near agreement that this trend threatens to erode a fundamental American belief about fairness.

"It's not the actual getting ahead in America that's so important - it's been Americans' deep belief that they have the opportunity to get ahead. And if you lose that, there's damage to our society," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who until last year was the director of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and before that was chief economist for President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0090905

In coming years, income inequality is sure to be a rallying cry in political debates over everything from raising the minimum wage to federal spending on education to overhauling the tax code.

Most theories on why the rich are getting richer focus on why everyone else isn't. Some explanations include the declining power of labor, the influx of illegal immigrants, the offshoring of jobs and global competition that holds down wage growth.

Education has widened income inequality, too. Americans with college degrees earn nearly twice as much as those without them.

But education hasn't been a ticket to income growth lately.

Between 2000 and 2005, workers with four-year college degrees saw their wages fall 3.1 percent, adjusted for inflation. Only two groups, who together make up just 3.4 percent of the workforce, saw inflation-adjusted wages rise. They were workers with doctoral degrees or specialty degrees, such as medicine or law, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The soaring pay enjoyed by top CEOs, athletes and entertainers also has added to the widening income divide.

"I'm thinking Tiger Woods causes some income inequality," said Holtz-Eakin. "All of that seems to be part of this, but it still leaves you with a sense of not knowing exactly what it is."

There's a simpler explanation. The very wealthy simply own more assets than the rest of us. That means they benefit more from the booming stock market, which is reaching record highs.

Since 1926, stocks have given investors an average annual return of about 10 percent (with large fluctuations, depending on the years). In 2004, the wealthiest 10 percent of Americans were almost three times more likely to own stock than the broad universe of U.S. families, according to the Federal Reserve.

The median value of stock holdings for the wealthiest 10 percent of Americans was $110,000 per household in 2004, according to Morgan Stanley, the banking giant. The value of stocks held by the other 90 percent of Americans averaged $8,350.

Those numbers lead some to question the fairness of Bush's 2003 tax cuts, which lowered the top rate at which capital gains and dividends are taxed. Individual income tax rates in the top four income brackets were also lowered to 25, 28, 33 and 35 percent.

"We've had a 30-year trend of income inequality. What's new in the last five years is the degree to which tax policy has made that worse, rather than leaned against that trend," said Jason Furman, a senior fellow for the liberal Center for Budget and Policy Priorities and an economist at New York University.

If Democrats capture the House of Representatives on Tuesday, they won't immediately set about trying to reverse the Bush-era tax cuts. Rep. Charles Rangel of New York would head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and he's said he won't seek a rollback but will vigorously oppose extending the cuts beyond 2010, the year they're set to expire.

Some conservatives fear that Democrats will seek to redistribute wealth by revamping the tax code to address income inequality. They defend the status quo by pointing to tax data showing that the rich contribute the greatest share of taxes.

In 2003, the wealthiest 10 percent held 37.2 percent of national income, a 50.2 percent share of all federal tax liabilities and a 69.6 percent share of individual income tax liabilities, according to a Congressional Budget Office tax study.

"We've redistributed income about as much as we can," said James Glassman, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank in Washington.

Cheney Tries To Get GOP Base Energized (MN)

By Michael Jamison

Missoulian (Montana), November 3, 2006

KALISPELL - At a rally intended to get out the Republican vote, Vice President Dick Cheney touted the national GOP agenda, saying the re-election of Conrad Burns was critical to continuing the Bush administration's efforts in Washington, D.C., and abroad.

“I look forward to swearing him in for another term in the United States Senate come January,” Cheney said.

Burns, a three-term senator from Montana, was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1988. This year, the incumbent is considered one of the most vulnerable GOP candidates, locked in a tight race with Democratic challenger Jon Tester.

The narrow margins indicated by repeated polls have brought political heavyweights to Montana, hoping to tip the scales in favor of Burns. This was Cheney's second visit to the Flathead Valley in three months, an effort, said Brock Lowrance, to “get out the message that it's important to come out and vote.”

Lowrance is communication director for the Republican Party in Montana, and he predicted Cheney's visit would help Republicans “all the way down the ticket.” In fact, most of the Flathead's GOP political hopefuls were on hand Wednesday, hoping the vice presidential visit would, in fact, float all boats.

“This is a way to rally the GOP base to the polls,” Lowrance said of Cheney's visit. “There's a lot of support for our candidates in the Flathead, and at this point, it's a turnout game.”

DOJ_NMG_0090906

But getting the turnout is hard work, Burns said, noting that his party is contacting 11,000 Montana voters every day in this last push to Nov. 7.

"Don't go vote alone," Burns told the crowd, "take someone with you."

Cheney visited the Flathead again because it has proved strong Republican territory, Lowrance said, which is the same reason President Bush has planned a Burns campaign stop in Billings on Thursday.

Tester, likewise, is playing to his base in this last week of the election season, with stops scheduled in Bozeman, Missoula and Butte.

"All we're focused on for the next six days is turning out supporters on Election Day," Lowrance said.

And according to Cheney, it will be a very important Election Day. At shortly after 5 p.m., Cheney and wife Lynn walked into the Majestic Valley Arena north of Kalispell - a place better known for rodeo, monster trucks and amateur boxing - and was met by rowdy applause from more than 1,000 GOP stalwarts. His podium was flanked by hay bales, saddles and flags draped across straw.

"It's great to be with you," Cheney said, "back in Big Sky country."

Cheney called on the party activists to "do everything we can to make sure that we get that Republican ticket elected six days from now."

At stake, he said, is control of Congress. Should power shift to the Democrats, Cheney warned, taxes will go up, security will go down and the economy will stagnate.

Cheney predicted Bush administration tax cuts would disappear under Democratic control, and warned that both the war in Iraq and the broader war on terror would be compromised should Republicans fail to retain power in the capital.

He praised Burns and Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Mont., saying the politicians were "superb public servants." The U.S. Senate, he said, is a "mixed bag" of personalities, but added that "one of the senators I like and respect the most is Conrad Burns."

Cheney called Burns a leader in agricultural issues, in energy and military security and public land use, saying the incumbent is known for "clear thinking and common sense."

That the praise was unequivocal came as no surprise, and campaigners said they had no concerns that widespread voter frustration with White House policy might make such high-profile endorsements a liability.

"The president and vice president are always welcome in Montana," Lowrance said. "It creates a real energy."

Some of that energy was seen protesting along U.S. Highway 93, as Democratic activists bundled against the cold and carried signs that condemned the "borrow-and-spend conservatives," asking "who's paying for these visits?"

But inside the arena, the crowd remained solidly Republican, loudly booing any mention of Democrats.

Cheney keyed hard on the need for continued military might around the world, noting that "to win this war, America needs the Patriot Act."

Burns, he said, "voted for the Patriot Act, and he's the only Senate candidate in Montana who wants to keep it. That alone is a great reason to vote for him next Tuesday."

Bush Blasts Dems As He Stumps For Burns (USAT)

USA Today, November 3, 2006

President Bush took his "Democrats are soft on terror and oppose conservative judges" campaign theme to Montana on Thursday, trying to rally support of endangered GOP Sen. Conrad Burns. Burns is locked in a tight battle against state Senate President Jon Tester.

Tester was campaigning with Gov. Brian Schweitzer and Sen. Max Baucus, both Democrats.

Bush chided Democrats who he said voted against legislation to detain and interrogate suspected terrorists, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program and the USA Patriot Act. He stressed that when voters cast their ballots, they will be deciding what kind of judges sit on federal courts.

Bush also predicted that Republicans will retain control of Congress, just as they retained control of the White House in 2004 when Democrats, he said, were measuring the West Wing for their furniture.

"The movers never got the call," Bush said. "The same thing is going to happen on Nov. 7. We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

Pentagon defends military voting system

The Defense Department defended a new military voting program that lets servicemembers request and submit ballots by fax or e-mail. Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, said the electronic registration and voting service is well-intentioned but could expose troops to identity theft or allow hackers to tamper with ballots.

DOJ_NMG_0090907

The Defense Department said the system is as secure as possible and that risks are detailed for military members when they access the e-mail system. “We have taken every precaution to limit those risks,” Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said.

Dems accuse GOP of intimidation in Md.

Maryland Democrats accused Republicans of launching a “conscious, premeditated” campaign of voter intimidation after a report described a handbook advising Republican poll watchers to challenge the credentials of any voters they suspect are fraudulent. The handbook urges poll watchers to warn election judges that they could face jail time if they fail to act.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., accused the GOP of “a conscious, premeditated plan of voter intimidation and voter suppression.” State Republican Party Chairman John Kane denied any intimidation, saying the goal was to ensure that no fraud takes place.

Houston mayor halts free flu shots at polls

Houston stopped offering free flu shots at early-voting sites after Republicans alleged it was a ploy by Mayor Bill White to lure more Democrats to the polls. The vaccinations, for people ages 50 and older, had been offered at early voting sites in predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods. Health officials said they were targeting medically underserved areas, not Democratic neighborhoods. “There was no political motive whatsoever” behind the shots, White said. Harris County Republican Chairman Jared Woodfill said he doubted that and said the offer violated a state law that bars accepting freebies in exchange for votes.

Ethanol gaffe encourages GOP in Minn.

Minnesota lieutenant governor candidate Judi Dutcher apologized and blamed a long, hard campaign for her response to a question this week about E85. “It's like you've asked me the college quiz bowl question,” the Democrat had said. “What is E85?”

E85 is a blend of 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline. Demand for petroleum alternatives would be a boost for Minnesota farmers because corn is the top source of ethanol. Dutcher is the running mate of Mike Hatch, who is in a tight race against GOP Gov. Tim Pawlenty. Dutcher, appearing with Hatch, blamed “one of those times when your brain doesn't kick it into gear.” Pawlenty, who promotes ethanol, questioned Dutcher's qualifications. Hatch's response: “He's not running against Judi Dutcher, he's running against me. I know a hell of a lot more about ethanol than Gov. Pawlenty.”

Wash. school bus driver ‘not a fan' of Bush

A Seattle school bus driver, fired after she reportedly made an obscene gesture at President Bush, has filed a union grievance in an attempt to get her job back. School District spokeswoman Sara Niegowski said the firing was not politically motivated: “The bus driver was terminated for making an obscene gesture in view of the students.” The driver, whose name was not released, was driving middle school children back to school after a zoo visit June 16 when Bush and Republican Rep. Dave Reichert drove by in a motorcade. The driver gave the president the finger, according to Reichert and Issaquah School District Superintendent Janet Barry. “The congressman hadn't seen it, but the president turned to him and said, ‘That one's not a fan,' ” Reichert spokeswoman Kimberly Cadena said.

Bush Chides Democrats As Soft On Terror (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, November 3, 2006

President Bush, campaigning in a Republican stronghold for an endangered GOP senator, tried to rally his supporters Thursday by portraying Democrats as soft on terrorists and opposed to conservative judges.

Bush chided Democrats who voted against legislation to detain and interrogate suspected terrorists, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program and the U.S.A. Patriot Act.

"When it comes to listening to the terrorists, what's the Democrat's answer? Just say no,'" Bush said, urging the audience to play along.

"When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer?"

"Just say no!" the audience retorted.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on Nov. 7, what's your answer?" Bush asked.

"Just say no!" the crowd screamed.

Bush campaigned here for Sen. Conrad Burns, a vulnerable incumbent in a tough campaign battle against Democratic challenger Jon Tester, the president of the Montana Senate. Tester was holding rallies of his own on the other side of the state Thursday and Friday with fellow Democrats Gov. Brian Schweitzer and Sen. Max Baucus.

With polls showing the public opposed to the war in Iraq, Democrats have expressed increasing optimism in recent days that they will gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House. Democrats must pick up six seats to win the Senate, a taller challenge, and both parties made last-minute efforts to increase the number of competitive races.

DOJ_NMG_0090908

Montana was Bush's first stop on his final push to Election Day that includes stops in Nevada, Missouri, Iowa, Colorado, Texas, Nebraska, Kansas, Arkansas and Florida.

The rally had the flavor of Bush's 2004 re-election campaign. Speakers blared Bush's campaign theme song, "Only in America," and the president opened his remarks with a comment he used in 2004:"It's good to be in a part of the world where the cowboy hats outnumber the ties."

Bush, invigorated by the rally, gleefully predicted that Republicans will retain control of Congress, just as they retained control of the White House in 2004 when Democrats, he said, were measuring the West Wing.

"The movers never got the call," Bush said. "The same thing is going to happen on Nov. 7. We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

Bush also said veteran Republican senators like Burns are needed to help the Senate confirm judicial conservatives to the federal bench. When Montana voters cast their ballots, they're not only deciding who will represent them in Washington, they will be deciding what kind of judges sit on federal courts across the nation, Bush said.

"We believe that judges ought to strictly interpret the law and not legislate from the bench," Bush said.

Bush Touts Republicans In Billings (BG)

Billings Gazette, November 3, 2006

The Gazette Staff In an animated political stump speech for Montana Republicans that covered taxes, judicial nominations and the war in Iraq, President Bush spoke for about 45 minutes to supporters at MetraPark Arena on Thursday morning.

With his shirtsleeves rolled up and no tie, Bush urged Montanans to vote for Sen. Conrad Burns and Rep. Denny Rehberg to make the country a safer and better place to live.

“I’m proud to be here in Big Sky Country with this fine U.S. senator, Conrad Burns,” Bush said. “You might call him a plain-speaking fellow. I’ve heard some say he’s a little rough on the English language. Where have I heard that before? Conrad, I’m keeping good company.”

After speaking for some time about the importance of judicial nominations, Bush said the two most important issues this election season are taxes and terrorism.

Voting Republican will ensure the country takes the right track on both counts, Bush said.

Democrats will raise taxes, while Republicans will cut them, he said.

“Conrad, Denny and I have a philosophy,” Bush said. “We believe you know how to spend your money better than the federal government does. The Democrats want to take more of your money because they think they can spend it better.”

Republicans are responsible for tax cuts that bolstered the U.S. economy and helped reduce Montana’s unemployment rate, he said. But, if Democrats take control of Congress, taxes will go up despite that party’s professed love for lowering them.

“They voted against every single tax cut,” Bush said. “Time and time again, every opportunity that they had a chance to show their love of tax cuts, they voted no. If that’s their idea of love, I’d had to see what hate looks like.”

Bush also said Democrats want to withdraw troops from Iraq too soon, leaving the United States vulnerable to terrorists. He said the military’s presence in Iraq does not encourage more terrorist groups to form and defended his decision to oust Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

“When you see a threat, you can no longer hope the oceans will protect us,” Bush said. “You can no longer hope for the best.”

“I saw a threat in Saddam Hussein. Members of both parties saw a threat in Saddam Hussein. The United Nations saw a threat in Saddam Hussein,” he said. “I made the right decision to take Saddam Hussein from power. Now, Iraq is the central front in the war on terror.”

Democrats don’t have any idea how to fix the situation in Iraq, but Republicans have a plan for victory, Bush said. That plan includes helping the Iraqi government become independent and self-sustaining.

The only way the United States can fail in Iraq is to leave before the job is done, he said.

“That’s exactly what Democrats want to do,” Bush said.

Bush ended his speech by comparing the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

During World War II, Japan was America’s enemy, but today the two countries are allies, said Bush, who recently met with the Japanese prime minister. The two leaders visited Graceland together earlier this year.

“I found it interesting on the way down to Elvis’s place, I was talking about keeping the peace with the prime minister of our former enemy,” Bush said.

“The lesson of history is liberty has got the capacity to convert an enemy into an ally,” he said. “Liberty has got the capacity to turn a region of despair into a region of hope.”

DOJ_NMG_0090909

Earlier in his speech, Bush talked about the importance of maintaining Republican control of Congress so that his judicial nominees can be confirmed to the federal court system.

"Your vote determines more than who represents you in the Senate," he said. "It will also determine what kind of judges sit on federal benches all across the U.S."

Bush credited Republicans for confirming John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court, appointments Democrats tried to block, he said.

"America is better off with John Roberts and Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court of the United States," he said.

Bush also said Montana could help lessen the country's dependence on foreign oil by producing alternative forms of energy.

The president was introduced by Burns, who said Bush is not afraid to stand by his beliefs.

"He's the man who doesn't take a poll before making a decision," Burns said.

"Even though he's from Texas, he understands Montana values and cares about the principles that make our two states great."

Rehberg introduced Burns.

Bush landed at Billings Logan International Airport aboard Air Force One a few minutes early Thursday morning at 10:59 a.m. He departed on the plane around 12:35 p.m.

Bush exited the plane a few minutes after it landed, waving, and shook hands with a group of people waiting on the tarmac. Black-clad snipers were on rooftops of buildings at the airport, and a Black Hawk helicopter flew in the area. Two gray C-17 military cargo planes were on the tarmac nearby.

Among the greeters were John Bennett of Cascade, a retired staff sergeant in the Montana National Guard who was injured by a sniper in Iraq and was in a wheelchair when he shook hands with the president; Peter Ankney of Colstrip, a first lieutenant on active duty in the U.S. Marine Corps; and Mark Polakoff of Red Lodge, who operates Absaroka Search Dogs and was scheduled to receive a volunteer award from the president. Polakoff was accompanied by his German shepherd, Winda.

Jack and Pat Rehberg, parents of Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Montana, were also there.

Bush then made the short road trip to MetraPark in a fast-moving motorcade that traveled on Airport Road accompanied by patrol cars from the Billings Police Department and Montana Highway Patrol. A small group of people gathered near the intersection of Airport Road and Main Street, where the motorcade passed at about 11:17 a.m. Bush could be seen waving to the small crowd from a black limousine.

The motorcade sped through the intersection again returning to the airport at about 12:20 p.m.

Ticket holders began lining up as early as 6 this morning to see Bush. The "Montana Victory Rally" is the start of a final campaign push before the national midterm election on Tuesday.

In the past three weeks, he has made campaign appearances on behalf of Republicans in tight races for seats in the U.S. Congress.

More than 5,000 tickets had been distributed for the president's short visit to Montana to bolster Montana Republicans, especially Burns, who is in a tight race with Democratic opponent Jon Tester, a state senator from Big Sandy. Burns is running for his fourth six-year term in the Senate.

By 8 a.m. Metra's lower parking lot was full. Volunteers were placing leaflets supporting Burns beneath windshield wipers.

A line of people that stretched from the MetraPark Arena doors, around the side of the building and to the MetraPark Pavilion began moving at about 8:10 a.m.

People were cheerful but cold. Some stomped their feet and brought blankets to fend off the cold. A group of children in snowsuits and mittens played on a strip of ice near the Metra doors.

Alan Hooker, a rancher from Luther, was among the first in line. Hooker rose at 4 a.m. and got to Metra by about 6:15. There were already 15 people ahead of him, he said.

Hooker said his son's teacher at Luther School asked him to save 17 seats for the school's seventh- and eighth-graders. He planned to place sheets of notebook paper on the seats to reserve them.

"The cell phone is going to be our connection, hopefully," he said.

Cheryl Heins and her 14-year-old daughter, Holly, of Laurel, were in line by 6:30 a.m. Heins took both her daughters to see Bush in 2001, when they got to shake his hand. Today, they were hoping to hear the president talk about family values.

"This is the world's leader," Heins said. "He's nowhere else in the world today than in Billings."

Dorothy Krnabek, a Republican campaign volunteer, was stationed at the Metra will-call ticket booth.

"Every seat in Metra is a good seat when the president comes," Krnabek said.

Another Burns campaign volunteer, Wilma Moses, brought a mystery novel and the comics section of the newspaper to keep her busy while she waited to listen to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0090910

Moses wore a red plaid jacket and a red hat with three elephant pins fixed to it. She said she puzzled over which of the pieces of jewelry to wear this morning before deciding to wear them all.

One of the pins belonged to her mother. It was made of silver and rhinestones and spelled the word “GOP.” Moses said her grandfather was a socialist in North Dakota in the early 1900s.

“I’ve been working so hard to overcome,” she said.

She wanted to hear Bush talk about Iraq.

“I hope that he will talk about winning the war and a plan to end it and have success there, something to give us all hope,” Moses said. “I agree that we can’t just leave. But I feel for the families.”

Joining Bush and Burns this morning were Rep. Denny Rehberg, R-Mont., and other Republicans.

Bush’s itinerary through Saturday includes stops in Elko, Nev., this afternoon; Springfield and Joplin, Mo., on Friday; and Greeley, Colo., Saturday morning. On Tuesday, the president and first lady Laura Bush will vote in Crawford, Texas, where they have a ranch.

Tickets to today’s event were free, but had to be obtained from the Billings Republican campaign office by 7 p.m. Wednesday. Only those with tickets were admitted.

Black Otter Trail and all parking areas for trails atop the Rims were closed to the public for the visit until 3 p.m. today, according to the Billings Police Department.

On his arrival at Billings Logan International Airport, Bush presented the President’s Volunteer Service Award to Mark Polakoff of Red Lodge, who trains rescue dogs for the Absaroka Search Dogs, a volunteer organization that has worked in Montana, Wyoming and Idaho searching for lost and missing persons.

Polakoff is also a member of the 1st Special Response Group, which responds internationally to search for lost or missing Americans. He has been a volunteer pre-hospital nurse with the Red Lodge Emergency Medical Services for 18 years and is an emergency room nurse at St. Vincent Healthcare.

Published on Thursday, November 02, 2006.

Last modified on 11/2/2006 at 6:08 pm

Copyright © The Billings Gazette, a division of Lee Enterprises.

What do you think? Tell us what you thought of this story.

Not very interesting (1)

Slightly interesting (2)

Somewhat interesting (3)

Quite interesting (4)

Extremely interesting (5)

Talk Back! Post your comments, opinion or feedback about this story.

Name:

Comments:

Comment policy:

Billingsgazette.com encourages readers to engage in civil conversation with their neighbors. Comments that are submitted are not posted to the site immediately. They go into a queue to be moderated and may take several hours to be reviewed. We will never edit or alter your comments, but we do reserve the right to remove comments that violate our code of conduct. No comment may contain:

Potentially libelous statements; such as accusing somebody of a crime, defamation of character, or statements that can harm somebody's reputation.

Obscene, explicit, or racist language.

Personal attacks, insults, threats, harassment or inciting violence.

Commercial product promotions.

If you have any questions, please contact our moderator.

Click here to report offensive or inappropriate comments.

The comments below are from readers of billingsgazette.com and in no way represent the views of The Billings Gazette or Lee Enterprises.

Hugo wrote on November 02, 2006 9:36 AM

I can already smell the sulfur.

Welcome "W" wrote on November 02, 2006 9:37 AM

Welcome to Billings, glad we have the METRA, we have the world's spotlight today on our beautiful City with such a great Future!

I'm shocked! wrote on November 02, 2006 9:38 AM

I am surprised. This article has been posted for 15 minutes now and nobody has commented about how much they dislike our President. I, for one am very pleased with President Bush and have nothing against him coming here. To those who think he's wasting time: how much time/money has our own Govenor spent doing commercial ads with candidate John Tester and photo shoots showing his support. Shouldn't he be busy serving the people of Montana, or at least claiming everyone else's work as his own?

Amazed wrote on November 02, 2006 9:39 AM

Lemmings

CJJE wrote on November 02, 2006 9:53 AM

Who's picking up the tab?!! Should be the Burns supporters since this is a political move to increase votes!! It's rediculous that this is going to cost us this amount of money!! I would stand in line that long to greet our service men and women coming home, for they are the heros. Not this president.

Welcome President Bush wrote on November 02, 2006 10:45 AM

Whether we agree with the statutes of the president or not, the very presence of this honorable figure deserves respect. We can disagree respectfully if we are so inclined. Please Billings show your high standards of respect.

Just Me wrote on November 02, 2006 10:47 AM

IWOULDN'T WALK ACROSS THE STREET!!!

Thanks for Visiting "W" wrote on November 02, 2006 11:23 AM

Thanks for Visiting "W"

all of em.... wrote on November 02, 2006 11:24 AM

all politicians are crooks, especially the president.

HA! wrote on November 02, 2006 11:24 AM

You said it, Hugo!!

I feel lucky wrote on November 02, 2006 11:26 AM

Mrs Bush was the republican who visited our neighbirhood. Very nice lady and much better received than her husband. Didn't go cause I'm true Blue, but heard she was very nice. I don't think there is much hope for good ole Conrad and after the fires this summer there shouldn't be.

John wrote on November 02, 2006 11:28 AM

Way to go W!! I voted the straight Republican ticket this morning!!

celeste wrote on November 02, 2006 11:39 AM

wank wank!

Welcome President George W wrote on November 02, 2006 11:40 AM

Weclcome to the "big city' of Montana, Wyoming home of Cattle, Ag, Oil, tourism. Prospertiy and Purpose! Thanks for Visiting

V says wrote on November 02, 2006 11:43 AM

....."Vi Veri Veniversum Vivus Vici"..... Ladies and Gentlemen - Let's sing an old favorite melody I've brought up to date while. we await the apperition of His Maleviolence. Just follow the bouncing ball..... The skyline of New York ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town.... To heck with three thousand people, Time to bring three Towers down.... Let's have a war on terror, Let's go pop ol' Saddam's cork!.... To consolidate all the power, a Reichstag fire in New York. ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town,... The streets are full of asbestos from the buildings on the ground.... George is in Sarasota, A goat tale reading World Class Dork.... The Secret Service ain't worried 'cause the target was New York ..... East Side, West Side, all around the town.... Silverstein planted the charges, Dov's remote planes flew around... Cheney stopped the Air Force to get Halliburton their pork... We know your plan worked fantastic on the skyline of New York. ..... "Remember, Remember the Fifth of November"

bo wrote on November 02, 2006 11:44 AM

All this less than a week before the election? Grasping at straws?? You're doing a heck of a job, Burnsy!

To Hugo wrote on November 02, 2006 11:44 AM

It's because it coming from under your feet!!!

Not one in the sheep herd wrote on November 02, 2006 11:47 AM

Don't worry, I made sure to hold my hand up and tell him he was "number one" when his plane came in.

Hugo & Sulpher wrote on November 02, 2006 11:50 AM

Hugo Its probably coming out of your A$$.

me wrote on November 02, 2006 11:55 AM

okay i just have to ask this if bush arrived just arfter 11 today why are ppl writing about this at 9 if they wrote it at 9 he was still in the plane coming over here

Lori wrote on November 02, 2006 11:56 AM

Welcome W! We're hoping you can help boost Conrad over the top on Tuesday! Thanks for coming to MT!

Red,White and Blue wrote on November 02, 2006 11:58 AM

To I'm Shocked,Right On My Friend though One Of (Them)Did Say He Could Smell The Sulphur,More Than Likely That Guy On His Shoulder,Welcome Mr President To The Big Sky,God Bless And Semper-Fi

Spike wrote on November 02, 2006 11:59 AM

Are Amazed and Hugo dining with the Axis powers in North Korea tomorrow night? I think they would fit right in!

Richard Miller wrote on November 02, 2006 12:01 PM

For "I'm schocked": I don't mind having Air Force One land here. I just wish that they hadn't got the door opened and had to take off without depositing several tons of B.S. on the people of Billings. I for one do not care to have the biggest cut and run artist in my city. Nor, do I care for lies that he has given us since he got in office. A pox on the arrogant bastard!

i am picking up the tab wrote on November 02, 2006 12:03 PM

i am picking up the tab, mr. big oil and hally-burton.

Rancher2 wrote on November 02, 2006 12:14 PM

I respect the office of president but not the man in office or his policies. As a fourth generation Montanan I am tired of being represented by an unintelligent crook who is an embarrassment, Conman has got to go!

ndngrl wrote on November 02, 2006 12:16 PM

He could be anywhere in the world but he is here in our beautiful state of Montana. I'm glad he came to support Burns. I love the President and the GOP. More power to them.

Boring wrote on November 02, 2006 12:20 PM

Bush said that the Democrats don't have a plan for Iraq. What is his plan? It changes frequently. He says we have to stay until we win the war. What will we win? How will we know when we have won? Who will pay for the damages? I watched the President's talk on TV and I have never seen more bored people in one place in my life. I laughed out loud when the commentator described an "excited" crowd and the video showed just the opposite.

Retired Firefighter wrote on November 02, 2006 12:34 PM

This President promised to restore "Honor and dignity" to the White House. I don't know what is honorable about bolstering a corrupt politician because they both share the same ideology and political party.

jon wrote on November 02, 2006 12:50 PM

I'm a church-going, gun-owning fiscal and mostly social conservative and I'm sick of the direction our country has taken. I pray that all of you will have a change of heart and vote Conrad Burns out of office. Americans used to be proud to stand on their own feet and now it's all about "What's in it for me?"

TRH wrote on November 02, 2006 12:52 PM

Mr. Bush may be a well meaning guy who cleans brush at his ranch and make good jokes about how he and burns "butcher the english language" but it is unbelievable how bad a situation he was created in Iraq and how much federal debt he has created in the process. I have two committed nephews in Iraq at the moment and I sure hope they don't become more needless victims of this flawed war. Boot Bush's cronies on Nov 2!

Proud to wrote on November 02, 2006 12:52 PM

be an American! It's a historic day, Montana loves President Bush!!

Huero wrote on November 02, 2006 12:53 PM

Thanks for visiting, Mr. President! I hope this puts Burns over the top. Governer Schweitzer is dangerous enough by himself. The last thing we need to do is give him another friend in Washington. I'd vote against Conrad if there was a sensible alternative, but JON TESTER IS NOT THE ANSWER!!!

Burns must go wrote on November 02, 2006 12:58 PM

I support President Bush and Rehberg, but not Conrad. Burns is corrupt and will lose next Tuesday. He brought defeat on himself by continually serving the selfish interests of his lobbyist friends, many of them Montana grown and still exploiting the office.

ohhhhhhhhh! From Pure breed Montana'n wrote on November 02, 2006 12:59 PM

Did you just see on Q2 that Tester sent a settement that said Bush was not here to see the normal peolpe in Montana. He better stop listen to Kerry. If Tester thinks he is normal He sure isn't from Montana. Hey! Cheney is so close to Missoula today maybe he could see if Tester whats to go hunting. It is hunting season.

Billy Bob wrote on November 02, 2006 1:11 PM

How silly can we be to buy patriotism from a guy who shirked his duty? Burns should lose to show Bush we're not idiots and cannot be lied to about how he got us into Iraq.

local wrote on November 02, 2006 1:14 PM

I was just stuck on Main street for near an hour. Thank you George Bush.

Show some respect... wrote on November 02, 2006 1:15 PM

To those of you dis-respecting the president with words... I say this.... If we all showed disrespect to those we dislike this world would be in even worse shape than it is now. Grow up and get a set!

NOMoreCONMAN wrote on November 02, 2006 1:22 PM

Do you think Bush and Conman talked about their secert Iqaq polciy today? I am sure they have big plans on how to win this war. It is a disgrace to have a sitting President stump for a crook. It is saying to every politican "go ahead eat the free Sushi" as long as you are in our party we will still support you. I am a Rep., but I will vote for Tester. Sometimes what is best for your party is not best for your country.

nh wrote on November 02, 2006 1:24 PM

To CJJE: It is funny you most likely don't say that when a Democratic President Bill Clinton comes and campaigns for his candidate. It is how it works. Quit complaining. All you protesters outside of the Metra get job! People like that are one of the many reasons why I rarely support a Democratic candidate.

ack wrote on November 02, 2006 1:27 PM

Some of you comment like you actually believe the President is going to read your remarks - In case you are sitting in Air Force One right now Mr. President and reading these comments, STOP THE MADNESS IN IRAQ!!!!

Republicans wrote on November 02, 2006 1:28 PM

Any group who thinks selling your vote to the highest bitter is okay deserves nothing better than Bush and Burns. I hope you get your wish. Then when the jeck gets indicted you'll be the laughing stock of the US, which you already are. Jon Stewart is having a field day with your stupid Senator.

Amazed wrote on November 02, 2006 1:36 PM

What's to respect about a man who is clearly incompetent? And what's to respect people who blindly follow him? It sickens me that people call themselves Americans and patriotic that will support a man who fights a war based on nothing that had to do with anything, rip apart the Constitution for his own benefit and then watch America's finest die day after day with no plan other than to jump and and down shouting "Terror!"

I don't care wrote on November 02, 2006 1:41 PM

Bush has done nothing to impress me. The sooner he is out of office the better of we will be. He started something his dad did'nt finish and it's just gotten worse he needs to go!!!!!!!

Tony wrote on November 02, 2006 1:42 PM

What a disgrace this guy is...people dying everyday for a war that he lied to go into and then he is here in my homestate campaigning for a corrupt politician...Just unbelievable

Thanks for Visiting President Bush #2 wrote on November 02, 2006 1:44 PM

Any dolphin can eat the spider around the tornado, but it takes a real mating ritual to barely play pinochle with an alleged grand piano.

Could Care Less wrote on November 02, 2006 1:52 PM

Don't let the door hit you on the !$$ on your way out.

blindman wrote on November 02, 2006 1:58 PM

If most of you were deaf instead of blind I could understand your blind allegiance to somebody who cares less wether or not you can pay your bills or put food on your table or if your sons and daughters die in a war for elitist interests, but you fools can see and hear and you still cheer on nero. You deserve neither freedom or security.

Stillonmt wrote on November 02, 2006 1:58 PM

Just more tired rhetoric from the President. He attacks strawmen rather than deal with issues head on. The last thing that is needed by our country is a Republican congress that just enables his lack of leadership.

TOO LATE FOR BURNS wrote on November 02, 2006 2:07 PM

Nice try Burns, your time is up! If you stil talk to Jack, let him know I could use some money as well! Or better yet, use that money to pay for the shameless attempt to save your campaign with Georgie's vist today! SEE YA BURNS!!!!

John wrote on November 02, 2006 2:10 PM

I would not even consider or have the desire to see President Bush. Does he even have a college education? I am sure his parents had him at least finish High School.He doesnt seem to be very bright. I understand Sen. Kerry's comments on who does end up fighting the wars in this country. It is mostly low income and people of color. Their hope is that it will open the doors to attend college, get GI loans for housing. I think they should make it mandatory that one child from every family enlist in the service during war time-even the rich kids.Even if their in one the most prestigous colleges in this country. The only thing I agree with president bush on -is the comment he made. That is that both him and Conrad Burns both can make some very stupid comments. I would never support Conrad Burns or President Bush!

cc#1 wrote on November 02, 2006 2:11 PM

I didn't attend the rally, but I was fortunate enough to catch it live on KTVQ. It was awesome! Here was a mere mortal man speaking God's truths. I literally could see the Rod of Jesse alligning the President's back. God was smiling down on Billings, Montana, today! Thank you for sticking to your convictions, Mr. President George W. Bush! Thank you for taking the time to grace us with your presence, as well! God speed to you and yours. Peace.

CDN wrote on November 02, 2006 2:12 PM

Some of you need to stop and take a deep breath. The hate on this blog is incredible. It comes from a party that says those that are in the military because they are stupid, a party that will raise Taxes if they win, a party that gives aid and comfort daily to our enemies, a party that supports gun control and gay marriage, a party that is for open borders and against judges that not make laws, a party that will grow the size of government, a party that is against energy exploration and therefore for more foreign oil, a party that believes man is so powerful, he can change the weather. It is the party that defended Bill Clinton, and attacks those that believe in GOD. Gore, Pelosi, Reid, Hillorat, Kerry, Kennedy, bi-coastal liberals control it. Even when one of their former VP candidates supports the Presidents fight against those that want to kill us, this party tosses him out. But the one thing that is apparent, the Democrat Party was no ideas to campaign on, only hate. You should be so proud.

Go Ahead..Make his day. wrote on November 02, 2006 2:12 PM

FYI-Every country, everywhere is vunerable. We live in a country where borders are a joke and immigration has exceeded native born residency. By giving the American public a false sense of security-shame on him. I wonder how many more lives would have been sacrificed if good ol W would have been at the helm of Vietnam. Did it really make a difference to them that we left? Only to the ones who survived. Our foreign relations are so strained it will take years to repair. He talks about democrats raising taxes-but the republicans have managed to increase the unemployment rate, and have promoted our oil companies to the highest food chain. Metal, plastics, wood products have all doubled in cost since the start of this administration. Taxes, taxes, taxes, but what about the cost of everything from chapstick to bailer twine. Titles do not warrant respect. When you have lives in your hands and you conduct yourself in the narcissistic mode you normally operate in, with no thought of those you hurt, you get the respect you deserve. Did he mention U.S. Navy Petty Officer 2nd Class Charles "Chuck" Komppa- you know the one they took home in a casket last night? Shame, shame, shame. Must have been too busy petting the search dog for PR. Vote another one in with the same mentality. You get what you deserve. Sadly so does everyone else.

To Cheryl Heins wrote on November 02, 2006 2:13 PM

â€œThis is the worldâ€™s leader,â€ Heins said. â€œHeâ€™s nowhere else in the world today than in Billings.â€ George W. Bush is NOT the world's leader. People who believe things like you do are what cause Bush to think he is the leader of the whole world and all countries should do what he says. How sad you're teaching your children such false detrimental beliefs.

how many people actually showed up wrote on November 02, 2006 2:16 PM

they had 5,000 tickets...how many people actually showed up? thank you protestors for standing up against corruption and being the true American voice

Can W read? wrote on November 02, 2006 2:19 PM

Just wondering if W. even mentioned the soldier's casket being taken off the plane or his family shown in the gazette today.

...etc... wrote on November 02, 2006 2:32 PM

George is a great guy, i know we can all "arm chair" his job....but when it gets right down to it, he responded the way an American President should respond to terrorism. I really dont care if there are people being held without any rights.....the people working in the trade center on 9/11 had no choice....if we can make a few of them talk and get the "bad guys" so be it. I am tired of useless negotiations that the other side thinks are weak and cowardly. George has some "b_lls" and has all of the information so he can act accordingly. Keep up the good work and God Bless!

W is the World Leader wrote on November 02, 2006 2:36 PM

W is the World Leader its sure not any wimp from the UN, why is he the leader, not just all of our weapons and nukes, its our beliefs in freedom, we stand up for freedom, against genocide in Africa, against all violence, and against the fools who believe in global warming which is actually caused by Sun Spots! Read the bible every body. Rev. Sma Iam

jess a guy wrote on November 02, 2006 2:36 PM

DOJ_NMG_0090915

It was a fantastic production. Martina was better but this one cost one hell of a lot more. This was purely a photo and press opportunity. Sad that the leader of the #2 world power needs to do so much work on the elections but at the same time takes more vacation from his post than any other president in US history.

Borrow and Spend wrote on November 02, 2006 2:42 PM

Burns and Bush.....equally inarticulate, dishonest and truly not Conservatives. True Conservatives know a little about responsible spending. I am one of many Conservatives who are voting for Tester!

Los Cangrejos wrote on November 02, 2006 2:52 PM

I just don't understand the hate and vitriol being spewed here. Disagree all you like with Bush, but understand that he IS the president of the United States of America and is due respect if only for only that reason. You people disgust me as much as those who do not rise and doff their hats when the flag comes by in the parade. Dissent all you want, but please be respectful.

SjonesSR wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

He is a very good speaker in person. I was amazed at how much energy and charisma he had and how clearly he stated his message. Somehow we never see that on the news. It must be a sport for the media to find that one clip each night that makes our president look bad.

milkseat wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

For every vote Bush might have gotten Conrad today he lost Burns two-coming from all the people in 4th Ave and Main St. traffic jams!

Jim wrote on November 02, 2006 2:53 PM

We have a wonderful President and what an honor to have him in the Big Sky country. We are so fortunate to have him as President instead of John Kerry. John Kerry is a liberal, unpatriotic man.

was conrad sober wrote on November 02, 2006 2:55 PM

did connie stay away from the bottle today

A Real Patriot wrote on November 02, 2006 2:55 PM

Patriot - a person who regards himself or herself as a defender, esp. of individual rights, against presumed interference by the federal government.

Not my leader wrote on November 02, 2006 3:12 PM

Impeach!

SHIRT AND NO TIE wrote on November 02, 2006 3:19 PM

Dear Gazette Liberal Writer: So what if the President showed up in casual attire.....that is what Montana is all about! Try attending a function at Alberta Bair Theater or go listen to the Billings Symphony....a lot of Montanans wear blue jeans and cowboy boots. Mr. President, you fit right in Billings! We are proud of you and thank you for paying us a visit!

Tammy wrote on November 02, 2006 3:20 PM

Hey Hugo~~~You must've been at the wrong place this morning-Demo hell- I was inside the Metra-Cheering on our Wonderful President George W. and what a pleasure that was-All I could smell was the sweet scent of Republican victory--God Bless America and George W.....

DUMB AND DUMBER! wrote on November 02, 2006 3:23 PM

Corndog and the Presidunce! Hey, funny movies about two really dumb friends are outta style now. Didn't anyone tell the Repubies??? Bwaaaaaaaaaaaa! Ho ho hey hey, how many troops did you kill today, georgie? Last month only 101, and SEVEN HUNDRED WOUNDED! But tell us, Dumbya, just why the twins aren't in Eyerak? Are they AWOL, like YOU were?????? What a joke.

Desperate measures CONman Burns wrote on November 02, 2006 3:24 PM

CONman is like the bully kid on the block who's getting beat up (by a younger fresher Jon Tester in this case) - bring in your older brother. Bring in Bush, bring in Cheney, bring them ALL in - you still will lose ConMAN

TO CDN wrote on November 02, 2006 3:26 PM

Sounds like you might need to take a big breath. You sound very one sided and very hateful. Don't forget that the majority of us are probably in the middle. Not with you and not with the protesters. You sound hateful to me!

Baffled wrote on November 02, 2006 3:29 PM

Number 2 world power?

Patriot wrote on November 02, 2006 3:34 PM

Burns and Bush. Get out, and stay out of our State!

Native Hunter wrote on November 02, 2006 3:36 PM

Just goes to show Conrad can't stand on his own two feet in Montana but has to "go Washington" by bringing in the worst president in US history. I wonder if Bush could point out Billings on a map? Funny Bush talked about taxes and Iraq. We've been in Iraq six years and it keeps getting worse and the Repubplicans have run up the national debt to insane levels.

Bigsky wrote on November 02, 2006 3:39 PM

The only gutsy thing Bush has EVER done is being in the same state as Cheney during hunting season.

NE Mt wrote on November 02, 2006 3:43 PM

My question that would be posed to the President and to Cheney as well.... How come they are so vehemently supporting Conrad Burns-someone that is being investigated in scandal after scandal. Is this the political version of the good ol' boys club? Get Burns in office no matter what... Because they might also have something to hide?

Poor Dems wrote on November 02, 2006 3:53 PM

We have President Bush and you Jon Carry!

a sad time for america wrote on November 02, 2006 4:12 PM

He makes me want to throw up.

WOW!! GO W wrote on November 02, 2006 4:25 PM

I'm a decomcrat voting for Republicans. They have the plans and ideas. It was nice to see our president in Billings.

what wrote on November 02, 2006 4:28 PM

Keep supporting Bush. He could care less if you loose a child in Iraq or have to work two or three jobs to make ends meet. What a bunch of suckers. Bush has you right where he wants you come election day.

poor rancher wrote on November 02, 2006 4:30 PM

Is that AF One I smell, or is it just the Laurel refinery?

Rygel wrote on November 02, 2006 4:34 PM

I love him.

former forest service wrote on November 02, 2006 4:36 PM

Remember Forest Service Firefighters.

Brian Casteel wrote on November 02, 2006 4:39 PM

I thought President Bush was awesome today. My overall opinion of him hasn't been very good, but he earned a great deal of respect from me today with the intensity and strength of his speech. It was an awesome experience that you cannot get by watching it on TV or hearing a speech on the radio.

To Retired Firefighter wrote on November 02, 2006 4:41 PM

It means doing what's right and what needs to be done without checking the polls first. Oh yeah, also means, keeping your pants up in the Oval Office.

The Borders are open to Canada.... wrote on November 02, 2006 4:41 PM

If you don't like our country and it's leaders do something.....it's your choice to stay here (majority rules in elections) or go. Don't let the door hit your butt on the way out!

Kennyg wrote on November 02, 2006 4:42 PM

What a waste of money. This country is trillions in debt, and in a war for big oil. So what does W do but come to Billings to preach to the people who voted to let him get us into this mess. Also why should the taxpayers pick up the overtime for the police and Sheriffs deputies, the Republicans should cover that too!

Evangelist Ted Haggard out of closet wrote on November 02, 2006 4:47 PM

I don't understand why you Republicans hate homosexuals so much. Another of yours just came out of the closet, Reverand Ted Haggard, leader of the National Association Of Evangelicals just admitted to a three year affair with a man. He's one of yours, you judgmental neocons. Why are you always saying your platform is about what you call family values and you hate homosexuals and say that democrats promote it, but you sure have had a lot of your own come out of the closet this year. maybe you should try to be less judgmental.

Please Tester supporters wrote on November 02, 2006 4:51 PM

I'm begging you. It's one thing to show your ignorance in supporting Tester - please, please try to spell properly, or at least put together a coherent sentence. And yes, I'm aware of a few typos in responses from Bush/Burns supporters, but it only takes a glance through here to see which side has more of those remotely intelligent enough to cast a knowledgeable vote.

Nutcracker wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Party loyalists are nuts best poured into a bowl and served before Christmas dinner. This is especially true of Republican loyalists this election cycle and the next. Bush's stupidity is killing your sons and daughters in an unnecessary and poorly executed war in Iraq and he is making you pay for it. If Clinton had done this, your panties would be in a wad so deeply embedded we could see your pant size every time you opened your mouth. Yet Republican loyalists rally around the Bush dressed up like Howdy Doody, or should I say Howdy Dude-y, because he claims he won't raise your taxes. This war is costing a fortune. Where is the money going to come from? You! Bush is borrowing all this money so he doesn't have to face the responsibility of being the bad guy who forces you to pay back his debts. It is called passing the buck. It pleases old Conrad no end to help Bush take your money and put your kids' lives in danger for no good reason. So although you may put a higher priority on your money than your children's lives, Conrad will cost you both. Tester will at least try to spare your kids.

Stillonmt wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Bush was ignoring the proper way to measure taxes. As V.V. Chari of the University of Minnesota explained at a conference for journalists on Oct. 17, The true burden of government is what it spends today and in the future." When a politician brags, I cut your taxes," that's not what really matters.... When a government spends money, it commands resources that are no longer available for use by the private sector. If it chooses to borrow the money rather than levying taxes to finance transfer payments and the purchase of goods and services, the government is only postponing the inevitable taxes, Chari said. HT to Brad DeLong.

Andy from Big Sandy wrote on November 02, 2006 5:00 PM

Conrad Burns took dirty Abramhoff money. Bush has direct connections to Abramhoff. Simply follow the money. Burns & Bush are crooked peas in a pod. It is also very telling that Burns needs the star power of the President to get people to vote for him. That should say it all right there, time to take out the crooked trash, bye bye Burnsey. Ps, who paid for the Presidents trip, including massive security costs, to our great state? I suspect taxpayers, since Bush did issue one medal to the dog handler. Presidential duties right?

SBrown wrote on November 02, 2006 5:01 PM

To all of you riding George's a$$ for spending money to come support Burns, why aren't you voicing your opinion when your own Schweitzer takes time from his position to "waste" all the money on his stumps for Testor...Typical Democratic behavior...a lot of talk and no action...thank god Bush has the balls to stand up for what he believes in and follows through with actions to support his words...God Bless the GOP!!!

Gary wrote on November 02, 2006 5:03 PM

With two thirds of the country ready to throw Bush out with the wash water, at least he provides us Montanans with a few laughs if nothing else!

Ikin wrote on November 02, 2006 5:03 PM

To the one who said President Bush doesn't care if the troops die. Do You mean the stupid uneducated troops Mr Karry was talking about the other day? Batched joke or not it was pretty tasteless. Did he care about the troops he spit in the face of after Viet Nam. Go play in Lewistown with your little pal Jane Fonda and ask her how she feels about Troops oh I forgot Ted got rid of her. My father was a Viet Nam vet and an American Hero who was drafted by a democratic president. I think our President has the utmost respect for our troops and is genuinly saddened as am I when one of our troops die.

SBrown wrote on November 02, 2006 5:06 PM

kudos to "shirt and no tie"

NOPE! wrote on November 02, 2006 5:10 PM

Nope! None there! No WMDs in there either! Gee, I can't seem to find any WMDs! aha,ah,aha,ha,ha,ha,ha,ha! That Dumbya Bush. What a funny guy! While slaughtering over SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND innocent Iraqis, he's crackin' jokes! What a cutup! What a retard! What an evil, evil little man! He truly IS a son of a bush! Remember, granddaddy Prescott Bush was one of the biggest financiers of the Hitler! Like granddaddy like retarded grandson! This moron is NOT welcome in Montana! And take the Missery moron with you!

GEORGE BUSH=TOUGH DUDE wrote on November 02, 2006 5:18 PM

While Bush is fighting terrorists the American Left is doing all it can to defeat Bush's efforts. The NEW YORK TIMES gave our enemies a heads up when they published America's top secrets telling terrorists how the U.S. was tracking their blood money (SWIFT). CNN airs enemy propaganda snuff films and TESTER plus the other LEFT-WING kooks want to abolish the Patriot Act and take away our tools to find and combat terrorists. THANK YOU GEORGE BUSH FOR YOUR TOUGHNESS DESPITE THE AMERICAN LEFT and their allies in the LIBERAL PRESS CORP going to war against YOU!

To CC #1 wrote on November 02, 2006 5:25 PM

What the heck is a Rod of Jesse? I ran it on the Internet and all I got back were a bunch of porn sites. Surely THAT wasn't what you saw aligning with the president's back?!?

I'm mad wrote on November 02, 2006 5:28 PM

Are you people for real? You're upset because you had to wait in traffic for a few minutes while the motorcade safely passed through Airport & Main? What did you expect to do - cruise by with the Presidential Limo and escort them? What idiots!

Democrat Here wrote on November 02, 2006 5:33 PM

And I have to say - after hearing the President's speech and hearing what Tester has been saying lately, I am going to be voting for Burns this time around. Tester is just not what this state needs and he is definitely not being honest with Montanans saying that he has never voted for taxe increases. I'm pretty upset with my own party because it is the extreme left that is driving us JFK democrats over the line to the Republicans because they represent us better.

silent bob wrote on November 02, 2006 5:39 PM

bush is not a Texan, he just plays one on T.V.

to Please Tester supporter wrote on November 02, 2006 5:43 PM

We're talking about the future of the FREE WORLD and you're worried about typos? Take off the blinders. Yes, I support Buch but Burms has to go.

dlm wrote on November 02, 2006 5:45 PM

what conrad burns said about the firefighters is truth. This comes from my experience fighting the yellowstone fires of 1988 and watching them fight the derby fires and lighting backfires 10 miles away from the fire. Furthermore he wasn't talking about all firefighters he was talking about federal firefighters.

billingsguy wrote on November 02, 2006 5:46 PM

Sure wish I could have personally thanked him for tying up traffic for so long. Oh yeah to personally thank him for spending around 7000 dollars for a 3 hour stop.

dumb and dumber wrote on November 02, 2006 5:52 PM

My nephew died in Iraq. I don't know what to say to his son when he gets older. This war is useless and immoral. Bush knew it and continues to lie. I will never forgive him.

RCM wrote on November 02, 2006 5:52 PM

I watched the President's speech on TV. Some of his statements were simply illogical. He said he does not believe we create more terrorists by fighting them? That's not what his own intelligence agencies are telling him in the National Intelligence Estimate he released to the public. Then he stated the fact that 9/11 happened when we didn't have troops in Iraq, as though if we had started the war earlier, 9/11 wouldn't have happened. Apparently we will need troops in every country on Earth that could possible harbor terrorists (including this one? Can you say police state?). Just how far are we supposed to let this contagious form of paranoia lead us?

disgusted with demos wrote on November 02, 2006 6:06 PM

what an awesome time to see Mr Bush the President of the USA. I think I sense the same hatred after losing in 04. Get ready again and dammit get over it sooner.We won you lost. Get it in your head. The majority rules quit whining and go do something constructive with your lives. Go Bush Burns Denny And the Grand Old Party

Carlos Phears wrote on November 02, 2006 6:16 PM

More rhetoric and fearmonging!! Has been anybody ever become financially better off because their taxes were cut? What a contradiction to talk about liberty abroad while being destroyed at home!

Please Tester Supporters wrote on November 02, 2006 6:23 PM

Not worried about typos darlin', just somewhat annoyed by those too lazy or ignorant to make the effort to appear literate. I am pretty sure the FREE WORLD will be fine long after we're gone, too. Untwist your knickers

A real military veteran wrote on November 02, 2006 6:46 PM

I'm curious just how deep it would get in the Metra if you stacked all the corpses that are the result of GWB's war in there. I'm sure there's a special place in Hell for those who consider torture and murder the "moral" thing to do.

ExFed wrote on November 02, 2006 6:53 PM

Lori.....in case you haven't noticed....Burns is already way over the top...but ...never mind.

jill wrote on November 02, 2006 6:59 PM

So is Bush saying he's such a weak president that he can't veto any tax increase bill the new demo majority congress will try to pass?

cc#1 wrote on November 02, 2006 7:04 PM

To whomever posted on 11/2/06 @ 5:25 p.m., to "CC#1," if you read the bible, go to Isaiah 11:1,2. Also, you may Google, "The Rod of Jesse." I hope this helps. I'm sorry you got porn. Peace.

Thank You wrote on November 02, 2006 7:34 PM

Mr. President: Thank you for coming to Billings. It is a great honor for us to have you here. We hope that you will come visit us again.

I expected more protesters! wrote on November 02, 2006 7:35 PM

As many angry people who sound off on these message boards I thought I'd see lots more protesters out. Onlt 70 and most of them from out of town. I think it means many of you are double posting, or your chicken to go out in public with a sign. I also get a kick out of the posts from people of claim to be conservative voting for Tester. John Kerry stated what democrats think about our soldiers. I will not help send another democrat to join the ranks of John Kerry.

Native Son wrote on November 02, 2006 7:57 PM

I am pleased that the President of the United States was able to make it to the Magic City today. What an incredible experience for young, old & those in between to see our President speak. It doesn't change the fact that Conrad Burns is a LIAR. Conrad lied when he pledged to serve only two terms. Conrad has lied repeatedly about the Abramhoff affair. Heck, Conrad lied intially about the interaction with the firefighters at the Billings Airport. As a member of conservative fourth generation Montana family I am urging others out there to forego the route of FEAR and vote in a native Montanan, Jon Tester, to serve as OUR representative in D.C. If he doesn't perform we'll put him back on the farm, but it's time for a change from Conrad. As for President Bush he has managed to oversee 2,815 of our best & brightest KIA and 12,000+ wounded. All this half a world away, while EVERY SINGLE DAY illegal immigrants come across our border(s) by the hundreds. Why? President Bush has failed to secure and protect our borders and NOBODY can deny that.

Wow!!! wrote on November 02, 2006 8:07 PM

A Con backing a Con. Now that's a story the Republicans are use to.

Rick wrote on November 02, 2006 8:17 PM

Bush in all his glory. Why does he not take a few moments to pay respect to one of the troops Bush sent to his death, Petty Officer Komppa and attend the funeral?

Explain it to me again... wrote on November 02, 2006 8:23 PM

Why is it that so many want Burns out but these same characters don't really seem to want Tester in? This has turned into a referendum on Burns and not a nod toward Tester. A silly way to vote. Anger that is...I support Burns!

Jane wrote on November 02, 2006 8:24 PM

Corruption loves company?

Bryon wrote on November 02, 2006 8:24 PM

I had to work today, so I couldn't go. However, after reading most of the posts on the several articles dealing with good 'ol Georgie and his little visit, it is plain to see he is up to his usual tactics. To try to associate terrorist with voting anything other than Republicans is just obsurd. Scare tacticts and smoke screens are all he utilized today. Him showing up is just proof that Burns is on his way out. Of course Democrats have to raise taxes. Republicans spend all the money and just print more. We can't do that in our households so what makes this president or the rest of the Republicans think that they can just spend and not ever have to pay anything back? The money has to come from somewhere. The dollar isn't worth anything anymore. Thanks Georgie. You took a surplus created during the Clinton administration and totally wiped your hind end with that continue to waste more money. One thing is for sure when a Republican gets into office: We are going to fight somebody and the defecit will increase. Thanks Georgie.

johnnie bee rotten wrote on November 02, 2006 8:43 PM did luv ya w tour pays with pass me another scotch connie? and did the eat at tomain tommies eatery aka the milky way??? rehbergs old joint on poly drive

sam wrote on November 02, 2006 8:47 PM

It is simple. GOP means less taxes for all income levels. The dems mean more taxes for all income levels PERIOD.

Poncho wrote on November 02, 2006 9:00 PM

For all you uninformed Republicans, your President thinks it is funny to pass gas when he is in the company of White House staff or news reporters. He is just a laugh a minute. The smell never emited from Hugo as you people assert. It comes from the top-the Commander in Chief.

What a Great Story (Draft Dodger arrives in Air Force 1 wrote on November 02, 2006 9:05 PM

The sneakiest Draft Dodging Fool our country has ever seen, and mainly because the Far Right just ignores it and who W really is. Do any of you truly realize what a sneak this man was, and has not been held accountable for anything because your party just let's it go. Hello, is anyone home? How can any rational American endorse this clown and then the other Bozo by the name of The CON man. Your party is at the bitter depths of despair, and you backing this class of Morons shows your true character. You guys are Incredible and should be embarrassed to be in the same building as W. & Con Man at the same time. Disgusting time for your party and all the Morons that follow in your footsteps. Hopefully, someday the Right Wing will be a thing of the past.

Al V. wrote on November 02, 2006 9:13 PM

I ate lunch today at Pug Mahones. The place was packed during Bush's speech. Food was great. I bet the Metra wasn't. It looked like carefully choreographed camera work to me.

2 JUST ME wrote on November 02, 2006 9:20 PM

Well you would have had to walk across the street, because that is where the protesters were directed to go.
Click to enlarge
Click to enlarge
Transcript of Bush speech
Read the entire transcript of President's Bush's remarks at MetraPark Arena on Thursday, November 2, 2006.
President Bush at MetraPark
President Bush addressed large crowd at MetraPark Arena on behalf of Montana GOP candidates. November 2, 2006
President's visit draws protesters
(169 today, 169 total)
Bush touts Republicans in Billings
(133 today, 133 total)
Gazette Opinion: Tester would bring welcome change in U.S. Senate
(70 today, 177 total)
Letter: CNN irresponsible to show soldiers being shot
(47 today, 74 total)
Burns, Tester tax positions put in perspective
(46 today, 46 total)
Stories that have received the most comments in the last 24 hours.
Football lights autistic boy's athletic fire
(62 ratings)
Letter: Which president is coming to Billings?
(71 ratings)
Letter: Why would anybody back Bush and Burns?
(138 ratings)
Letter: CNN irresponsible to show soldiers being shot
(416 ratings)
Gazette Opinion: Tester would bring welcome change in U.S. Senate
(823 ratings)
Stories that have received the most high ratings in the last 48 hours
Bush touts Republicans in Billings
President's visit draws protesters
Sailor's body taken to Columbus
GOP putting on its best face for presidential visit
'Brothers' in Iraq grieve over reservist
1,000s get tickets to see Bush as president begins 3-day blitz
Michigan executive new director of ABT
Lawyer seeks long-time justice's job
Crows returning in force, leave big mess downtown
Tickets available for wine class
Counselor to speak to support group
Women of the Moose host bazaar Saturday
Lockwood flu clinic is Tuesday
Angela's Piazza receives grant
Back to Top | Home | News | Sports | Entertainment | Features | Opinion | Public Notices | Classifieds | Privacy
Lee Enterprises Regional Newspapers | Butte | Helena | Missoula | Rapid City | Bismarck | Casper | The Prairie Star | Western Business

This Election, Modest Tour For President (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg
The New York Times, November 3, 2006
BILLINGS, Mont., Nov. 2 — If there is one thing the White House can usually count on when President Bush campaigns in small, Republican-leaning cities like this one, it is friendly wall-to-wall news coverage of his arrival. And his visit here on Thursday did make the front page of The Billings Gazette.

But news of his impending arrival took second billing in the paper. It ran below the fold and under a package of articles about the return of a local sailor's body from Iraq, accompanied by a photograph of the flag-draped coffin at Billings Logan International Airport.

Mr. Bush's visit certainly was the subject of local talk radio. But it was mixed with grim talk of newspaper endorsements for the Democratic candidate for Senate here, Jon Tester, leading a local conservative radio host to tell a dejected caller he doubted endorsements were any more influential than "visits of luminaries or stars or political mucky-mucks coming in from the national scene."

During the last two elections, the fumes of Air Force One worked like political magic dust for the candidates lucky enough to score visits from Mr. Bush.

Candidates flew to Washington just to be seen arriving back home on his 747. Local newspapers doubled as welcome mats, and television reporters and radio hosts excitedly echoed his verbal jabs at Democrats long after he had left.

But 2006 is not 2004 or, for that matter, 2002, when Mr. Bush's last minute, 17-city tour won credit for helping his party buck history by gaining seats in a midterm election cycle in which it also held the presidency.

This time around, Mr. Bush is a less popular president and is on a more modest tour. He is visiting carefully chosen districts and states like this one, where he won handily in 2004 and where his aides believe he can provide pivotal help in the tight election battle between Senator Conrad Burns and Mr. Tester, whose lead over Mr. Burns has shrunk in recent weeks. Mr. Burns's seat is one of six that could determine which party controls the Senate.

Mr. Bush is more popular here than he is elsewhere in the country, with an approval rating of 45 percent, according to the Montana State University-Billings poll. But that is considerably lower than it was two years ago, and his visit showed the new political reality that confronts him wherever he goes this election season, even in usually solid patches of Bush Country like this one: With those low poll ratings and bad news out of Iraq inescapable, his visits are as likely to galvanize the other side as they are to buck up local Republicans.

That new dynamic, helped along by new technology, played out on the local political blog featured on the Gazette's Web edition. There were plenty of excited posts like this one, from "JJ," "I'm anxiously waiting to see the president of this beautiful country! I am a Republican and proud to be!!! I admire Bush and agree with what he stands for as a human being and our President!"

But there were angry rejoinders, such as this dispatch from "NOT my president": "Never, in the history of our 'compassionate' country, have I been as ashamed of a person as I am with the man who currently lives in the White House."

In a state where Mr. Bush beat Senator John Kerry by 20 percentage points two years ago, it was all too much for "SHOCKED," who wrote: "I am just shocked at the hatred that has been shown in these blogs toward our president. You should all be ashamed of yourselves for acting like children rather then rational grownups. What is happening to America??"

Similar scenes have played out across the country as Mr. Bush has begun stumping more vigorously for candidates. In the Republican stronghold of LaPlume, Pa., when Mr. Bush went to raise money for Representative Don Sherwood, an embattled Republican incumbent, a local radio host lamented news that students would protest the president, saying, "It's not cool to like President Bush these days."

In an article about Mr. Bush's planned visit on Friday to the conservative enclave of Le Mars, Iowa, The Des Moines Register quoted Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Christian Alliance, as saying the president's visit could be "a marginal plus" when local conservatives are so deflated.

But here in Billings it was a plus that Mr. Burns's campaign was eager to have, giving the president full coverage on local television.

Republican strategists say Mr. Bush is not going to have the same influence he had in 2002 — the first elections after the Sept. 11 attacks, when his approval ratings were exceptionally high — or in 2004, when he was a candidate with tens of millions of dollars of advertising promoting him. But party officials say he is still the name-brand Republican for base voters.

"Despite a challenging election cycle, he's a singular force," said Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

And aboard Air Force One, a senior White House official said Montana was one of two Senate contests where Mr. Bush's top strategists believe he can have the most impact. "In a smaller community," he said, "you get so much more buzz."

And buzz Mr. Bush did get. The two major local news stations broke into regular programming to show Air Force One landing, though neither Mr. Burns, nor the other candidate for whom Mr. Bush was stumping, Representative Denny Rehberg, went to meet the plane.

"It's an amazing experience," said Jodi Hathaway, the correspondent on KULR, the local NBC affiliate. "It's just really amazing to see this very famous, famous piece of aircraft."

DOJ_NMG_0090922

On KTVQ, the local CBS affiliate, the anchor Alex Tyson said in hushed tones as the camera focused on the aircraft, “Again we are awaiting the president of the United States to get off of Air Force One.”

But Ms. Tyson added that the latest New York Times/CBS poll showed some of “the lowest ratings of Mr. Bush’s presidency,” and only “29 percent approve of his handling of Iraq, so it will be interesting to see what he says in his speech this hour with regard to the war.”

Her viewers did not have to wait to find out, as KTVQ and KULR ran the speech live, in its entirety, over roughly 40 minutes, without interruption. Mr. Bush addressed Iraq head-on before 5,000 cheering supporters, saying: “The only way we can fail is if we leave before the job is done. And that’s exactly what the Democrats want to do.”

That charge, as well as his assertion that Democrats would raise taxes, led the local newscasts, with the anchor Emily Nantz relaying his statement that voters should make their choices based on two issues: “who will tax people less,” she said, “and which party will keep Americans safe.” That segment was soon followed, however, by a report on the few dozen protesters calling for an end to the war.

Matt McKenna, a spokesman for Mr. Tester, said Mr. Bush’s visit would serve to “fire up” Democrats because local voters had a problem with “not just the president, but anybody who comes from out of state who tries to push us around and tell us how to vote.”

But Mr. Burns’s spokesman, Jason Klindt, said he was not worried about that. “How could the other side get more riled up?” Mr. Klindt said. “They already are.”

He said Mr. Bush had provided a crucial spark for local Republicans.

Kristi Angel, managing editor of the Gazette, said the visit would get plenty more coverage in Friday’s newspaper, and said it would have gotten better play on Thursday had it not been for the arrival of the body of the dead sailor, Petty Officer Second Class Chuck Komppa of the Navy.

“That is our first really local soldier that’s been killed in combat,” Ms. Angel said.

Bush Hits GOP Outposts, Dems Optimistic (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 3, 2006

President Bush, campaigner in chief for a party in peril, set out on a rescue mission for embattled candidates in the unlikeliest of places Thursday as Republicans struggled to minimize their losses in next week's elections.

Democrats expressed growing optimism that their long season out of power might soon end. Sen. Chuck Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senate campaign organization, claimed strong early voting in a long-shot race in Arizona and said it was "harbinger of a wave" that would benefit his party.

Five days before the election, Democratic strategists said none of their incumbents in either house of Congress was trailing — and Republicans did not disagree.

Republicans disputed Schumer's claim about Arizona, but even so, the GOP side of the political ledger was far less positive. Strategists already have written off the re-election prospects of incumbent Sens. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio, as well as six or more seats in GOP hands in the House. Dozens more Republican lawmakers — powerbrokers and backbenchers, conservatives and moderates — struggled to survive in a campaign shadowed by the war in Iraq and scandal at home.

"We've been through this before," Bush said in Billings, Mont., projecting confidence as he embarked on his save-the-majority tour. "We will win the Senate and we will win the House."

His itinerary showed it would be a struggle. The pre-election flight plan for Air Force One consisted of areas of the country where Republicans have unexpectedly run into trouble — House seats in Colorado, rural Nevada and Kansas, and gubernatorial races in Arkansas, Iowa and Nevada, as well as Sen. Conrad Burns' bid for a fourth term in Montana.

Western Nebraska, too, was ticketed for a presidential visit, Bush's presence deemed needed to save a House seat that Democrats last held 50 years ago.

Democrats must pick up 15 seats to gain control of the House. Their magic number is six in the Senate.

Candidates everywhere were launching the final television appeals of a long and costly campaign. Actor Paul Newman starred in one, a solo performance in which he called on Connecticut voters to turn three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman out of office and install Democratic contender Ned Lamont. "It's tough times out there, and Connecticut needs someone who is young, fresh and spunky," the 81-year-old Newman said of Lamont, 52.

Democrats said they were winning because of the public's growing dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

Polls show more Americans — now a clear majority — see the war as a mistake and far fewer support how the president has handled the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0090923

Bush showed no signs of flinching as he spoke to a crowd in Billings.

"Imagine this: We're in the midst of a war on terror, and one of the most fundamental fights is in Iraq, and yet the Democrats have no plan for victory. They have no idea how to win. Harsh criticism is not a plan for victory."

Democrats were undeterred.

"The White House seems to be playing into our hands," Schumer, D-N.Y., told reporters as part of a bullish preview of the Democrats' prospects for Senate races.

"In an effort to strengthen their base, they keep reminding the public that there's not going to be any change in Iraq," he said, referring to Bush's statement on Wednesday that he wants Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to remain in office through the end of his term.

Despite the undeniable trouble they confronted, some Republicans said they had made gains in recent days in at least some races that had earlier looked lost.

Burns' race was one. Once far behind Democratic challenger Jon Tester in public and private polls, he appeared to have closed the gap in the campaign's closing days. Democrats said they were not worried, but Bush's visit, combined with a late infusion of cash by the GOP senatorial committee, suggested Republicans had not given up hope.

GOP strategists also said their prospects appeared relatively bright for a seat in Texas that former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay once held, and expressed hope they could yet win the battle to replace disgraced former GOP Rep. Mark Foley in Florida.

The Republican candidate in Texas, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, is running as a write-in contender after the party lost a court fight to replace DeLay's name on the ballot.

In Florida, Foley's name is on the ballot, even though he quit Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually inappropriate computer messages he had sent to teenage congressional pages. The replacement candidate is state Rep. Joe Negron, and under state law, votes cast for Foley will count for him.

The district is strongly Republican, and the GOP House campaign committee has spent more than $1.6 million in the past month trying to save the seat.

At the same time, House Democrats have expanded their advertising efforts into numerous races once thought safe for Republicans. Strategists in both parties said nearly 20 Republican-held seats could tip either way in a belt of states stretching from Connecticut through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana.

One of the most endangered is Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, accused of abusing his ex-mistress. According to one person familiar with the case, he agreed to pay her about $500,000 in a settlement last year that contained a powerful incentive for her to keep quiet until after Election Day. Cynthia Ore has received part of the money, and will lose some of the rest if she talks publicly about the issue before then, this source said.

Bush Cites Chief Justice In Vote Rally (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, November 3, 2006

Searching for new arguments to mobilize conservative voters, President Bush said Thursday that Chief Justice John Roberts would not be on the Supreme Court if Democrats controlled the Senate.

Bush told voters at rallies in the red states of Montana and Nevada that if Democrats take control of the Senate, they could affect what kind of judges sit on federal courts.

Roberts' earlier nominations to a lower federal appeals court were blocked by the Senate when it was under Democratic control, Bush said. The Senate approved Bush's nomination of Roberts to head the Supreme Court last year with 22 Democrats voting for him and 22 Democrats voting against him.

"I want you to hear this loud and clear: If the Democrats controlled the Senate, John Roberts would not be the Chief Justice today," Bush said at a rally in Billings, Mont., where incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is locked in a tough race with challenger John Tester.

Bush then flew to Nevada to boost congressional candidate Dean Heller, using the John Roberts argument again to whip up conservative voters. A recent poll showed the incumbent Republican senator, John Ensign, with a wide lead over his Democratic opponent, Jack Carter, son of former President Jimmy Carter.

"If you want good, sound, conservative judges who will not legislate from the bench, you send Republicans back to the United States Senate," Bush said.

Bush was on the first day of a final six-day campaign swing before Election Day. His schedule has him appearing only in states he won in the 2004 presidential race and away from swing states where he is a more polarizing figure who might hurt GOP candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0090924

The 2nd District of Nevada where Bush stopped hasn't been won by a Democrat since its creation 25 years ago, and Bush's visit there was a sign of how much trouble Republicans face. Bush became the first sitting president to visit Elko since Herbert Hoover campaigned there in 1932 on the eve of his loss to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Bush appeared upbeat despite predictions that Democrats are poised to take control of at least one chamber of Congress in Tuesday's election. He said those forecasts are premature and smiled broadly as he appeared before cheering crowds, shaking all the hands he could reach and telling jokes. "It is nice to be in a part of the country where the cowboy hats outnumbered the ties," he said to loud cheers.

But he made one gaffe in Montana that may be a sign of the toll of frequent campaign trips. He spoke of the lives lost on Sept. 11, 2001, at the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and Lancaster, Pa. Lancaster is 165 miles east of where United Flight 93 crashed into a field in Shanksville, killing everyone on board.

On Final Campaign Swing, Bush Visits Deep Red Territory (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont., Nov. 2 -- President Bush warned Thursday that a Democratic Senate would block many of his judicial nominees and never allow justices such as John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. onto the Supreme Court, a message intended to win back his restive conservative base.

Bush flew here to help Sen. Conrad Burns stage a comeback after trailing Democratic challenger Jon Tester for months. Republicans in Washington had given up on Burns, but as his poll numbers began ticking back up, the White House saw an opportunity to reverse the odds, a move that if successful would make it difficult for Democrats to recapture the Senate.

The visit to Montana opened a six-day, 10-state final campaign swing for the president as he left Washington for the last time until Tuesday's elections. From here, he headed to Elko, Nev., and planned to campaign Friday in Missouri for Sen. James M. Talent, who is locked in the nation's tightest Senate race. Bush also plans to hit friendly areas in Iowa, Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, where he will vote before returning to the White House to watch returns Tuesday.

A Republican president normally would not need to come to a conservative bastion such as Montana this close to an election, nor to Nevada's 2nd District, which has never voted for a Democrat since it was created in 1982. But Bush is playing defense in red-state territory and sticking to states that voted for him two years ago.

Although Bush's approval ratings remain mired in the high 30s, the White House believes he can still make a difference in traditionally Republican districts and states by energizing core supporters who otherwise might not be enthusiastic about voting. Many conservatives have been alienated because of concerns over rising federal spending, illegal immigration, the Iraq war, the House page scandal and other issues.

In two rallies Thursday, Bush used his appointment of judges to remind such voters that it makes a difference who controls the Senate. "If the people of Montana want good judges, judges who will not legislate from the bench, judges like John Roberts and Sam Alito, you vote for Conrad Burns for the United States Senate," Bush told an exuberant crowd of several thousand supporters in MetraPark Arena here.

At both stops, Bush said Democrats would raise taxes, weaken the battle against terrorists and surrender in Iraq. "We will never run from thugs and assassins," he told a smaller crowd gathered on an airport tarmac in Elko. Noting that Democrats have not produced a consensus position on Iraq, Bush added: "Harsh criticism and second guessing is not a plan."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services and intelligence committees, called Bush "out of touch with Iraqi reality," citing an interview the president gave news services Wednesday in which he said he was "pleased with the progress we are making" and would keep Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld for two more years.

"The president ought to take off those rose-colored glasses," Levin said in a conference call with reporters Thursday. "The president is ignoring reality on the ground."

At his stops in Montana and Nevada, Bush avoided any discussion of scandals that have ensnared local candidates. Burns has endured criticism of his ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Rep. Jim Gibbons, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Nevada, was recently accused by a cocktail waitress of inappropriately touching her; he has said he grabbed her only to stop her from falling.

Even before that incident became public, Nevada Secretary of State Dean Heller, the GOP candidate to replace Gibbons in the House, had faced a tough road in a district where Republicans outnumber Democrats 3 to 2. This was the second time Bush has come to campaign with Heller in the past month.

Bush Speaks To Core Voters' Fears In Bid To Ignite Conservative Base By JOHN D. MCKINNON (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0090925

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- President Bush took a new tack against Democrats over their resistance to his judicial nominees as he sought to light a fire under his party's conservative Christian base before Tuesday's elections.

The twist in his stump speech came as polls suggested several endangered Republican Senate candidates -- including Sens. Conrad Burns of Montana and Jim Talent of Missouri -- were within striking distance, and that last-minute get-out-the-vote efforts among social conservatives could make a difference.

ELECTION 2006

Predict how the House and Senate votes will go in our Washington Wire reader contest1. Plus, take a closer look at issues and candidates2 in about 20 House races, review polls3 in close House contests and see complete coverage4.

As Mr. Bush began his final six-day swing of the 2006 campaign, he also continued to rely on the themes of terrorism and taxes to drive up voters' fears of a Democratic takeover in Congress. At a rally for Sen. Burns in Montana, for example, the president singled out Democratic opposition to the recent renewal of the Patriot Act and terrorist surveillance and interrogation programs.

Still, the president's schedule for the rest of the campaign reflected his diminished range, and Republicans' generally.

Through Election Day, the president was set to appear only in states that voted for him in 2004: Montana and Nevada, yesterday; Missouri and Iowa today; Colorado tomorrow; Nebraska and Kansas Sunday; and Arkansas, Florida and Texas Monday. He is avoiding most of the main battleground states where the House could be won or lost: Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and Connecticut. "The president is going to districts where we know that he can make a difference and where he knows that he can make a difference," spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Republicans are looking for turnout among their base to be particularly important in a midterm election, where overall turnout tends to be low. A senior administration official added that "this is about Republican turnout, and these are all close races where he can turn up the vote." One risk for Mr. Bush and Vice President Cheney -- who have increasingly depicted a Democratic victory as a loss for U.S. interests, especially in the war on terrorism -- is that firing up their Republican base will motivate more Democrats and independents to turn out, too.

Several planned stops -- including in northwestern Iowa and the Florida Panhandle -- were largely to increase turnout in rural areas, without stirring opposition in urban ones. Traditionally strong support for Republicans among rural voters has softened, because of the unpopularity of the Iraq war and the spike in gasoline prices earlier in the year. These appearances also are intended to help gubernatorial candidates -- such as Iowa's Jim Nussle and Florida's Charlie Crist -- who might have been hurt by the diminished popularity of the party's leaders in Washington. On the campaign's final weekend, Mr. Bush also finds himself shoring up House candidates in districts like Nebraska's rural Third, which hasn't elected a Democrat in almost 50 years.

White House strategists contend that the administration hasn't been ignoring the moderate battleground areas back East, relying on other administration figures believed to be of more help there, such as first lady Laura Bush, whose campaign schedule this week has been even busier than her husband's.

Here, Mr. Bush is likely to keep sounding themes important to social conservatives, especially in appearances for Senate candidates such as Mr. Talent, who is regarded as one of the better hopes for Republicans in seven closely contested Senate races this year. Republicans also are worried that a variety of factors, including the Mark Foley scandal, could diminish Christian conservatives' support at the polls.

Mr. Bush got a raucous reception at yesterday's rally in Billings, as he has elsewhere in recent days. He told the crowd that confirmation of his judicial appointments is "one of the most important issues...in this election."

Republican-friendly States Get Bit Of Bush Before Vote (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- President Bush yesterday kicked off the last swing of his final political campaign, a five-day blitz in 10 states considered pivotal in Tuesday's congressional midterm elections.

Bent on whipping up the Republican base, the president, visiting only states he won in 2004, is putting his power into play -- showing he is neither abandoning close races nor giving up on embattled candidates.

"These are all races that are close," a senior administration official said aboard Air Force One. "This is about Republican turnout, and these are all close races where he can turn up the vote."

The president's first stop yesterday was Montana, where incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is in a statistical polling tie with Democrat Jon Tester. Mr. Burns has made a move in the past week, after trailing by as many as 10 points a couple of months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0090926

Mr. Bush played up his Texas rancher status as he addressed a packed arena in a state that gave him 59 percent of the vote in 2004.

"It's good to be in a part of the world where the cowboy hats outnumber the ties," said the tieless Mr. Bush to laughter and applause. He used the same line hours later in Elko, Nev. In 2004, that state's rural voters strongly backed Mr. Bush, helping him carry Nevada by three percentage points.

"We don't need a lot of doublespeak in Washington. I think somebody who speaks plainly for the values of Montana is somebody you need to send back as your United States senator," he said in Billings.

The toss-up race is one of three, with Virginia and Missouri, that political strategists say Democrats must win to get the six seats they need to take control of the Senate.

At his two stops yesterday, the president hit conservative hot-button issues, such as tax cuts, the war on terror, judicial nominees and national security legislation Democrats opposed.

"The Democrat attempt to filibuster the Patriot Act follows an approach that might sound familiar. They voted for it, right before they voted against it," Mr. Bush said in Billings, reprising a line from his 2004 run against Sen. John Kerry, who has been in the news again this week over a botched campaign-trail joke.

Although many pre-election polls show Democrats poised to take over the House and possibly the Senate, Mr. Bush insisted that those political pundits will be proved wrong.

"You might remember 2004. [Democrats] were already picking out their offices in the West Wing. Except things turned a little differently, and they didn't need the movers. ... When you turn out the vote, we're going to hold the House and hold the Senate, and America is going to be better off for it," he said to cheers in Elko.

In a last-ditch effort to hold Republican power in Congress, Mr. Bush will attend two rallies today in Missouri and one in Iowa. Tomorrow, he will attend two rallies in Colorado; Sunday, he will hit rallies in Nebraska and Kansas; on Monday, he finishes up his blitz with stops in Florida, Arkansas and Texas.

Today, the president stumps for candidates in Missouri, where Republican incumbent Sen. Jim Talent is tied in polls with his Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill.

Kerry's '72 Army Comments Mirror Latest (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP, November 3, 2006

During a Vietnam-era run for Congress three decades ago, John Kerry said he opposed a volunteer Army because it would be dominated by the underprivileged, be less accountable and be more prone to "the perpetuation of war crimes."

Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran who turned against the war, made the observations in answers to a 1972 candidate questionnaire from a Massachusetts peace group.

After Kerry caused a firestorm this week with what he termed a botched campaign joke that Republicans said insulted current soldiers, The Associated Press was alerted to the historical comments by a former law enforcement official who monitored 1970s anti-war activities

Kerry apologized Wednesday for the 2006 campaign trail gaffe that some took as suggesting U.S. soldiers fighting in Iraq were undereducated. He contended the remark was aimed at Bush, not the soldiers.

In 1972, as he ran for the House, he was less apologetic in his comments about the merits of a volunteer army. He declared in the questionnaire that he opposed the draft but considered a volunteer army "a greater anathema."

"I am convinced a volunteer army would be an army of the poor and the black and the brown," Kerry wrote. "We must not repeat the travesty of the inequities present during Vietnam. I also fear having a professional army that views the perpetuation of war crimes as simply 'doing its job.'

"Equally as important, a volunteer army with our present constitutional crisis takes accountability away from the president and put the people further from control over military activities," he wrote.

Kerry's spokesman, David Wade, said Wednesday the historical document needed to be viewed in the era in which it was written but that it nonetheless raised a "bedrock question in a time of war when sacrifice should be shared by all Americans."

"These are the words 34 years ago of a 28-year-old veteran home from a war gone wrong, wondering who in America will bear the cost of battle and shoulder the responsibility of military service," Wade said.

Kerry filled out the candidate questionnaire at the request of Massachusetts Political Action for Peace, an anti-war group that decades later turned over its historical documents to university researchers.

AP obtained the document from someone who gathered it from archives during Kerry's unsuccessful 2004 presidential campaign against President Bush. Republicans in that election relentlessly assailed Kerry's role in the anti-war movement decades earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0090927

Kerry and Bush renewed their rivalry again this week, with the president accusing Kerry of offending troops. Kerry said he botched the text of a joke and didn't mean to insult troops.

On Wednesday, Kerry canceled campaign appearance on behalf of Democratic congressional candidates and issued an apology.

Insulting Our Troops, And Our Intelligence (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

George Bush, Dick Cheney and Don Rumsfeld think you're stupid. Yes, they do.

They think they can take a mangled quip about President Bush and Iraq by John Kerry — a man who is not even running for office but who, unlike Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney, never ran away from combat service — and get you to vote against all Democrats in this election.

Every time you hear Mr. Bush or Mr. Cheney lash out against Mr. Kerry, I hope you will say to yourself, "They must think I'm stupid." Because they surely do.

They think that they can get you to overlook all of the Bush team's real and deadly insults to the U.S. military over the past six years by hyping and exaggerating Mr. Kerry's mangled gibe at the president.

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to the U.S. military than to send it into combat in Iraq without enough men — to launch an invasion of a foreign country not by the Powell Doctrine of overwhelming force, but by the Rumsfeld Doctrine of just enough troops to lose? What could be a bigger insult than that?

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in uniform than sending them off to war without the proper equipment, so that some soldiers in the field were left to buy their own body armor and to retrofit their own jeeps with scrap metal so that roadside bombs in Iraq would only maim them for life and not kill them? And what could be more injurious and insulting than Don Rumsfeld's response to criticism that he sent our troops off in haste and unprepared: Hey, you go to war with the army you've got — get over it.

What could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in uniform than to send them off to war in Iraq without any coherent postwar plan for political reconstruction there, so that the U.S. military has had to assume not only security responsibilities for all of Iraq but the political rebuilding as well? The Bush team has created a veritable library of military histories — from "Cobra II" to "Fiasco" to "State of Denial" — all of which contain the same damning conclusion offered by the very soldiers and officers who fought this war: This administration never had a plan for the morning after, and we've been making it up — and paying the price — ever since.

And what could possibly be more injurious and insulting to our men and women in Iraq than to send them off to war and then go out and finance the very people they're fighting against with our gluttonous consumption of oil? Sure, George Bush told us we're addicted to oil, but he has not done one single significant thing — demanded higher mileage standards from Detroit, imposed a gasoline tax or even used the bully pulpit of the White House to drive conservation — to end that addiction. So we continue to finance the U.S. military with our tax dollars, while we finance Iran, Syria, Wahhabi mosques and Al Qaeda madrassas with our energy purchases.

Everyone says that Karl Rove is a genius. Yeah, right. So are cigarette companies. They get you to buy cigarettes even though we know they cause cancer. That is the kind of genius Karl Rove is. He is not a man who has designed a strategy to reunite our country around an agenda of renewal for the 21st century — to bring out the best in us. His "genius" is taking some irrelevant aside by John Kerry and twisting it to bring out the worst in us, so you will ignore the mess that the Bush team has visited on this country.

And Karl Rove has succeeded at that in the past because he was sure that he could sell just enough Bush cigarettes, even though people knew they caused cancer. Please, please, for our country's health, prove him wrong this time.

Let Karl know that you're not stupid. Let him know that you know that the most patriotic thing to do in this election is to vote against an administration that has — through sheer incompetence — brought us to a point in Iraq that was not inevitable but is now unwinnable.

Let Karl know that you think this is a critical election, because you know as a citizen that if the Bush team can behave with the level of deadly incompetence it has exhibited in Iraq — and then get away with it by holding on to the House and the Senate — it means our country has become a banana republic. It means our democracy is in tatters because it is so gerrymandered, so polluted by money, and so divided by professional political hacks that we can no longer hold the ruling party to account.

It means we're as stupid as Karl thinks we are.

I, for one, don't think we're that stupid. Next Tuesday we'll see.

DOJ_NMG_0090928

Rep. Paying Ex-mistress About $500K (AP-Y)

By Michael Rubinkam

AP, November 3, 2006

A Republican congressman accused of abusing his ex-mistress agreed to pay her about $500,000 in a settlement last year that contained a powerful incentive for her to keep quiet until after Election Day, a person familiar with the terms of the deal told The Associated Press.

Rep. Don Sherwood is locked in a tight re-election race against a Democratic opponent who has seized on the four-term congressman's relationship with the woman. While Sherwood acknowledged the woman was his mistress, he denied abusing her and said that he had settled her $5.5 million lawsuit on confidential terms.

The settlement, reached in November 2005, called for Cynthia Ore to be paid in installments, according to a person who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deal is confidential. She has received less than half the money so far, and will not get the rest until after the Nov. 7 election, the person said Thursday.

A confidentiality clause requires Ore to forfeit some of the money if she talks publicly about the case, according to this person and two other people familiar with elements of the case.

It is common in settlements for payments to be made in installments and for the parties to be held to confidentiality.

Sherwood admitted no wrongdoing, a standard provision in such agreements, this person said.

Sherwood, a 65-year-old married father of three who is considered a family-values conservative, had one of the safest seats in Congress until Ore sued him in June 2005, alleging he physically abused her throughout their five-year affair.

Reached by telephone Wednesday, the congressman and successful car dealer said: "I can neither confirm nor deny because this was a private settlement. If I'd like to talk to you about it, I can't."

The Associated Press has been trying for months to find out the terms of the settlement.

According to a police report, Ore called 911 on her cell phone from the bathroom of Sherwood's Capitol Hill apartment in 2004 and reported that Sherwood had choked her while giving her a back rub. Sherwood admitted having an affair with the woman, but vehemently denied ever hurting her, and criminal charges were never filed. But Ore, now 30, sued for damages.

Sherwood's challenger, Chris Carney, has hammered the congressman over the affair in TV ads, calling Sherwood a hypocrite who brought "Washington values" to his rural northeastern Pennsylvania district.

Sherwood responded with his own ad, in which he looked directly into the camera and apologized for his conduct. Last month, his wife mailed a letter to voters that accused Carney of "needlessly cruel" campaign tactics.

Although GOP voters greatly outnumber Democrats in his conservative district, many people have said they would not vote for him again because of the affair.

Even before Ore settled, the congressman tried to keep a tight lid on the case. His lawyer asked a judge to prohibit disclosure of materials from the case, warning that Sherwood's opponents might try to use the information to harm him politically.

The lawyer, Bobby Burchfield, was especially adamant that any videotaped deposition of Sherwood not be released, saying the footage could be used against him in negative political ads.

Ore's attorney, Ning Ye of New York, declined to say where she is living now or how she can be reached.

Ethics Questions Haunting Races Of Democrats, Too (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 2 — First came a letter in June, in which federal prosecutors here revealed that they are investigating claims of “endemic hiring fraud” in agencies and departments that fall under the purview of Rod R. Blagojevich, the governor of Illinois.

Then, last month, one of Mr. Blagojevich’s top fund-raisers was indicted on accusations that he sought millions in kickbacks from investment companies seeking the state’s pension business.

Any of it would be a governor’s bad dream, but particularly so in the case of Mr. Blagojevich, a Democrat who faces a re-election vote on Tuesday in a state still bruised from the corruption that left its last governor bound for prison.

Yet Mr. Blagojevich appears headed toward victory, leading his Republican opponent by double digits in one poll, by The Chicago Tribune and WGN-Channel 9, that was released on Tuesday.

In what Democrats nationally have worked hard to portray as a “culture of corruption” in the Republican Party, more than a dozen Republicans in House races have wrestled with the taint of a Congressional page scandal; links to Jack Abramoff, the convicted lobbyist; and a smattering of individual woes from claims of financial shenanigans to sexual wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0090929

Still, there are Democrats like Mr. Blagojevich whose campaigns have also been marked by claims of ethical failings in widely varying degrees, from Representatives William J. Jefferson of Louisiana and Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia to Senator Robert Menendez of New Jersey. In another governor's race in the Midwest, that of James E. Doyle of Wisconsin, scandal has emerged as a serious issue.

But while the Democrats' problems have certainly made these races tighter than they might otherwise be, they have for the most part not carried the lethal sting of the Republicans' missteps, independent political scientists and election analysts say.

In broad terms, the analysts say, the Democratic effort nationally to paint a systematic and more deeply rooted corruption label on Republicans this year seems to be working, blunting individual controversies that might be devastating to the Democrats at some other moment. Some polls back up that point. Thirty-five percent of the voters surveyed for a New York Times/CBS News poll completed this week said the Republican Party had the most corrupt politicians, while 15 percent said the Democratic Party did.

"It's just not the year for Republicans to be lobbing corruption charges," said Thomas M. Holbrook, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee who studies elections. "It's a real uphill battle for them in that regard, and this is a pretty good year, then, even for Democrats who aren't terribly popular like Governor Doyle."

In some cases, like the Illinois and Wisconsin campaigns for governor, Democrats have managed to turn the tables on their accusers, raising ethical questions about the Republicans in the races while also denying any wrongdoing on their own parts and, along the way, leaving many voters throwing up their hands and concluding that both sides have problems.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Doyle was quick to point to the Washington connections of his opponent, Representative Mark Green, as he also described what he was hearing from constituents.

"People are really fed up with how Congress has behaved and how the president has behaved," Mr. Doyle said.

He added, "The Republicans, facing sort of a desperate situation, are trying to throw anything up."

Mr. Green seemed to acknowledge the forces beyond him and beyond any taint of scandal in Wisconsin.

"There is no huge advantage to my being a Republican who has served in Congress," Mr. Green said. "It's clearly not a wind at my back."

The authorities in Wisconsin have said they were looking into claims that workers under the Doyle administration made state decisions favorable to those who contributed to his campaign. This fall, in a move that drew a flood of attention in the political race, a federal judge sentenced a former state employee to prison on charges she directed a state contract to a company that donated thousands to Mr. Doyle.

Mr. Green said voters there were extremely focused on the "whole issue of corruption, ethics, about whether or not the state is moving in the right direction" under Mr. Doyle's administration, adding quickly, "Remember, someone in the Doyle administration is going to federal prison."

Mr. Doyle, finishing his first term as governor, has denied any wrongdoing and emphasized in the interview that he had never met the convicted state employee. The latest polls show Mr. Doyle and Mr. Green locked in a tight race that has grown increasingly nasty.

Mr. Doyle, who served as attorney general of Wisconsin for three terms, has raised questions about nearly $468,000 in out-of-state campaign contributions that Mr. Green moved from his federal campaign to his state campaign last year. The state elections board ordered Mr. Green not to use the money, saying transfers from political action committees not registered in the state were not legal. Mr. Green said he has set aside the money in question while he awaits an appeal.

In Illinois, Mr. Blagojevich, who portrayed himself as a reformer when he won the governorship four years ago, campaigned this fall even as a federal investigation swirled on into accusations of rigged political hiring by state officials.

In a letter in June, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney, said the investigation "has now implicated multiple state agencies and departments" with help from "a number of credible witnesses."

Mr. Blagojevich has denied any wrongdoing, pointed to ethics reforms that he said his administration has put in place, and distanced himself from the indictment of his former fund-raiser.

"What you'll see is that a lot of these activities center around the Republicans — the continuation of a scheme that occurred long before I was governor," Mr. Blagojevich said on Thursday.

The previous governor, George Ryan, a Republican, was sentenced in September to six and a half years in federal prison for racketeering and fraud. Mr. Blagojevich has made certain to remind voters that his Republican opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, served as treasurer during Mr. Ryan's long tenure as a Republican leader in this state. "She was there, hand in hand with George Ryan, part of creating the mess that we've been fixing," Mr. Blagojevich said.

Ms. Topinka, meanwhile, described Mr. Blagojevich's situation as "scandal on top of scandal on top of scandal." Voters, she said, have noted that, and they care. Still, Ms. Topinka said, it is not an easy time to be a Republican candidate — here or elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0090930

The Chicago Tribune/WGN-Channel 9 poll shows Mr. Blagojevich leading with 44 percent of those surveyed, compared with 29 percent for Ms. Topinka, 13 percent for a Green Party candidate, and 13 percent who were undecided.

"It's difficult to run after Ryan," Ms. Topinka said. "And it's difficult to run after the scandals in Washington."

The Tribune poll shows Ms. Topinka may be right. Those surveyed gave Mr. Blagojevich a slight edge when asked who would do a better job of cleaning up corruption and which candidate they found more honest.

Menendez Seeks To Bury Image Of A Shady Dealer (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

ATLANTIC CITY -- A balding labor chieftain explains why his hard-hats should vote for the plump candidate who stands here in a muddy construction site dressed in a white knit cotton shirt, a pinstriped suit, loafers and a perfectly knotted tie.

"Bobby Menendez is a fighter !" Billy Mullen bellows at his guys on this balmy autumnal day. "He's been in the gutter , he's rolled around down there his whole life . . ." The hard-hats do much appreciative thumping of hands and waving of fists.

Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, gives a pained smile suggestive of intestinal discomfort. He rarely answers to "Bobby." And there's a very good likelihood -- no, let's make it a certainty -- that he is not enamored of this particular compliment.

The notion that Menendez, 52, rolls in the gutter before lunch, that he is a political boss as expert in the manipulation of political IOUs and shivs as he is in the intricacies of trade policy, has trailed like a mutt after Menendez throughout his Senate campaign.

His opponent, Republican Tom Kean Jr., a semi-obscure state senator and the trust-fund scion of a multigenerational political powerhouse, cannot clear his throat without intoning that Menendez is "under federal investigation." There are, in Kean's telling, Menendez's questionable rental contract with a local not-for-profit, the pressure his advisers applied to get an ally hired at a local hospital, and so on and on.

Even if these charges prove true, it's not clear such behavior is illegal or disabling. In New Jersey the operating political philosophy is described as "pay to play," and the occasional indictment might be viewed as part of the life cycle of politics.

"We are a very, very nonjudgmental state," noted Clifford Zukin, a professor of public policy at Rutgers University. "Unless you are rich and can buy in from the outside, it takes a great deal of skill and toughness to rise up."

Still, the charges -- repeated in countless commercials -- take a cumulative effect. New Jersey has trended Democratic for years. But Menendez, who was appointed in January to fill the Senate seat vacated by Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D), stands a bare notch ahead of Kean in polls.

One public poll asked voters what jumps to their mind when they hear the candidates' names. Kean? He's the son of a former governor.

As for Menendez? The greatest number of poll respondents -- 21 percent -- say the words that come to mind are "corruption/crooked."

Menendez sits in the back of a coffee shop at the Borgata casino after his Atlantic City labor rally and wags his head. It's Halloween, and a waitress dressed as a giant Hershey's Kiss has just served coffee.

"In the end of the day, have all the negative ads taken effect? It's hurt." Menendez favors a softly wounded tone. "I didn't expect this."

The word "complicated" hangs over Menendez's head like a thought balloon.

One on one, he's neatly coifed and studiously bland, a pug-nosed lawyer at ease with the arcana of trade policy and Iraq. He's the immigrant's son -- his parents grew up in Havana and fled the dictator Fulgencio Batista -- and a skilled infighter for a higher minimum wage and low-cost student loans, and a determined opponent of the war in Iraq.

On the stump, he's curiously diffident. He attended a Veterans Day breakfast in Cherry Hill, a hall thick with old vets speaking in the emphatic manner of the hard of hearing. Max Cleland, the former Georgia senator and Vietnam amputee, had flown to campaign for him. The old Georgia pol coached the candidate.

"Go ahead, Bobby," Cleland whispers. "Push my wheelchair out there."

Menendez tends to step on his own applause lines. One vet after another ambles up to shake Menendez's hand but the candidate's handshake is as fleeting as his attention.

You might not guess that politics has been Menendez's chosen -- and highly successful -- calling since he ran for school board at the age of 19. He grew up in a tenement in Union City, a working-class immigrant city that hangs like a vine to the cliffs of the Palisades overlooking the Hudson River. The city sits in Hudson County, which for more than a century has exemplified a style of politics known as Early Feudal.

As Rep. Rodney P. Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) recently explained to the Record of Hackensack: "You don't take prisoners in Hudson County, you shoot them."

DOJ_NMG_0090931

Another piece of the county's political DNA was laid down by Frank Hague, mayor of Jersey City from 1917 to 1947. He had a desk constructed with a lap drawer so visitors might deposit charitable envelopes of cash. Hague's salary never exceeded $8,000; his net worth at the time of his death was $10 million.

Menendez' first job came with William V. Musto, the intermittently reformist mayor of Union City. Later Menendez, who wore a bulletproof vest during this time, testified that Musto took bribes. Musto was convicted, and then he was reelected the day after he was sentenced.

Menendez has put in place mayors of Jersey City and Union City -- and upended the same men. But he recoils at any notion he's a boss. "Tom Kean rises to the top of his county machine with no experience and it's 'leadership,' " Menendez says in that professorial manner. "But we pick a candidate here in Hudson County and it's bossism. That's very outdated."

It must be said, however, that Hudson County politics retain a high entertainment value. Robert Janiszewski, the former county executive of Hudson County was forced to go into the witness protection program in 2001 after it was revealed he had worn an FBI wire. Janiszewski was sentenced to 41 months but in prison he's resurfaced as a pen-pal adviser to Kean's campaign.

Menendez frowns.

" In that case , the history of Frank Hague lives. But that history is not reality for the rest of us."

First Lady Pitches For Roskam, McSweeney, Topinka (CHIT)

By Susan Kuczka And John Biemer

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

First Lady Laura Bush tried to fire up Republican voters Thursday at a rally for candidates in two of the nation's hardest-fought and most expensive congressional races.

Bush also pitched Judy Baar Topinka's run for governor at the Schaumburg rally.

Bush and Topinka shared the stage with Peter Roskam, the west suburban 6th Congressional District Republican candidate, and David McSweeney, the northwest suburban 8th Congressional District GOP nominee. Bush said the two men are key to helping the administration fight the war on terrorism.

"We all know ... that the well being of young people in Illinois and across our country ultimately depends on our government's ability to protect them, by defeating terrorism and increasing liberty abroad," Bush said during a 13-minute address before about 1,000 supporters.

"In Congress, Dave McSweeney and Peter Roskam will be champions of the men and women of the United States military. They understand that this election is critical to the future of our country, and they know that America faces challenges too important to be reduced to just politics."

Roskam, a state senator from Wheaton, is facing Democrat Tammy Duckworth in the race to succeed retiring Republican Rep. Henry Hyde. McSweeney, a Barrington businessman, is challenging first-term Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean.

Bush also used her address to promote Topinka, who is challenging Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich.

"Judy Baar Topinka is dedicated to bringing jobs to the state of Illinois," she said. "And as Gov. Topinka, Judy will make sure everyone in Illinois benefits from our nation's growing economy."

Blagojevich, appearing at a pipefitters union-led rally in Mokena, began outlining priorities for a second term as governor. Appearing before several hundred union members, Blagojevich promised to spend $100 million on stem cell research over the next four years and to provide health care for all military veterans.

The governor has come under fire from some Republicans and conservative Democrats in the legislature for using budgetary maneuvers to provide state funding for embryonic stem cell research without specific legislative approval.

Blagojevich did not specifically say how much the veterans health care initiative would cost or how he would pay for the proposals he outlined.

Meanwhile, Democrats were preparing a series of rallies Monday featuring Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Dick Durbin to promote Duckworth, Bean, 10th Congressional District candidate Dan Seals and Todd Stroger, the candidate for Cook County Board president. Seals is challenging North Shore Republican Rep. Mark Kirk, and Stroger faces Republican rival Tony Peraica.

Obama will return to Chicago after three days series of campaign appearances for Senate and governor candidates in Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri and Iowa, home of the nation's first presidential caucus. Obama has said he is studying a 2008 presidential bid.

On Thursday, Duckworth countered Bush's appearance with a gathering in a Mt. Prospect home of about three dozen people who said they were switching their Republican allegiance to support her candidacy. Duckworth pledged to stand up for mainstream values and work in a bipartisan manner in Washington, though she warned that they wouldn't agree with her votes every time.

DOJ_NMG_0090932

"If you're looking for someone who's going to be a straight party-line vote, I am not your candidate," Duckworth said.

She also promoted support from former Defense Secretary Bill Cohen, a Republican who served in President Bill Clinton's Cabinet. Cohen, in a statement, said Duckworth would be "a strong voice for our military personnel and veterans."

In Washington, federal election officials released a report showing congressional candidates nationally had spent nearly $966 million during the two-year campaign cycle, with the 6th and 8th District races among the those with the heaviest spending and most furious fundraising.

Among House races nationally through Oct. 18, the Federal Election Commission said McSweeney was the fourth-biggest money raiser at $4.2 million and the fourth-biggest spender at $3.8 million. He also was second among candidates who gave their own campaigns money at $2.2 million. Bean was 10th in money raised at $3.7 million and seventh in money spent at $3.6 million, the FEC said.

Duckworth ranked 18th in terms of money raised at $3.3 million and 17th for money spent at $2.8 million, the FEC said. Roskam was 29th in raising money at $2.9 million and ranked 32nd in money spent at $2.4 million.

Those figures don't include another $7 million being spent on the two races by the national party campaign committees.

Evangelicals' Faith In Republicans Wavers (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

This week has been the busiest of John Giles's year. He is responsible for the distribution of 1.7m "voter guides" that will be offered to worshippers at churches across Alabama this Sunday, two days before the mid-term elections.

Mr Giles is careful to make sure his pamphlets do not violate laws that bar churches from making political endorsements. But by detailing candidates' views on issues such as abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research, the guides leave little room for doubt about how God-fearing Christians should cast their votes.

Before previous elections the guides were produced by the Alabama chapter of the Christian Coalition, the grassroots organisation credited with turning US evangelical Christians into a political force. This year, however, churchgoers will find a new name on hand-outs following Mr Giles's decision to create a breakaway organisation called Christian Action Alabama.

Three other state chapters – Georgia, Iowa and Ohio – have also left the coalition, reflecting growing divisions among evangelicals. They broke away in protest at what they perceive to be a shift by the Christian Coalition away from core issues, such as abortion and gay marriage, towards a broader agenda.

"There were various reasons why we left but the main one was this drift to the left," says Mr Giles, previously chairman of the Alabama chapter. "The direction they are taking is going to divide Christians. They are walking into a trap set by our opponents."

The Christian Coalition was set up in 1988 by Pat Robertson, the evangelical preacher, and turned into a political powerhouse by Ralph Reed, the Republican strategist. It reached its peak during Bill Clinton's presidency in the 1990s, when evangelical voters, who represent about a quarter of the US electorate, helped break the Democrats' 40-year stranglehold over the House of Representatives.

But the coalition's influence has waned over recent years following the departure of Mr Robertson and Mr Reed and the emergence of rival Christian conservative groups, such as Focus on the Family and the Family Research Council. Its annual budget has shrunk from $26m to about $1m (€787,000, £526,000).

In an attempt to revive its fortunes, the coalition is reaching out to moderate evangelicals and mainstream Christians by embracing a wider range of causes and softening its fire and brimstone rhetoric.

Joel Hunter, the charismatic pastor of a Florida megachurch, who was appointed coalition president in July, has vowed to "rebuild and rebrand" the coalition and make it less fixated on "below the belt" issues related to sexuality.

Mr Hunter is among a growing number of evangelical leaders willing to break out of traditional conservative territory to tackle issues more commonly associated with the left.

Last month he joined more than 20 other prominent evangelists to issue an appeal for President George W. Bush to push for UN intervention in Darfur, Sudan. Another group of church leaders, including Mr Hunter, has launched an advertising campaign on Christian radio stations calling for action against global warming.

"The armlock of the religious right over evangelicals is beginning to loosen," says Randall Balmer, professor of American religion at Columbia University.

Roberta Combs, chairwoman of the Christian Coalition, insists there has been no departure from conservative values and says not all Mr Hunter's personal views represent official policy.

But Ms Combs, who recruited Mr Hunter, supports his efforts to broaden the coalition's appeal. "Family values are about more than one or two issues," she says. "We must keep an open mind and an open heart."

DOJ_NMG_0090933

Back in Alabama, Mr Giles fears a conspiracy is under way to lure evangelicals towards liberal causes with the aim of weakening the religious right. “We can all unite around a few core issues, such as abortion, pornography and gambling,” he says. “But when you start talking about global warming, the minimum wage or the death penalty, the consensus breaks down.”

Scott Keeter of the Pew Research Center says white evangelicals remain among the strongest sources of Republican support, representing more than a third of all people who identify with the party. But he warns that their enthusiasm has “significantly diminished” since the 2004 presidential election, when 78 per cent of white evangelicals voted for Mr Bush.

Many evangelicals believe their support has been taken for granted by the Republicans and complain that election promises, such as Mr Bush’s pledge to push for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, have gone unfulfilled. A succession of Republican ethics scandals has deepened their disillusionment.

The number of evangelicals with a favourable opinion of the Republican party fell from 74 per cent in 2004 to 54 per cent last July, according to the Pew Research Center.

But John Green, senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, warns against writing off evangelicals as an electoral force. “The religious right is not as well organised or as energised as in 2004,” he says. “But whatever their problems with the Republicans, they prefer them to the Democrats. The threat of Democrats taking control of Congress provides a strong motivation to vote.”

On The Religious Right, An Alliance Torn Asunder (WP)

By Alan Cooperman And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

Both are Christian conservatives, and they were once stalwart allies, but Dick Armey and James Dobson are going after each other tooth and claw.

Armey, the former Texas congressman and House majority leader, argued in the Outlook section of this past Sunday's Washington Post that Republicans face an "electoral rout" because they stopped being the party of limited government, allowed spending to spin "out of control," and concentrated on such issues as flag burning, Terry Schiavo and same-sex marriage.

On the Web site of FreedomWorks, the organization he now heads, Armey pins much of the blame on Dobson, the founder and chairman of Focus on the Family, and other "self-appointed Christian leaders."

Calling them "thugs" and "bullies" in recent interviews, Armey says that "Dobson and his gang" have split the conservative Christian movement into two camps: those who want to "practice their faith independent of heavy-handed government" and "big government sympathizers who want to impose their version of 'righteousness' on others."

Dobson, in a commentary for the Web site of Fox News, responded this week that Armey is "a very bitter man" who is still smarting because "I supported my close friend and hunting buddy," Rep. Steve Largent (R-Okla.), over Armey for majority leader. Dobson denied that he supports big government and cited news media reports that Armey has been consulting for the American Civil Liberties Union.

Calling the accusations "a shocker" that "came straight out of the blue," Dobson concluded with this hypothesis about Armey: "He could be trying to reposition himself as an erstwhile Republican leader by discrediting the Religious Right, hoping to step into the vacuum after the upcoming election."

A Dobson ally, the Rev. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, said in an interview that evangelicals are irate over Armey's suggestion that issues such as same-sex marriage have distracted the Republicans. In 2004, he said, a referendum to ban same-sex marriage got more votes than President Bush did in Ohio.

"If it weren't for the marriage amendment in Ohio, John Kerry would be president. So shut up, Dick," Land said.Tilting Toward Windmills

There's a new star in this season's campaign commercials: windmills.

While tall, spindly wind turbines might not be popular among Cape Cod residents right now, politicians from Montana to New York are using them to show voters they're committed to a clean energy future. At least 17 political ads feature windmills this year, according to the advocacy group League of Conservation Voters, a phenomenon that the group's president, Gene Karpinski, said shows that his group's message has finally acquired political resonance.

"Nobody's ever said, 'We're coming to Congress to change environmental policy.' That's never happened before," Karpinski said. "This election is about change, and a big part of that change is about energy security."

Of course, doing a stand-up in front of a massive windmill carries risks, as well. Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) is shown with her hair flying about as she declares, "This windmill farm will make America less dependent on foreign oil." And Democratic Senate hopeful Jon Tester (Mont.) just looks small compared with the wind turbines standing behind him on an open plain. But Karpinski remains undaunted.

"Candidate after candidate after candidate, they're talking about it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0090934

Church Leader Resigns After Gay Sex Claim (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

One of the nation's most influential conservative Christian leaders, the Rev. Ted Haggard, resigned yesterday as president of the National Association of Evangelicals and temporarily stepped aside as pastor of a Colorado mega-church after a self-described male escort accused him of paying for gay sex.

Haggard, an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage, vigorously denied the allegation. "Never had a gay relationship with anybody, and I'm steady with my wife. I'm faithful to my wife," he told a Colorado television station, KUSA.

But in a statement issued by New Life Church, his 14,000-member congregation in Colorado Springs, Haggard said he could "not continue to minister under the cloud created by the accusations," which were first made public on a Denver talk-radio station yesterday morning.

Although he has avoided endorsing political candidates, Haggard has been a staunch ally of the Bush administration. Some political observers said his resignation was more bad news for Republicans trying to rally their conservative Christian base to turn out for the midterm elections.

"This is one more factor that could increase the disillusionment of evangelicals with prominent leaders on the Christian right and with the political process as a whole, and some may conclude that perhaps their forebears were wise to be wary about politics," said William Martin, a professor of religion and public policy at Rice University and a biographer of the Rev. Billy Graham.

Conservative Christian leaders rallied around Haggard. "I've always admired Ted's Christian character and his ministry, and I find these accusations incredible, frankly," said the Rev. L. Roy Taylor, chairman of the National Association of Evangelicals, which has about 45,000 constituent churches across the country.

Taylor said that the NAE's executive committee will hold a teleconference today to decide how to proceed. He said he may serve temporarily as president of the organization, in addition to his regular duties as the stated clerk, or administrative leader, of the conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

"I'm a minister not a political scientist, so I couldn't predict" what political impact Haggard's resignation might have, Taylor said. "Evangelicals have a serious understanding of the power of sin and human evil, and realize that every person, whether Christian or not, struggles with the dark side," he added.

In his written statement, Haggard said he was "voluntarily stepping aside from leadership" of New Life Church so that its four-member board of overseers could conduct an investigation. An associate pastor, the Rev. Ross Parsley, will take over as the church's acting leader, and "in the interim, I will seek both spiritual advice and guidance," Haggard said.

Haggard declined further comment, but a close colleague at New Life Church said that although he is stepping down as pastor temporarily, his resignation as president of the NAE is permanent.

"Ted realizes this is a pretty consuming situation in terms of media, and in order to make sure the good work of the NAE goes forward without distraction, that is a decision he voluntarily made," the colleague said, speaking anonymously because the church was limiting its comments to the written statement.

Haggard's accuser identified himself as Mike Jones, 49. Jones said in radio and television interviews that he had a three-year sexual relationship with the pastor, who he said came to Denver and paid him for sex about once a month.

Jones told Peter Boyles, host of a talk-radio show on KHOW-AM station, that he has recorded voice-mail messages and a letter from Haggard, and that he witnessed the pastor using methamphetamine. But he did not immediately produce the alleged voice-mails or letter.

Jones indicated that he is going public with the accusations at least in part because Colorado has two questions related to same-sex marriage on Tuesday's ballot. One is Amendment 43, which would define marriage as between one man and one woman, and which Haggard has supported. The other is Referendum 1, which would give same-sex couples more legal rights and benefits.

"Being a gay man all my life . . . I felt it was my responsibility to my fellow brothers and sisters, that I had to take a stand, and I cannot sit back anymore and hear [what] to me is an anti-gay message," Jones said.

John Green, an expert on religion and politics at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life in Washington, said Haggard's resignation is likely to reverberate more loudly in Colorado than nationally.

"Haggard is a very important political figure in Colorado, and there are tight races there as well as ballot questions that could be affected," he said, citing in particular the embattled reelection efforts of Reps. Marilyn Musgrave and Tom Tancredo, both Republicans. "I think there's less of an implication for what evangelicals might do nationwide, because outside of Colorado he's not directly involved in voter turnout efforts and is seen as more of a religious leader than a political one."

DOJ_NMG_0090935

Green also noted that under Haggard's leadership, the NAE has sought to widen the evangelical agenda to include global warming, international human rights and poverty issues. Although non-evangelicals may view Haggard as a diehard conservative, within the evangelical movement he is seen as a moderate, Green said.

"If the allegations are proven true, it could discredit a prominent moderate figure in the evangelical community," he said.

Church Leader Resigns Amid Gay Sex Claim (CHIT/AP)

By Catherine Tsai

Chicago Tribune, November 3, 2006

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. -- The president of the National Association of Evangelicals, an outspoken opponent of gay marriage, has given up his post while a church panel investigates allegations he paid a man for sex.

The Rev. Ted Haggard resigned as president of the 30 million-member association Thursday after being accused of paying the man for monthly trysts over the past three years.

Haggard, a married father of five, denied the allegations, but also stepped aside as head of his 14,000-member New Life Church pending an investigation.

"I am voluntarily stepping aside from leadership so that the overseer process can be allowed to proceed with integrity," he said in a statement. "I hope to be able to discuss this matter in more detail at a later date. In the interim, I will seek both spiritual advice and guidance."

Carolyn Haggard, spokeswoman for the New Life Church and the pastor's niece, said a four-member church panel will investigate the allegations. The board has the authority to discipline Haggard, including removing him from ministry work.

The acting senior pastor at New Life, Ross Parsley, told KKTV-TV of Colorado Springs that Haggard admitted that some of the accusations were true.

"I just know that there has been some admission of indiscretion, not admission to all of the material that has been discussed but there is an admission of some guilt," Parsley told the station.

He did not elaborate, and a telephone number for Parsley could not be found late Thursday.

The allegations come as voters in Colorado and seven other states get ready to decide Tuesday on amendments banning gay marriage. Besides the proposed ban on the Colorado ballot, a separate measure would establish the legality of domestic partnerships providing same-sex couples with many of the rights of married couples.

The allegations stunned church members.

"It's political, right before the elections," said Brian Boals, a New Life member for 17 years.

Church member E.J. Cox, 25, called the claims "ridiculous."

"People are always saying stuff about Pastor Ted," she said. "You just sort of blow it off. He's just like anyone else in the public eye."

The accusations were made by Mike Jones, 49, of Denver, who said he decided to go public because of the political fight over the amendments.

"I just want people to step back and take a look and say, 'Look, we're all sinners, we all have faults, but if two people want to get married, just let them, and let them have a happy life,'" said Jones, who added that he isn't working for any political group.

Jones, who said he is gay, said he was also upset when he discovered Haggard and the New Life Church had publicly opposed same-sex marriage.

"It made me angry that here's someone preaching about gay marriage and going behind the scenes having gay sex," he said.

Jones claimed Haggard paid him to have sex nearly every month over three years. He said he advertised himself as an escort on the Internet and was contacted by a man who called himself Art, who snorted methamphetamine before their sexual encounters to heighten his experience.

Jones said he later saw the man on television identified as Haggard and that the two last had sex in August.

He said he has voice mail messages from Haggard, as well as an envelope he said Haggard used to mail him cash. He declined to make the voice mails available to the AP, but KUSA-TV reported what it said were excerpts late Thursday that referred to methamphetamine.

"Hi Mike, this is Art," one call began, according to the station. "Hey, I was just calling to see if we could get any more. Either $100 or $200 supply."

A second message, left a few hours later, began: "Hi Mike, this is Art, I am here in Denver and sorry that I missed you. But as I said, if you want to go ahead and get the stuff, then that would be great. And I'll get it sometime next week or the week after or whenever."

DOJ_NMG_0090936

Haggard, 50, was appointed president of the evangelicals association in March 2003. He has participated in conservative Christian leaders' conference calls with White House staffers and lobbied members of Congress last year on U.S. Supreme Court appointees after Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement.

After Massachusetts legalized gay marriage in 2004, Haggard and others began organizing state-by-state opposition. Last year, Haggard and officials from the nearby Christian ministry Focus on the Family announced plans to push Colorado's gay marriage ban for the 2006 ballot.

At the time, Haggard said that he believed marriage is a union between a man and woman rooted in centuries of tradition, and that research shows it's the best family unit for children.

Connecticut Seats May Be Key To Control (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 3, 2006

FAIRFIELD, Conn. — Three moderate House Republicans and a conservative Senate Democrat are downplaying party labels in the final days of the campaign here in hopes the state's independent voters will send them back to Washington.

Nearly half of Connecticut voters are unaffiliated, with 30% of registered voters Democrats and 20% Republican. Nationally, about one-third of people who have responded to Gallup Polls in 2006 identify themselves as independent.

Connecticut elected former Republican-turned-independent Lowell Weicker as governor in 1990. The man who ousted Weicker from the Senate two years before that, Joe Lieberman, now appears poised for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic ballot line to businessman Ned Lamont.

And come Tuesday, the state's independents could determine which political party controls the House of Representatives. That's because three of the seats Democrats could gain for a majority are here. They need 15.

"It's an independent state that's more subject to trends," says University of Connecticut political scientist Kenneth Dautrich, "like the need for change."

Rep. Christopher Shays, a 10-term Republican incumbent, is under no illusions. "This may be the last time I have to speak before the Rotary as a member of Congress," he recently told the group here. A Zogby poll released Wednesday showed Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, a former Westport first selectwoman, ahead 51%-43.5%.

Now, wherever Shays goes, he brings along a 54-page booklet full of reasons to re-elect him. There's his seat on a key financial committee (page 1), the federal money he's brought home (p. 4), his 54% liberal rating from Congressional Quarterly (p. 40).

At the Rotary, Shays even mentioned his work for pet victims of Hurricane Katrina. "I'm not one-dimensional."

In an interview at his waterfront Bridgeport home, Shays pinpointed his problem: "Iraq. And people don't like George Bush.

In a year when polls show that sentiment pervasive nationwide, it is significant that political luminaries from Laura Bush to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are flocking to the state. And the airwaves are blanketed with negative ads.

"This is a flyover state in presidential years," says Farrell, who got 48% of the vote against Shays in 2004. "Connecticut voters now know what it's like to live in (battleground) Ohio or Pennsylvania."

"If the Democrats run the table in Connecticut, that would be a national message that the war in Iraq will have some national resonance," says Fairfield University political analyst John Orman.

Besides Shays, who represents one of the country's wealthiest congressional districts, two other moderate Republicans are in close races:

·Nancy Johnson, a 12-term incumbent who helped author the Medicare prescription-drug program, is opposed by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy.

·Rob Simmons is seeking a fourth term in the country's most Democratic district held by a Republican. He is in a rematch against former state legislator Joe Courtney, who got 46% of the vote in 2002.

"We call ourselves the spotted owl caucus," jokes Simmons of moderate Republicans. "We know we're endangered."

Shays is a member. He has won widespread support in this moderate district that stretches from the affluent New York City suburb of Greenwich, where the first President Bush grew up, to gritty industrial Bridgeport.

But attitudes may be shifting.

"I still think he's a good man," said Democrat Ted Shiffman, a Stamford lawyer and former Shays supporter. "But every few years, it's important to have a change in control so that one party doesn't become entrenched."

Farrell has depicted Shays as an enabler for Bush's unpopular Iraq policies and the priorities of the conservative-led Congress. During one of 11 debates, Farrell, 51, framed the choice: "With Chris, you get the status quo. With me, you get a new direction."

DOJ_NMG_0090937

Shays, 61, disputes that. “I'm probably the biggest change agent in Washington” he says, because as a centrist, “I make things happen.”

Steve Goodman, 35, an independent voter, agrees. “I like people who work with both parties,” he said as he waited in Stamford for a commuter train. “I like the fact that he votes the issue.”

For Stamford lawyer Jim Hughes, an undecided voter, the election is “a coin toss” between good candidates. Yet he gets “weak knees over the war” and an open-ended commitment in Iraq. “That might have something to do with” whom he chooses, he says.

Unlike some Republicans who try to avoid talking about the war, Shays has taken it head-on. “I know more than any other member of Congress about what's going on in Iraq,” he says.

“I'm not afraid to lose this election over the war,” says Shays, who has visited Iraq 14 times, more than any other lawmaker.

It is clear the conflict has taken a toll. His eyes turn watery when he speaks of Iraqis and U.S. military families who have lost loved ones. He uses words like “tormented” and “wrestle” when talking about how his warnings as far back as April 2004 of mistakes went unheeded. And he calls “offensive” Farrell's charge of an “election year conversion” when, after the anti-war candidate Lamont's primary trouncing of Lieberman, Shays called for a timeline to get out.

Yet as political pressure has mounted, Shays has had some self-inflicted problems. Last month, he said abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib's prison involved a “sex ring” and not torture. He later backtracked.

Two days earlier, he defended taking money from embattled House Speaker Dennis Hastert by saying of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a Farrell supporter, that, “I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water and then have a press conference the next day. Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody.” The reference was to the 1969 car crash in Chappaquiddick that left a woman dead.

“Those were out of character,” Orman says, “but it showed how intense the race has gotten.”

Campaign '06: In Final Days, Parties Dream Of Senate Upsets (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 3, 2006

Democrats and Republicans have each picked a state where they're hoping for a November Surprise and have begun pouring buzzer-beating money into Senate contests that have not been on anyone's toss-up list.

For Democrats, the hope for an upset is Arizona, where incumbent Sen. Jon Kyl (R), has looked safe from the Democratic challenger, shopping mall developer Jim Pederson.

For Republicans, the long shot is Michigan, where the National Republican Senatorial Committee is throwing a $900,000 lifeline to Mike Bouchard, a sheriff challenging Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D).

In Arizona, Kyl would only lose in a national typhoon. But Democrats are acting confident and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, is touting an "expanding Senate playing field." Pederson, the Democrat, has mounted an attack focusing on Iraq and special interests. The conservative Kyl has focused on "Arizona accomplishments" and expertise on terrorism.

In Michigan, Stabenow has led handily in polls and fundraising. Bouchard, with the slogan "Results for a Change," began running the nationally financed ads yesterday, and reaches out to younger voters tonight by appearing with Kid Rock. Democrats say it's too late, and that Stabenow has used her cash advantage to build a lead and define Bouchard.

Republicans hope for an upset in Michigan because an anti-incumbent tide could benefit the GOP in a state where both U.S. Senators and the Governor are Democrats. That is one of the races that will help illuminate whether any wave this year is anti-incumbent, or just anti-Republican. The GOP is also making offensive moves in New Jersey, where Tom Kean Jr. is profiting from corruption charges against incumbent Robert Menendez, and Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is running on change against Democrat Ben Cardin, a 10-termer in the U.S. House.

In other Senate races, two struggling Republicans are both running ads acknowledging public frustration with Iraq. In Washington state, Republican Mike McGavick, former chief executive of an insurance giant, is using the tag line "Real. Change" to challenge freshman Sen. Maria Cantwell (D), who has supported the war. A new McGavick ad uses the President's former "stay the course" mantra as a slur against Cantwell and says: "President Bush doesn't understand our frustrations." In Minnesota, three-term Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) is gaining on prosecutor Amy Klobuchar (D) with an ad that tries to level with voters. "None of us like war. And we've made some mistakes in Iraq," the ad says. "Leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America." His close is one of the year's most memorable: "I'm Mark Kennedy. ... I approve this message even though I know it may not be what you want to hear."

Vitriol Fills The Air And Airwaves As Allen And Webb Battle On (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0090938

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 2 -- Democratic Senate hopeful James Webb today tapped the star appeal of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama to stir the passions of his party's base, rallying with 700 supporters before heading to Northern Virginia for a similar event with actor Michael J. Fox.

Obama told a cheering crowd at Virginia Union University that Webb is someone who "has fought for this country, who has led this country," and he urged supporters to drag "those uncles and cousins who don't vote to the polls" on Tuesday to help elect Webb.

Webb's opponent, incumbent Republican Sen. George Allen, had a more low-key day, accepting the endorsement of the Minutemen, a national organization that fights illegal immigration, at a news conference in Roanoke. He then went to the Philip Morris cigarette plant just south of Richmond to privately shake hands for an hour during a shift change.

Allen plans to fly across the state this weekend, stopping in Hampton Roads, Winchester, Southside Virginia, Roanoke and Norfolk. He plans to spend Sunday in Northern Virginia. Aides declined to give details of the events or say who will be campaigning with the senator.

"I knew I had a target on my back," Allen told reporters at Philip Morris. "The national liberal Democrats have no love for me. I knew they'd be gunning for me."

Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and has been campaigning for candidates who support stem cell research, spoke to a crowd of about 1,000 at a ballroom in Clarendon. "A vote for Jim Webb is a vote for hope and a better quality of life for Americans," the actor said.

The attention from Fox and Obama, who have been crossing the country to stump for candidates, marks the beginning of a statewide tour for Webb that will include stops with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, former governor Mark R. Warner and former U.S. senator Bob Kerrey of Nebraska. The five-day trip will end with former president Bill Clinton at an election-eve rally in Alexandria.

"If we prevail here -- and we are going to prevail," Webb told the enthusiastic crowd at Virginia Union, "we are going to bring a different kind of attitude to the United States government."

Both candidates expect a close race and have begun to prepare for the possibility of a recount. Allen's campaign team held an hours-long meeting Wednesday to plot legal strategy in the event that a recount is necessary. Allen is consulting former Virginia solicitor general William H. Hurd, who led the recount team for Republicans last year when Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) won by just 360 votes.

Webb aides said they also are preparing contingency plans for a recount, although they said they are confident they will not be needed. A drawn-out legal battle in Virginia could leave the state's residents in limbo and the balance of power in the Senate unclear.

"The last thing we need is another recount," said state Sen. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who lost to McDonnell. "Nov. 8 was like Groundhog Day for six . . . weeks. I've moved on. But it was very tough. We don't need that."

Allen started his day in Roanoke, where he focused on illegal immigration. He picked up the endorsement of Chris Simcox, founder and chairman of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, which is battling illegal immigration along the U.S. border with Mexico and elsewhere. Minutemen have been in Herndon videotaping day laborers and would-be employers after the Town Council there approved setting up a controversial center to host day laborers seeking work.

Later, Allen talked to reporters in front of the Philip Morris plant, where the company produces about 240 billion cigarettes a year. Allen condemned Webb and Democrats as having run "the most negative, smearing campaign that Virginia has ever seen."

Even as he said that, the National Republican Senatorial Committee began running an attack ad on his behalf, saying Webb has written books that stereotype women as promiscuous objects. "His novels? Some are graphic, even deviant," a female announcer says in the commercial.

Allen also began running an ad accusing Webb of wanting to give Social Security benefits to illegal immigrants.

Webb advisers condemned the ads, saying they are "full of lies." At the Obama rally, Webb again accused Allen of waging a "classic Karl Rove campaign, designed to divide people, to go after their emotions, to assassinate people's character. This has been an incredibly negative campaign."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee began airing a television commercial attacking Allen by citing negative comments from Virginia newspapers. "Allen is a mediocre senator. He is in lockstep with Bush. An administration parrot," the ad says.

At the Virginia Union rally, Obama called on Virginians to send President Bush and Republicans a clear message by voting Allen out of office. Of the voters across the country, he said, "When they start paying attention, the folks in power right now are in trouble."

DOJ_NMG_0090939

Warner and Kaine also helped to whip up the crowd. Kaine called Webb "a spectacular, spectacular candidate." Warner mocked Allen, saying the "cakewalk" that pundits had predicted for the incumbent was turning into a victory for Webb.

"It's five days before, again in Virginia, we make history," Warner roared.

Staff writers Tim Craig and Bill Turque in Washington contributed to this report.

Webb Goes Big As Allen Stays Local (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

James H. Webb Jr. is sticking close to his Democratic friends and held rallies with political heavy hitters yesterday, while Republican Sen. George Allen is standing with local leaders at much smaller meet-and-greets as Virginia's U.S. Senate race enters its final days.

Mr. Webb, who holds a slight lead in most polls, joined Sen. Barack Obama and Virginia's top Democrats at an overflowing midday rally in Richmond before appearing at a sold-out fundraiser with actor Michael J. Fox and former presidential candidate Gen. Wesley Clark in Arlington last night. Mr. Webb will hold an Election Eve rally with former President Bill Clinton, his second appearance in Virginia this year.

Mr. Webb said the energy at the Clarendon Ballroom last night is "what carried us from a deficit of 33 points at one point to a lead" in the polls.

Mr. Allen, meanwhile, nabbed the endorsement of the border-enforcement group the Minutemen and today plans to attend small events with local leaders in Hampton Roads, including an appearance at the Chesapeake Fire Academy graduation.

"I shook hands with well over a thousand folks in there," Mr. Allen said yesterday after greeting the 2,500 workers at the Philip Morris cigarette-manufacturing plant in Richmond.

His advisers have not outlined their strategy for planning low-turnout events nor have they released a formal schedule for the campaign's final weekend, but Mr. Allen yesterday said he was glad to meet with tax-paying "working people."

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Govs. Mark Warner and L. Douglas Wilder revved up the more than 700 attendees at the Obama rally at Virginia Union University yesterday. They said Mr. Webb has priceless momentum heading into Tuesday's election.

The national names guarantee Mr. Webb good television coverage, but the current and former governors are key local boosters.

"This is like the Dream Team and 'American Idol' and all that all rolled up into one," Mr. Kaine said. "I can feel the energy all across this commonwealth."

Although Mr. Webb has been attached at the hip to Mr. Kaine, Mr. Warner and Mr. Wilder and has brought in the Democratic party's top fundraisers and cheerleaders in recent weeks, Mr. Allen has not announced plans to bring any Republican stars to Virginia for the final days of campaigning.

President Bush appeared at a Richmond fundraiser for Mr. Allen last month, and first lady Laura Bush also raised money for the Republican.

Mr. Allen has been on the campaign trail with respected Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and will be joined by members of the state's Republican congressional delegation in coming days.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee implored his supporters in a recent e-mail: "The President and I have relied upon George Allen over the last years to cast critical votes on legislation important to our efforts to move America forward."

Mr. Allen recently has brought in lesser-known Republican senators including Elizabeth Dole and Richard M. Burr of North Carolina, David Vitter of Louisiana and Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona is the biggest name who could feasibly come to Virginia, but his staffers did not return calls asking whether he will.

Mr. McCain has starred in television ads and raised money for Mr. Allen.

The endorsement from the Minutemen political action committee will help Mr. Allen with his conservative base. Mr. Allen opposed the Senate's "comprehensive" immigration plan and favors strong border enforcement instead of a "path to citizenship" for illegals.

Mr. Allen is running ads saying that if Mr. Webb is elected, he would reward illegal aliens with amnesty.

Through Monday, both candidates will touch down in all the state's regions, but none of Mr. Allen's upcoming events are expected to generate the type of excitement seen by the screaming Obama fans yesterday.

Rally attendees shoved themselves at the Illinois Democrat to ask for autographs and screamed until they were hoarse when Mr. Webb alluded to Mr. Obama's presidential ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0090940

"He needs your help, he needs people to volunteer, he needs people to make phone calls, he needs people to do whatever it takes," Mr. Obama said, adding he is "absolutely confident" that work will lead to a Webb victory.

Mr. Allen would be wise to avoid another Bush visit, even though he is a major crowd draw.

Last fall, Republican gubernatorial candidate Jerry W. Kilgore was hurt by an election-eve rally with the president, whose popularity at the time was sinking but higher than it stands today.

In Arlington last night, a crowd of about 900 gathered at the sold-out event at the Clarendon Ballroom, while people outside sported anti-Bush-Cheney signs and sold stickers saying: "Bill Clinton lied about sex -- George Bush lies about everything."

Mr. Fox and Gen. Clark said they support the Vietnam War veteran because he's a "man of integrity."

"Senator Allen needs to hear from you, a vote for Jim Webb is a vote for the hope of a better quality of life for millions of Americans," said Mr. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and has become a national symbol for the debate over stem-cell research.

"We owe it to our families, we owe it to our neighbors, and we owe it to future generations," Mr. Fox said. "We are not unrealistic. We realize it may take years before the promise of stem-cell research is realized, but we need scientists and researchers to start now with the full support of the federal government."

Mr. Webb said he relies on scientists who say research could hold the key to breakthrough cures for Alzheimer's disease, spinal-cord injuries and Parkinson's.

In July, Mr. Allen supported Mr. Bush's veto of a bill allowing federal funding for embryonic-stem-cell research.

"I am for stem-cell research but not the kind that would destroy human embryos," Mr. Allen said yesterday.

Allen, Webb Turn Focus To Ground Game (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

RICHMOND -- In the final days before the U.S. Senate election in Virginia, both campaigns are focusing on a crucial ground game to get voters to the polls.

Sen. George Allen, a Republican, and former Navy Secretary James H. Webb Jr., a Democrat, are prepared for a long night Tuesday in case the result is too close to call.

Both men, who have spent months slinging political mud back and forth, will spend the remainder of the campaign trying to energize their supporters.

"Thunder's impressive, but it's lightning that does the work," Mr. Allen said yesterday, quoting Mark Twain. "Susan and I may be the thunder, the lightning is all our grass-roots supporters all over Virginia."

Mr. Webb said yesterday the folks on the ground are the reason he went from having no money and being more than 30 points behind in polls to leading Mr. Allen in the most recent polls.

"We're going to go 24 hours a day until Tuesday morning," Mr. Webb told supporters in Richmond yesterday.

Both campaigns would not outline their legal strategy if the victor's margin is razor-thin, if a recount is needed or if there are problems with voting machines, but each has lawyers in place just in case.

"We are ready for that scenario if it were to occur," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "We are covering all our bases."

"It's going to be a close election -- we want to win by enough so we don't have to worry about lawyers," Mr. Allen said. "We need less litigation in our country."

A recount certainly is possible, as Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb are locked in a tight battle, and last fall, the attorney general's race in Virginia was decided by fewer than 400 votes following a long recount process and several court hearings.

Mr. Allen's campaign Web site (www.georgeallen.com) encourages Virginians to "Vote early, vote Allen," and asks for volunteers for the "72-hour get-out-the-vote team."

Mr. Webb's Web site (www.webbforsenate.com) asks voters to join "Jim's Brigade" and to request absentee ballots so they are free to help on Election Day. "We need YOU!" it states.

Virginians also will see a barrage of political ads on television through Tuesday -- ranging from attacks on character to upbeat, positive messages from each candidate asking humbly for their vote.

Both Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb will be aided by outside groups -- including conservative and liberal bloggers -- hoping to influence the election outcome.

The League of Conservation Voters is going door to door for Mr. Webb to educate voters on what they say is Mr. Allen's worst-in-the-Senate environmental record and is encouraging Virginians to vote absentee.

The National Rifle Association is telling its 100,000 Virginia members that it has strongly endorsed Mr. Allen with an "A-plus" rating, though Mr. Webb has been given an "A" rating by the gun rights group.

State Republicans are putting their all into Mr. Allen's turnout operation, especially in Northern Virginia where the party has suffered in back-to-back elections.

"It is time for all conservatives in Virginia to mount up and win the ground game for Senator Allen," reads a post on the Allen-friendly "A-Team" blog (www.allens-a-team.com).

The blogger encouraged volunteers to drop literature and put up yard signs.

Mr. Webb has been getting advice from the last two statewide Democratic winners -- Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner.

"I think Jim Webb's got all the momentum, and I see nothing that's going to change that in the next few days," Mr. Warner said.

Yesterday, Webb volunteers handed out fliers asking for more help to make phone calls and talk to voters after they leave the polls on Election Day.

"We're doing it out of zeal for the candidate," said Hank Alden, a Henrico County resident and "sign captain" of the Webb volunteers.

As of Wednesday, there were nearly 4.6 million registered voters in Virginia.

Voters, who are not required to register by party, have been asking for more absentee ballots to vote early than in previous years.

State elections officials said more than 100,000 requests for absentee ballots were made as of last week.

In Virginia Race, Women May Be The Decider (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

FAIRFAX, Va., Nov. 1 — There is, unquestionably, a striking amount of testosterone in the Virginia Senate race between Senator George Allen, football-tossing Republican conservative, and Jim Webb, Democrat, Vietnam veteran and chronicler of the warrior tradition.

But the real struggle in this exceedingly tight contest, one of a handful that will determine control of the Senate, may be decided by how women vote.

In the final stretch before Election Day, both candidates have high-profile Virginia women campaigning on their behalf. Mary Matalin, the Republican strategist, is urging women to “talk to your girlfriends” on Mr. Allen’s behalf. Lynda Robb, the wife of former Senator Chuck Robb and a daughter of President Lyndon B. Johnson, is hailing Mr. Webb as “understanding the needs of Virginia’s families.”

The Allen and Webb campaigns have attacked each other throughout the fall over their commitment (or lack thereof) to women’s issues and concerns, and they are ending, to a large extent, with women’s voices. In one Webb commercial being broadcast this week, a woman named April Cain looks into the camera and declares, “I have two boys, one is 9 and one is 12.”

“George Allen hasn’t done anything to help my family,” Ms. Cain adds.

In a new commercial for Mr. Allen, put up by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the female announcer intones that Mr. Webb’s writings “routinely stereotype women as promiscuous objects.”

“Arrogantly and outrageously,” the voice continues, “Webb refuses to be ashamed of what he’s written.”

The battle for the female vote began in earnest earlier this fall, when the Allen campaign, struggling to regain control of the race after several missteps, took aim at Mr. Webb’s argument 30 years ago against women in combat and the admission of women to the Naval Academy.

For much of the fall, commercials have featured retired military women arguing for — and against — Mr. Webb, who has said that he has changed over the years and that he should be judged by his record of advancing women when he was secretary of the Navy during the Reagan administration.

Last week, when polls showed the race a dead heat, the Allen campaign introduced a new issue seemingly tailored for women: saying Mr. Webb’s novels included sexually explicit scenes and “chauvinistic attitudes.”

Mr. Webb’s allies noted that his novels, mostly about men at war, were, first of all, fiction, and, second, had been widely acclaimed by a spectrum of prominent people like Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a fellow Vietnam veteran.

Those attacks, some analysts say, help explain why some recent polls show Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen running close among women.

“We don’t have a gender gap,” said Harry L. Wilson, director of a new Roanoke College Poll, alluding to the Democrats’ traditional advantage among women, although other polls have indicated the Democratic edge remains.

Equally striking is that Mr. Webb is neck and neck with Mr. Allen among men, which is unusual for a Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0090942

Mr. Webb's strategists acknowledge that he has room to increase his support among women, but say he will realize that potential in the final days.

"Sure, they did break through with this stuff that happened 30 years ago," said Kristian Denny Todd, Mr. Webb's press secretary. "But at the end of the day, a lot of these women have small children, they care about education, they care about the war.

"They'll say, this stuff happened 30 years ago. But he's with me on things I care about today."

That case is made, in part, by the commercial featuring Ms. Cain, who argues that while Mr. Allen has been in the Senate, health care costs have continued to rise, "college tuition is out of control" and Mr. Allen gave himself a raise. Another Webb ad asserted that Mr. Allen "voted against family and medical leave three times."

Steve Jarding, an adviser to the Webb campaign, said, "The dilemma for Allen is he's not a moderate on women's issues."

The Allen campaign has relied heavily on Susan Allen, the candidate's wife, to make its case to women. In an interview, Ms. Allen denounced the negative tone of the Senate campaign, but defended the Allen campaign's highlighting of Mr. Webb's novels.

"The fact is, my husband's life has been an open book in this campaign — all his speeches, votes, his record has been an open book for everyone to examine," she said.

The demographics in this race revolve around more than sex. The populous suburbs of Northern Virginia are becoming an increasing source of strength for Democrats; the strategic imperative for Mr. Webb is to exploit that advantage fully to offset any losses in less friendly areas.

The Senate campaign over the past four months has taken striking turns. Mr. Allen, long considered a potential 2008 contender for the White House, saw his lead melt away after making what was perceived as a demeaning racial reference to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent. This week, a scuffle broke out at an Allen campaign event after a liberal blogger aggressively tried to question Mr. Allen about his treatment of his first wife, Anne Waddell. Ms. Waddell issued a statement on the Allen campaign Web site this week saying that Mr. Allen "was, and is, a wonderful person," and that if she lived in Virginia she would vote for him.

The anger between the two campaigns over tactics and strategy is palpable.

Adding to it are stark differences between the two candidates on issues, beginning with the war in Iraq. Mr. Webb, a first-time candidate for elective office, said he entered the race largely because of the Bush administration's handling of Iraq, which he had sharply criticized even before the invasion; Mr. Allen has supported the president's policies.

Mr. Webb is closing out his campaign with a new, upbeat spot in which he declares, to the camera: "Those in power haven't served us. They've failed to protect our working people, they failed us on ethics and they're failing in Iraq. Bottom line: they're not fighting for you. I will."

Mr. Allen, in one of his closing commercials, declares, "I want to continue fighting for our shared values: lower taxes, a better education for our children, and a safer, stronger America."

At a campaign event in Fairfax on Wednesday, Mr. Allen, seeking his second term after serving as governor of Virginia, said his campaign was "going really well."

But the Webb campaign was claiming momentum, and independent analysts said the race remained too close to call.

Stem Cells A Wild Card In Missouri Senate Contest (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

ST. LOUIS

Candidates for US Senate have all been dealt similar hands for this midterm election: a president with low job approval, rising voter uneasiness about the Iraq war, and flat wages. But here in Missouri, there's a wild card in the Senate contest - stem-cell research.

It's possible that a stem-cell ballot initiative here could affect voter turnout enough to tip one of the country's closest Senate races. Trouble is, no one can predict with confidence which candidate would benefit most: the Republican incumbent, who opposes a state constitutional amendment to permit the use of embryonic stem cells for medical research, or the Democratic challenger, who supports it.

About 51 percent of Missouri voters favor Amendment 2 while 35 percent are against it, a Research 2000 poll reported last weekend. Support for the amendment has fallen in recent months with more voters now saying they are undecided about it. The amendment would permit the use in Missouri of any federally allowed stem-cell research and treatments, including work involving human embryos.

DOJ_NMG_0090943

But the advantage may in fact go to Sen. Jim Talent, running to serve a second term, because the stem-cell issue could bring to the polls the state's social conservatives who, while they are voting against Amendment 2, would also be likely to cast a vote for him.

The team behind challenger Claire McCaskill (D) "is banking on voter support for stem cell [research] to translate into support for her," says David Kimball, a political scientist at the University of Missouri here. "But it may actually energize conservative voters. If that issue were not on the ballot, they might not have as much reason to come out and vote."

An 11th-hour, TV-ad slugfest over the stem-cell measure may have served to stimulate voter interest. In an ad that debuted Oct. 21 during the first game of the World Series, actor Michael J. Fox touted Ms. McCaskill and attacked Senator Talent for failing to support the amendment. Talent supports stem-cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo, but has said he opposes the amendment because it would "make cloning human life at the earliest state a constitutional right." Conservative talk-show host Rush Limbaugh subsequently leapt on Mr. Fox, and a group opposing the initiative rebutted the Fox ad.

The video by Missourians Against Human Cloning features World Series hero-pitcher Jeff Suppan, former St. Louis Rams quarterback Kurt Warner, and James Caviezel, the actor who portrayed Jesus in Mel Gibson's movie, "The Passion of the Christ." Mr. Caviezel begins the ad speaking in Aramaic and concludes with the warning: "You know now. Don't do it," referring to voting for the amendment.

Such ads could resonate with Roman Catholic voters, who make up about 16 percent of Missouri's 5.8 million residents. Many priests in the state have taken a strong stance against the stem-cell measure, some even handing out antiamendment yard signs after Sunday Mass, according to a parishioner who saw it happening at his church.

"We're strong Catholics," he says, asking that his name not be used. "But we're not happy about the church's big push on this. They're going all out."

A CNN/Opinion Research poll on Monday showed the Senate race to be "a tossup," with Talent and McCaskill each garnering 49 percent support from likely voters.

The stakes are high. "This Missouri race could be the difference between keeping a [Republican] majority in the Senate and not keeping it," says Brooke Buchanan, a Republican National Committee spokeswoman. "We're prepared to do anything it takes to make sure Senator Talent continues to be the senator from Missouri."

The tight race has drawn the national parties and their fellow travelers, who have poured manpower and money into the state. The result: Missourians have been lashed by a maelstrom of conflicting, often negative ads on TV and in print. The Talent camp has slammed McCaskill with charges that she misused her post as state auditor. Groups supporting McCaskill are publicizing Talent's votes against raising the minimum wage - and berating him for taking $165,000 in annual pay as a senator.

Of course, many factors go into most voters' calculus about whom to vote for, and stem-cell research is just one. The Iraq war is the biggest concern here, reflected in President Bush's 37 percent popularity rating with Missourians. McCaskill's team has been bent on linking Mr. Bush and Talent, saying the senator doesn't represent "Missouri values" but is simply a rubber stamp for failed Bush policies, most notably Iraq.

That message resonates even among some Republicans.

"Jim's position is basically that, whatever Bush wants, he gets. His percentage of voting with the president is abnormally high, and it's hurt him," says a state Republican Party activist who asked not to be named because he is upset with Talent and might vote against him. "Talent will depend upon the get-out-the-vote machinery. We can get the people out all right, but can we get them to cast [their votes] the way we want [them] to?"

On a recent Sunday, Franklin and Tresa McCallie went door-to-door in Kirkwood - a conservative, upper-middle-class St. Louis suburb - to campaign for Democratic candidates. They say they found an unusual responsiveness.

"I'm a yellow-dog Democrat who was raised a conservative in Chattanooga, Tennessee," Mr. McCallie says in a pronounced drawl. "Kirkwood typically goes Republican. But the problem for Mr. Talent is that all the issues are running against him. You have people in Kirkwood who are not all wealthy or rich, and they're questioning the status quo."

The old calculus for winning in Missouri was to carry the big cities and suburbs in five counties, where about 52 percent of the voters live. But in recent elections, that equation was upended by turnout surges in the state's 109 rural counties. Rural Missouri, with its strong contingent of Christian conservatives, has gone strongly for Bush and Republicans.

But fewer rural conservatives may be with Talent this year, thanks to the Iraq war, analysts say. As a result, McCaskill is pursuing what some see as a risky strategy of spending the end of the campaign shuttling between St. Louis and rural towns like Kirksville and Sikeston - where she and Talent recently appeared in a parade, riding just floats apart - to try to make inroads into Republican territory.

Talent, meanwhile, has been stumping in rural sections of the state, shoring up his base in towns such as Mexico, Mo., and Rogersville. The big question is whether the stem-cell turnout will be enough to reelect Talent.

DOJ_NMG_0090944

"Voters are predisposed to be upset with the governing party, and that's the Republicans," says Dr. Kimball. "All the big issues are running up against the powerful Republican turnout machine. So I just don't know what to expect, honestly. This is not a typical election."

Actor Tackles Emotional Political Role (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

CHEVY CHASE -- Michael J. Fox sits in a chair in a hotel room, in constant motion. Legs are crossed and uncrossed. Socks are repeatedly pulled up underneath trousers. His head moves side to side with reliable irregularity.

The movements would be arresting if not for the man behind them. He is focused. So determined to tell what he has to say.

Fox is bringing his Parkinson's disease, and a political message, to Maryland and other states where control of the U.S. Senate is in the balance: Virginia, Missouri, Ohio, Iowa and Wisconsin.

While politicians debate whether frozen embryos should be adopted, used for research or discarded, Fox wants to change people's minds.

Federal money for embryonic stem cell research can improve life for the sick and the disabled, he told a couple of hundred people backing Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin's bid for U.S. Senate Thursday. Fox said he will stump for candidates who support such funding and fight like crazy against those who don't.

"We are who are," Fox, 45, said in a Holiday Inn ballroom with Cardin by his side. "We have what we have. We want what we want, and we have a right to seek the representation that will get it for us."

The actor has become one of the most visible figures of the campaign season by thrusting himself into an emotional debate over emerging science and its moral implications.

Fox, the former star of the Back to the Future movies and the situation comedies Family Ties and Spin City, is commanding a bigger stage these days as an advocate for embryonic stem cell research, targeting states that could elect senators favorable to science.

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the GOP's Senate nominee in Maryland, opposes embryonic stem cell research. He and Cardin are airing television ads on the subject. Fox is featured in Cardin's. In Steele's, his sister, Monica Turner, calls the Fox ad "deceptive, tasteless" and reveals that she has multiple sclerosis.

During an interview at the hotel before the Cardin event, Fox took the high road when asked about the Steele ad. He said he had not seen it in full.

"I don't want to get involved with any conflict with another patient," Fox said. "It just is what it is. I respect everyone's point of view. And I respect her right to express it. I really do. And more power to her. And I'm sure she's thought about it and prayed about it and done whatever process she has to do to reach the conclusion she's reached, and I fully respect that."

He had harsher words for a Steele campaign spokesman who, Fox said, called his ad in extremely poor taste.

"As far as the other goes -- the campaign itself calling my ad in extremely poor taste -- that leads you to conclusions about attitudes toward sick people and their symptomatology and their right to be involved in the process and their franchise to help shape government policy and the future of health and science in the country," he said. "That's strange to me. And certainly to millions of Americans."

Fox, whose Parkinson's foundation has raised about $70 million over the past five years, said he does not care about political labels. He said he would back, and has supported, members of both parties who favor embryonic stem cell research.

In Maryland Thursday, with Fox by his side, Cardin promised that if he is elected Tuesday, he will promote the research, which is opposed by some conservatives and anti-abortion candidates because it involves the destruction of a human embryo.

"I am going to be pushing that bill with all the energy I have," Cardin said to applause.

On NBC's Meet the Press, Steele said he views the destruction of an embryo as the taking of a life and that, in keeping with his anti- abortion views, can't condone it. He suggested adoption for the 400,000 or more embryos in fertility clinics across the country.

Fox said Thursday that adoption could be a fine use for some of the embryos but that tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of others would remain. And embryonic stem cells can do something their adult stem cell counterparts cannot, Fox said, because they're more flexible.

Adult stem cells, research on which Steele and Bush support, are "cranky cells," Fox said.

"They already are what they are, they don't want to be anything else," he said. "When you try to get them to be something else, they don't like doing it. And when you get them to be something else, they don't want to stay that way."

Embryonic stem cells, in contrast, can become various cells in the human body. That is how the healing could start for the paralyzed, the Alzheimer's patient or the actor turned advocate who is trying to make Washington stand up and listen.

DOJ_NMG_0090945

"To limit it to [adult stem cells] is like saying you can have a seat belt, but you can't have an air bag," Fox said. "We have the technology to have air bags. I'd like both. If that's OK."

Then he pauses, a wry smile spreading across his face. "Tasteless idea," he says.

Cardin Rallies Blacks In PG (WT)

By Jon Ward And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday tried to rally support among black Democrats in Prince George's County, while Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele campaigned with county Democratic leaders who broke ranks this week to endorse him.

Mr. Cardin appeared with Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and about 30 other lawmakers in Hyattsville, aiming to keep a diminishing lead in the polls.

Mr. Johnson noted that he supported Mr. Cardin's opponent in the primary -- Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"Unfortunately, as Democrats, we know we can only have one winner," Mr. Johnson said.

Mr. Mfume narrowly lost the nomination and trounced Mr. Cardin in Prince George's, with 74,637 votes to Mr. Cardin's 19,824.

In his first public show of support for Mr. Cardin, Mr. Johnson said the 10-term congressman is "one fantastic individual that will represent us in the United States Senate."

"I am proud and a strong supporter of Ben Cardin for the United States Senate," Mr. Johnson said.

But the rally turned sour later. State Sen. Nathaniel Exum, Prince George's Democrat, berated Mr. Cardin for excluding him and other local delegates from speaking or being mentioned.

"You do the same [stuff] over and over again, just ignore us," Mr. Exum yelled at Mr. Cardin after the rally, which was held in Mr. Exum's district.

Mr. Cardin shrugged off the incident.

"I think he's upset that we didn't go over the names, but I'm not too concerned about it," Mr. Cardin said. "He's supporting us."

Today, Mr. Cardin will appear with Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, for the second time in this campaign, which has become one of the country's most closely watched races.

Mr. Cardin's rally was designed to respond to Mr. Steele's endorsement from prominent Prince George's Democrats earlier this week. Former County Executive Wayne K. Curry and all five black members of the County Council endorsed Mr. Steele, saying the Democratic Party has taken black voters for granted.

Mr. Cardin attacked Maryland Republicans, saying their plans to question voters whom they think committed fraud is an attempt at voter intimidation and suppression.

The Maryland Republican Party said the plans were copied from Democratic plans and are allowed under law. They also released a document from the 2004 presidential election in which Colorado Democrats were advised to make up claims of voter intimidation against minority voters if none could be found.

The election could hinge on how Prince George's 320,000 registered Democrats vote Tuesday. The county, which is more than 65 percent black, accounts for a large part the Democratic Party's overwhelming advantage in voter registration.

Mr. Steele yesterday received an endorsement from several religious leaders, including Harry Jackson a Democrat and bishop of the Hope Christian Church, a charismatic ministry in Lanham with about 2,000 members.

In Annapolis, Mr. Steele announced a 10-point election promise that included pledges to improve health care among minorities, introduce legislation to stop disparities in criminal-sentencing guidelines for blacks and to support increased aid to African and Caribbean countries.

Mr. Steele ended his day by campaigning with Mr. Curry in Greenbelt.

Mr. Cardin attended an afternoon rally in Bethesda with TV star Michael J. Fox to call for embryonic stem-cell research, then one in Baltimore with former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the 2004 Democratic vice-presidential nominee.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, also attended the Edwards rally, during the second day of his six-day, statewide bus tour.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican running for re-election, voted by absentee ballot in Glen Burnie, Md., and will today campaign at several stops, all in Baltimore County.

Mr. Ehrlich has cut Mr. O'Malley's double-digit lead to one point, according to poll released this week that was conducted for the Baltimore Sun. The poll, by Potomac Inc., showed Mr. O'Malley leading Mr. Ehrlich 47 percent to 46 percent with five percent undecided.

DOJ_NMG_0090946

Steele Would Help Change Capital's Culture (BSUN)

By John Mccain

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

I strongly support Michael S. Steele's candidacy for one simple reason: We need to change Washington.

Congress doesn't need another career politician or political insider. We need someone who is a strong, independent voice for what is right, regardless of party politics. I know Michael Steele, and I know he will shake up Washington for all the right reasons.

We see it almost every day: runaway spending, scandal, legislation written by and for special interests. Washington has become a culture unto itself where special interests reign supreme, where partisanship precedes statesmanship, and where the ambitions of politicians come before the interests of the people.

It doesn't need to be this way. You can change the way Washington works. But to do so, you must elect candidates such as Michael Steele who have the courage to do the right thing, regardless of their party.

By sending Michael Steele to the U.S. Senate, Marylanders not only would be electing a public servant who knows and cares about the issues concerning the entire Old Line State, but they also would be delivering a clear message that it is time for change.

This summer, I came to Baltimore to campaign for Michael Steele because he has the courage to do something simple: represent Maryland, not special interests.

In the four years he spent as your lieutenant governor, Michael Steele single-handedly broke the mold of his predecessors, using his position as a vehicle for change. He has visited schools, community centers, housing projects and businesses forgotten by others. He has done so not to score political points, but to find solutions to problems that directly affect Baltimore. As he has traveled to every corner of the state, his campaign echoes this solutions-driven policy throughout Maryland.

Michael Steele has successfully built bridges across racial, economic and partisan lines. He has worked to fix Maryland's pension system for teachers and to improve school systems that have given up on kids, and empowered small businesses throughout the state to foster access and opportunity for minority business owners - increasing minority business within the state by one-third. The Sun named Michael Steele one of the 2003 legislative session's "winners" for his efforts on both sides of the aisle.

It is time for someone fully committed to changing the way Washington operates. It is time for someone who is not afraid to criticize what's wrong - with either party. It is time for someone who knows that getting things done and creating positive change is more effective than a "go along to get along" attitude.

It is time for Michael Steele.

Little Seems Secure About Security Tapes (LVS)

By Jeff German

Las Vegas Sun, November 3, 2006

· For three days this week, the media were saturated with speculation from unnamed sources that just-discovered video surveillance tapes do not show Rep. Jim Gibbons and Chrissy Mazzeo inside a parking garage where she claims the Republican gubernatorial candidate assaulted her Oct. 13.

Metro Police stood silent on the speculation - orchestrated by the high-powered Gibbons camp - until 4:20 p.m. Tuesday, when they issued a surprising statement saying they had not yet concluded that Gibbons and Mazzeo weren't on the parking-garage video. Police hadn't even finished viewing the tapes.

By that time, however, a District Court judge who was appointed to the bench after lobbying by Gibbons campaign adviser Sig Rogich had granted a hurried request by the Gibbons camp to release the still-unauthenticated tapes. Gibbons understandably was trying to stop his slide in the polls a week before the election.

In the process, however, the rights of the alleged victim, a 32-year-old single mother and cocktail waitress, were lost in the shuffle. Evidence in the criminal case was being turned over to the potential defendant before any decision had been made on the filing of charges.

Yet as odd as that was, it is just one of many strange twists in the nearly three-week saga of how tapes that purportedly didn't exist ended up existing, after all.

From the beginning:

Mazzeo was under the impression the tapes existed when she called 911 three times between 10:23 p.m. and 11:14 p.m. on Oct. 13 to report that Gibbons had accosted her inside a Hughes Center parking garage. The structure was across from

DOJ_NMG_0090947

McCormick & Schmick's restaurant, where she, Gibbons, Rogich and three other women had been drinking earlier in the evening.

"And all that stuff will be on tape if there is a camera there, which I'm assuming there is," she told a police dispatcher in her third 911 call.

Mazzeo told police that Gibbons grabbed her arms, threw her up against a wall in the parking garage and tried to coerce her into having sex. Gibbons said he merely was helping Mazzeo find her truck when she stumbled just before they entered the garage and he grabbed her arms to break her fall.

Officers who interviewed Mazzeo assured her that they would obtain videotapes of the incident. But when they contacted a Hughes Center security officer that night, identified in police reports only as "Aaron," they were told the cameras in the garage weren't recording.

The next day, after officers told Mazzeo there was no video after all, she decided to drop the case. She told them she didn't want to press charges against a powerful political figure such as Gibbons.

Police closed out the investigation without checking any further for recordings of the incident.

In the meantime, the media picked up on the story. The Gibbons camp hired attorney Don Campbell and private investigator David Groover to help the congressman with his defense, which included an Oct. 19 news conference in which Gibbons strongly denied the allegations.

Still missing were any videotapes that might possibly contain the truth. Despite repeated inquiries by the Sun for over a week, officials with Crescent Real Estate Equities, which owns and manages Hughes Center, refused to shed any light on the mystery.

Mazzeo hired attorney Richard Wright to represent her interests, and on Oct. 25 she held a news conference to stand by her story and level new allegations that the Gibbons camp had harassed and pressured her into dropping the charges. The Gibbons camp strongly denied those accusations, too.

But Mazzeo forged ahead. She said she would be willing to cooperate with police once more if the case was reopened.

Again, at this point, there were no tapes to support either side.

But not for long.

After hearing that Mazzeo was willing to press charges again, police decided to "tie up some loose ends" from the previous short-lived probe, Deputy Chief Greg McCurdy said Wednesday.

Although there was no formal investigation (Metro officially still was waiting for Mazzeo to come forward), McCurdy said, detectives paid a visit to Hughes Center security offices in an attempt to find a last name for Aaron, the security officer who told police the night of the Oct. 13 incident that there were no recordings. They anticipated that they would have to interview him again once the probe started up again, McCurdy said.

During that visit, detectives learned much more than Aaron's last name. Robert Clavier, director of security for Hughes Center, showed up to say that videotapes indeed existed from Oct. 13.

"He said, 'We had the tapes and didn't know what to do because it was a closed case,' " McCurdy explained. "He said he had (them) locked up in his possession."

Detectives, McCurdy said, took possession of the tapes and took a voluntary statement from Hughes Center officials.

Sources said Hughes Center security officials viewed relevant portions of the tapes before turning them over to Metro and did not see Gibbons and Mazzeo on the recordings.

For a while, the tapes remained a secret at Metro. Indeed, at a press conference last Thursday, the day after police acquired the tapes, Sheriff Bill Young was asked several questions about possible tapes. Young did not disclose their existence.

The recordings stayed secret until Saturday, when Campbell said he learned about them from Kirk Lenhard, a lawyer then representing Crescent. It is unlikely that their conversation occurred by chance, for there are numerous connections between the Gibbons camp and the company that now says it had the tapes all along.

Lenhard is with the politically connected Jones Vargas firm, which has Republican National committeeman Joe Brown as one of its leading partners. Brown was with Gibbons at his Oct. 19 news conference denouncing Mazzeo's allegations.

Brown's firm held a fundraiser for Gibbons the day before the Oct. 13 incident, according to the candidate's latest campaign report. And on Oct. 17, Brown and Lenhard each gave $1,000 to Gibbons' campaign, the report shows.

In court papers filed this week, Campbell said Lenhard told him the tapes had been turned over to Metro Police.

Soon, another of Campbell's clients, the Las Vegas Review-Journal, was onto a story about the newly discovered tapes - and coverage by that newspaper and other media contained Campbell's spin: The tapes absolve Gibbons of wrongdoing.

Nobody from Metro was willing to confirm that statement on record, but Gibbons and his team spent the next several days saying the candidate had been vindicated. That position stood until Metro issued its surprise disclaimer on Tuesday. They hadn't finished reviewing the tapes.

On Wednesday, police finished copying the videos and issued a news release saying they were providing copies to Campbell, Wright and the district attorney's office.

McCurdy said police now believe that Aaron, the Hughes Center security officer, did not knowingly mislead officers into believing there were no tapes on the night of the incident.

"He may have been given wrong information," McCurdy said.

McCurdy would not say what police have done in the last week to try to authenticate the tapes.

But he added: "At this time, I have no information that leads me to believe that there has been any alterations made to the tapes."

Security experts have told the Sun and Las Vegas television news organizations that the tapes are likely to be inconclusive.

If the tapes are to prove Gibbons' claims that he never entered the parking garage, thus destroying Mazzeo's account, authorities must find a way to verify the tapes as authentic and to demonstrate that the cameras unquestionably would have captured Mazzeo or Gibbons had they entered the garage.

That is a tall order, especially in the view of security experts who say the biggest hurdle to verifying the tapes is the 11 days between the night police said they were obtaining the tapes and the day Crescent handed them over to police.

In between, the tapes reportedly were locked up in the Crescent offices. The problem with that 11-day gap, security experts said, is that police cannot guarantee a "chain of custody," and that surveillance tapes can be fabricated fairly easily.

Campbell scheduled a news conference for 10 a.m. today to discuss the release of the tapes. Jeff German is the Sun's senior investigative reporter. He can be reached at 259-4067 or at german@lasvegassun.com. Sam Skolnik can be reached at 474-

Gibbons Asks Ethics Panel's Opinion On Cruise Gift By A WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Nevada gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Gibbons asked the House Ethics Committee for an opinion on whether he failed to report a Caribbean cruise that was paid for by a military contractor who is also a major donor to the congressman's campaign.

Mr. Gibbons sought the panel's advice after a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal raised questions about his close ties to Warren Trepp, said Mr. Gibbons's campaign manager, Robert Uithoven.

The Journal reported Wednesday that the Nevada Republican opened doors in Washington for Mr. Trepp's eTreppid Technologies LLC, a software maker that won millions of dollars in classified contracts from the Air Force, Special Operations Command and the Central Intelligence Agency. It reported that Mr. Gibbons, who served on the Intelligence and Armed Services committees, helped the Reno, Nev., company secure federal contracts and in some cases helped direct federal money to the contracts.

Mr. Trepp and companies linked to him contributed nearly $100,000 to Mr. Gibbons's campaign for governor, and Mr. Trepp hosted the congressman, his wife and others on a week-long Caribbean cruise in March 2005, flying the group home on a private jet.

A former eTreppid executive who is suing Mr. Trepp in federal court in Reno alleges that Mr. Gibbons also got unreported gifts of cash and casino chips from Mr. Trepp.

Messrs. Gibbons and Trepp deny unreported payments and said there was nothing improper about the Caribbean trip, Mr. Trepp's campaign contributions or Mr. Gibbons's efforts to arrange meetings in Washington for eTreppid. Mr. Gibbons insisted that eTreppid won business on its merits and that he had nothing to do with any classified contracts.

Also yesterday, U.S. District Judge Brian Sandoval, who has been hearing the case brought by the former eTreppid executive, recused himself from the case. The judge, a former Nevada attorney general, was appointed to the bench by President Bush last year.

Police Union Demands Mayor's Records (BSUN)

By Doug Donovan

The Baltimore Sun, November 3, 2006

The state police union demanded Thursday that Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley release his application to practice law to determine whether he properly disclosed a nearly 20-year-old drunken driving charge.

Maryland Fraternal Order of Police President John "Rodney" Bartlett Jr. said in a statement that O'Malley's refusal to release the document raises questions about the mayor's ethics and moral character.

"Mr. O'Malley refuses to release a copy of his bar application, leading to the inevitable conclusion that he failed to complete it honestly and properly," the statement said. "Although his arrest and acquittal 20 years ago on a driving under the influence charge may be irrelevant to his ability to serve as Governor, his ability to tell the truth completely and without qualification is extremely relevant."

The move by the Maryland Fraternal Order of Police was seen privately by the mayor's campaign as a political move by a union that supports O'Malley's Republican rival, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. Publicly, however, campaign aides declined to discuss the matter.

"We said all we're going to say about this a week ago when it first came out," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney.

In 1987, O'Malley was charged with driving or attempting to drive a vehicle while under the influence of alcohol. A law student at the time, O'Malley was acquitted of the charge.

Since news of the incident arose last week, the mayor has refused to release his application to become a lawyer, a form that requires the disclosure of all criminal proceedings [em dash] including traffic citations. O'Malley has said that he does not remember if he disclosed the charge.

Ehrlich's chief of staff, James C. "Chip" DiPaula Jr., and a spokesman, Henry Fawell, were copied on the e-mail release of the union's statement.

Ehrlich released his bar application last week, and it showed that he answered "no" to the questions about whether he had been a party to any criminal proceeding or whether there had been any "unfavorable incidents" in his life that would bear on his character or fitness to practice law.

Ehrlich has said O'Malley's charge should not play out in the election.

The governor has previously been quoted as saying he had his own brush with the law as a young man when he and a friend scalped tickets to Princeton University sporting events to make extra money during college. Ehrlich has said the matter was handled by Princeton University officials, not the police, as he said in an interview four years ago. So the matter did not warrant reporting on his application to the Maryland bar.

Parties Start Frantic Final Push For Voters (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 3, 2006

As dozens of critical races remain too close to call four days before Election Day, Democrats and Republicans are ramping up drives to get voters to the polls Tuesday.

The mix includes a flock of political celebrities, tens of thousands of volunteers and millions of dollars, door-knocks and phone calls, all underlaid by new techniques to pinpoint likely supporters in unlikely neighborhoods.

Republicans had a juggernaut turnout operation in 2004 and both sides say it has gotten better. There are indications, however, that the get-out-the-vote playing field is more level now. Among them:

·Both parties say they will spend more than $30 million.

·Democrats are catching up, albeit in piecemeal fashion, to the sophisticated “microtargeting” techniques that have enabled Republicans to find and motivate potential supporters across the country.

·Ballot initiatives are spurring turnout drives on both sides. Conservatives are mobilizing voters against gay marriage and research using embryonic stem cells; liberals are mobilizing them to support the research and a minimum-wage increase.

·The Republican National Committee runs a centralized get-out-the-vote operation. Democrats are typically splintered but more efficient than usual, because 32 liberal interest groups are sharing information and coordinating their turnout drives in a coalition called America Votes.

There are more than 50 House and Senate races both parties view as competitive this year. Democrats say their turnout effort is equal to the Republican Party's in most of them. “I think they did have a better operation in 2004,” New York Sen. Charles Schumer, head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, says of Republicans. “We learned that lesson.”

Democrats, relying heavily on union muscle, used to have the edge in getting out the vote. “We've been very fortunate we've been able to match them and in some instances outdo them,” says Michael DuHaime, political director of the Republican National Committee.

VIPs rallying voters this weekend include former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani and actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease and is helping Democrats who support federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The usual powerhouses, among them the AFL-CIO and the National Rifle Association, will be out in force. Some of the most intense activity: e-mails flying across the Internet, a technique especially popular with business groups partial to Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0090950

The most coveted voters in congressional elections are people who typically vote only in presidential years. They are followed closely by swing voters who aren't loyal to one party or the other. Over the past six years, Republicans have become expert at finding them and anyone else with potential GOP leanings, even in states where voters don't register by party.

In a process called microtargeting, they collect as much information as possible about voters from public records, Census data and marketing research firms. That's used to create profiles including everything from voting history, job and marital status to where people live, what they drive, what they read and whether they fish.

The end product is a score indicating someone's likelihood of voting, of supporting one party or the other and of being interested in certain issues. Advocates then use that information to determine whom to contact and what kind of pitch to use.

"We no longer look at the world geographically," DuHaime says. "We believe there are voters everywhere that should be our voters." Before, he says, the party would skip a city or precinct where only 10% voted Republican — but now it will try to raise that 10% to 14%. "There's no area anywhere we ever write off."

Democrats are scurrying to make up for lost time. While they continue to press turnout in heavily Democratic cities and inner suburbs, they are using microtargeting to find voters in areas where only three or four in 10 people vote Democratic.

The application is spottier than the GOP's national reach and the voter descriptions less detailed. Even so, in the places Democrats most need it, some form of the technique is in use by someone.

America Votes is microtargeting in six states — Ohio, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Michigan, Colorado and Wisconsin — for its 32 member organizations. Emily's List, which helps female Democratic candidates, is microtargeting women in Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri and Washington, and in 18 House districts. Some unions are microtargeting their members to decide which doors to knock on. The two Democratic congressional campaign committees are microtargeting in most of their hot races. The Democratic National Committee is running pilot programs in six states.

"They are very hierarchical and we're not, and that's just the way it is. It's never going to change," Karin Johanson, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says of Republicans. "They're good. We're good, too."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The world's a stage

No plans for election eve?

Let's all join Al and Tipper Gore on Monday evening at the Kennedy Center Concert Hall "for an intimate conversation on the state of our environment, our global situation, our families and how we can all work together to make our future world a better place for everyone."

Show time is 8 p.m. (tickets range from $60 to $100) for what will be a 90-minute chat titled: "Blueprint for Personal Action with Al and Tipper Gore."

72-hour campaign

Nobody laid the groundwork more for a successful midterm Election Day than Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. Placing the Democrats in the majority of Congress this month has been his No. 1 priority, and beyond that winning the White House in 2008.

So there's good reason for Mr. Dean to be concerned these final days of campaigning, given sensational predictions from pundits and pollsters alike of an easy Democratic sweep on Tuesday.

Mr. Dean had this warning yesterday, which he sent to Inside the Beltway via e-mail: "We must stay focused and ignore the polls or pundits who tell us we have the election locked up," he said. "This election is less than a week away, but there's plenty of time left for a Republican comeback.

"Most worrisome," he said: "the Republican Party's 'infamous 72-hour' operation," which he said will be "cranking up" starting this weekend to get out the Republican vote.

Tuesday fades

Everybody is waiting for Election Day, but the truth is that nearly a quarter of American voters will have cast ballots before Tuesday, either by absentee means or by visiting an early voting place.

"America is undergoing a revolution in voting. 'Election Day' is quickly becoming a thing of the past as we move towards a system of many mini-election days leading up to the main event," notes John C. Fortier in his new book, "Absentee and Early Voting: Trends, Promises, and Perils."

A research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, Mr. Fortier calls the rise in early voting "meteoric." He writes that absentee voting originated during the Civil War for soldiers away from home, but today more and more states, including California, are promoting its use.

DOJ_NMG_0090951

The book states that just 25 years ago, about 5 percent of Americans voted before Election Day. That number grew to 15 percent by 2004.

Pint of Adams

We had to laugh at part of a letter sent by "The Spirit of George Washington," professional impersonator James Renwick Manship Sr., to a fellow Virginian christened with a pair of historical names.

"Dear Mason Adams," Mr. Manship writes. "As I said when I met you a week ago at the church pastored by George Mark Washington, you have a great name of two great patriots.

"I was thinking of 'my' promoter for commander in chief, and 'my' Vice President John Adams. But you mentioned Sam Adams, who due to the lager brewed in his name, is likely better known, and more sought for 'counsel' than John in these current times."

Sipping moxie

Calvin Coolidge's "civility and high ethical stature were a strong tonic" in his day, and today's leaders should "study his history and take a sip from his favorite drink, moxie."

So Cyndy Bittinger, executive director of the Calvin Coolidge Memorial Foundation in Plymouth, Vt., tells Inside the Beltway, after we had written about columnist Cal Thomas' efforts (he's related to Coolidge) to build the nation's 30th president a presidential library.

"Yes, up here in Vermont we think highly of Calvin Coolidge, a man from a farming community who made a difference in people's lives," Ms. Bittinger writes, adding that after World War I he "restored the nation to normalcy and peace."

She also cites Coolidge's "warm relationship" with the press. He met with reporters twice every week and, therefore, had no need for a press secretary.

Quote of the week

"Why are 30,000 U.S. troops tied down on that peninsula half a century after the Chinese left North Korea and 15 years after the Soviet Union expired? If the 60 million Koreans, North and South, were raptured up to heaven, how would America be imperiled?"

— Patrick J. Buchanan, arguing this week against both conservatives and liberals who are calling for an expansion of the U.S. military to respond to hot spots around the world. Instead, the commentator says obsolete alliances should be dissolved where there are no vital American interests.

Campaigns Set For TV Finale (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The Republican and Democratic parties dumped tens of millions of dollars this week on dozens of congressional races, locking up broadcast time yesterday for a blizzard of new advertising that will saturate the airwaves over the final weekend of the midterm campaign season.

Candidates rushed out more than 600 new television ads ahead of network deadlines for the weekend, with many Republicans trying to shift attention from Iraq and President Bush to local issues such as the environment, taxes and immigration. This final thrust will boost spending on political and issue advertising past $2 billion in this campaign, or $400 million more than in the 2004 presidential campaign, according to Evan Tracey of the Campaign Media Analysis Group.

"Politics is probably the only business in the world where they spend the most money when they have the least number of available customers to pitch to," Tracey said.

Meanwhile, in Billings, Mont., President Bush kicked off a final six-day campaign swing through heavily Republican states in hopes of rallying disaffected supporters in time to save the endangered GOP majorities in Congress.

Bush opened his tour in this conservative state in a bid to rescue Sen. Conrad Burns, who has battled back from a big deficit against Democratic challenger Jon Tester, and then headed to Nevada, where the president appeared beside a House Republican candidate fighting to hold on to a once-safe seat.

Bush's itinerary and message underscored the depth of the Republican troubles this year -- particularly the president's low approval rating and the strong opposition to the Iraq war -- and the last-minute White House strategy for countering them. The 10 states the president plans to visit before Tuesday's elections all voted for Bush in 2004; he is staying away from battleground states such as Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Virginia, where many Republican candidates would rather not campaign with him at this late hour.

In the final ad rush, it has grown difficult to tell which candidates are Republicans and which are Democrats. Burns posted a new ad touting the record of Montana's Democratic senator, Max Baucus, and saying he has stood with Baucus while his opponent, Tester, would oppose him. Rep. Sue W. Kelly, one of several Upstate New York Republicans in trouble, boasts in her new ads of her record on clean air and water -- and her opposition to Bush's energy plan.

DOJ_NMG_0090952

"I'm not always the most popular person with party leaders in Congress," she says.

Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.), one of three highly endangered Hoosier Republicans, treats his Democratic opponent, former congressman Baron Hill, as the incumbent, striking a popular Democratic theme when he charges that Hill voted for policies that send Indiana jobs to China.

Some Democrats are taking a similar tack. Idaho Democrat Larry Grant accuses his Republican opponent, state Rep. William T. Sali, of raising taxes, while Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) features fresh-faced Dakotans beaming, "Mostly we want to thank Stephanie Herseth for voting to strengthen national security."

But the candidates in the most jeopardy have come out swinging. Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who continues to trail his opponent badly in the polls, released an ad featuring a young Iraq war veteran who accuses Pennsylvania state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr. (D) of investing billions of the state's dollars in companies that support terrorists.

Democrat Francine Busby, in her third try for the San Diego area seat once held by imprisoned former GOP congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, lumped her opponent, Rep. Brian Bilbray (R), with Cunningham, convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, indicted former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and disgraced former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"We don't need another congressman in jail," the ad warns.

Campaign strategists rushed to book a final wave of TV ads before the weekend. A look at financial reports filed yesterday with the Federal Election Commission showed that, on Wednesday alone, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent $12.4 million on advertising in 36 districts; the National Republican Congressional Committee spent $5.9 million on commercials in 17 districts.

The expenditures by the two committees are reflective of their overall strategies. Republicans are largely focusing their resources on the campaigns of incumbents facing surprisingly tough reelection races, in hopes of building a wall against a massive wave that could see Democrats pick up 25 or more House seats.

The Democrats must pick up at least 15 seats to win control of the House and six to win control of the Senate.

On Wednesday, the NRCC spent more than $2 million on ads for three endangered Republicans in the Philadelphia media market. The committee spent nearly $750,000 on behalf of Rep. David G. Reichert in Washington's 8th District and an additional $445,000 in Sodrel's Indiana district.

The DCCC, by contrast, is spending the bulk of its money on offensive opportunities. Its largest expenditure -- $1.3 million -- was made on behalf of Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, who is running against state Sen. Peter J. Roskam (R) for Illinois' open 6th Congressional District seat. The district is covered by the Chicago media market -- one of the most expensive in the country.

The Democratic committee plunked down $718,000 on behalf of former congressman Ken Lucas, who is trying to unseat Rep. Geoff Davis (R) in northern Kentucky's 4th District, and $673,000 in Arizona's 5th District, where Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) is trying to fend off a tougher-than-expected challenge from former Tempe mayor Harry Mitchell (D). Mitchell recently won the endorsement of the Arizona Republic newspaper, which had endorsed Hayworth in each of his past six runs for Congress but this time referred to him as a "bully."

Republican Party committees appear to have depleted much of their cash advantage, making it likely they will face tough decisions in the campaign's final days, according to the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan research group.

Between Oct. 19 and Nov. 1, national Republican committees reported spending $50 million to support House and Senate candidates, compared with $38 million spent by Democratic Party committees over the same 14 days.

Usually, the number of competitive districts goes down during a campaign's final weeks. This year, the number of competitive House seats went up. "As a result," the institute said, "the parties either have to give up on some races to concentrate their resources, or spread their resources more thinly than they had planned. This is a problem for both parties, but particularly for the Republicans, who are playing defense to save embattled incumbents."

With resources thinning, control of the Senate continues to teeter on the outcome of races in three states: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

Missouri continues to be the truest of tossups, with internal tracking polls for both parties showing the race between Sen. James M. Talent (R) and state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) within a percentage point or two. Democrats are feeling increasingly optimistic about Virginia as they believe former Navy secretary James Webb (D) is overtaking Sen. George Allen (R).

The biggest disagreement between the two sides comes in Tennessee, where Republicans spent the day touting a poll by Zogby International that showed former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker (R) opening a substantial lead over Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D), 53 percent to 43 percent. Later, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee released a poll of its own that showed Ford in the lead, 46 percent to 40 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0090953

Nasty Ads Close Out A Mud-caked Campaign (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — It's a dangerous world.

To be a political candidate, that is.

Oklahoma Gov. Brad Henry is a lot like Adolf Hitler, an ad on the Internet warns. North Carolina Rep. Brad Miller wants to make America "one big fiesta for illegal aliens and homosexuals," a radio spot featuring cheerful mariachi music claims. Indiana Rep. Chris Chocola opposes medical care for wounded vets, a TV ad suggests.

And Pennsylvania Senate candidate Bob Casey? Electing him apparently would risk nuclear annihilation.

A record $2 billion is being spent on candidate and independent "issue" TV ads during this campaign, estimates Evan Tracey of TNSMI/Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm that tracks political ads. In the past 60 days, he says, an unprecedented 90% of the ads have been negative.

Some attack ads accurately criticize candidates for votes they've cast and positions they've taken, an analysis by the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check found, but many of the ads amount to what the report called "political mudslinging." Spots by both parties distort the truth or leave a misimpression in an effort to make a candidate seem unacceptable and his election foolhardy, even dangerous.

Political forces have combined this year in "a perfect recipe for attack advertising," says John Geer, a Vanderbilt University political scientist and author of In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns. "The parties are continuing to polarize, and the stakes are high because who controls Congress is in play."

What's more, neither side has much of a positive agenda to spotlight, he says, particularly on the issue foremost on many voters' minds: the war in Iraq.

Voters routinely decry negative ads and insist they ignore them.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month, seven in 10 said they believed "not much" or "nothing at all" of what they heard in political advertisements. By more than 2-to-1, they said most of the television advertisements they have seen this year have been negative.

Twenty-eight percent said most ads have been "very" or "extremely" negative, compared with just 4% who said most have been "very" or "extremely" positive.

The survey of 1,007 adults Oct. 6-8 had a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

The "toxicity" of the political environment may discourage some people from bothering to go to the polls, says Page Gardner of Women's Voices, Women Vote, a group that encourages political participation by single women.

Nevertheless, campaigns deploy negative ads because they work.

A Notre Dame study of advertising in the 2004 presidential campaign concluded that negative ads were much more likely than positive ones to weaken support for a candidate. Five percent of voters said their support for their favored candidate was weakened after viewing a positive ad for the opposition, while 14% said their support was weakened after seeing a negative ad targeting their side.

"They hated the negative ads, they saw positive ads as being more persuasive and influential, and yet that was not the effect," says Joan Phillips, a marketing professor who helped lead the study.

The non-partisan Fact Check analysis, released last Friday, concluded that the National Republican Congressional Committee had spent $41.9 million attacking Democratic opponents and $5 million supporting its own candidates. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent $18 million attacking Republican opponents and $3.1 million supporting its own candidates.

The proportion of negative ads was much higher than in 2004, when Federal Election Commission records show that the political parties spent about $6 on ads in favor of congressional candidates for every $5 spent opposing candidates.

Some negative ads, including tough ones, tap humor. Over the past few days, Republican gubernatorial candidates in Minnesota, Texas and Wisconsin began airing 60-second radio ads that mimic Anheuser-Busch's sarcastic "Real Men of Genius" spots for Bud Light.

In Texas, as a singer croons in the background, a mock-serious announcer "salutes" Democrat Chris Bell as "Mr. Way-Too-Liberal-For-Texas Guy."

In Wisconsin, a similar ad dubs Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle "Mr. Tax-Hiking-Politician Man."

The tone isn't likely to lift as the campaign heads into its final weekend, Tracey says, especially in competitive contests. He likens political advertising to a jury trial: "Opening arguments" in which a candidate introduces himself or herself — and, often, the spouse, kids and dog — followed by a period of attack and counterattack. Then there are "closing arguments."

DOJ_NMG_0090954

A candidate who's safely ahead may turn to “a warm-and-fuzzy” appeal at the end, Tracey says. “But if you're losing, that's when you start to throw your haymaker.”

Recent Gains In Shaky Races Have Heartened GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Washington — President Bush was hosting lawmakers in the Oval Office last week when he asked House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, to size up GOP prospects in the midterm elections.

When Boehner acknowledged that he had already written off some Republican House seats, naming one in the South, Bush protested loudly and called in his chief political adviser. Karl Rove entered on cue with an armful of charts to prove the seat was still in play and the party could hold onto its House majority.

"Thanks for the information," Boehner responded.

The exchange illustrates the dual mood of Republicans in the final week before Election Day: While there is pervasive fear that the party will lose control of Congress, a cadre of die-hard optimists is refusing to wave the white flag.

They point, like parched travelers spying water in the desert, to a few recent developments that could help the GOP in the waning days of the campaign. They delight in this week's gaffe by Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., who made a joke that seemed to insult U.S. troops in Iraq. The GOP Senate candidate in Maryland is running a surprisingly strong campaign. Some of the party's most-endangered incumbents, such as Rep. Thomas Reynolds in New York and Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, are battling back in the polls. Some analysts are no longer writing off GOP chances of holding onto seats in Texas and Florida that were vacated when scandal-scarred Republicans Tom DeLay and Mark Foley quit the House.

Senior party officials, including Rove and Bush, insist that Republican fundraising and voter-mobilization advantages -- or some 11th-hour surprise -- will preserve their Senate majority and keep GOP losses below the 15 seats that would give Democrats control of the House.

"The Republicans are going to make a great goal-line stand," GOP pollster Whit Ayres said.

Many strategists in both parties dismiss such talk as a Pollyana-ish ploy to keep GOP voters from staying home on Election Day. That Republicans are fighting so hard in some of the country's most conservative regions is a measure of how tough a road they face. For every seat that comes within reach, strategists are identifying once-safe incumbents who suddenly are in trouble.

Amy Walter, an analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, says Republicans are like boatmen bailing water in a storm.

"You have a bucket, and your ship is filling up," Walter said. "But for every bucket you bail, another wave is coming in."

Even former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. -- who in a recent memo claims momentum has shifted to the GOP and predicts the party will keep control of the Senate -- gives Republicans a 50-50 chance of keeping a House majority.

In the Senate, Republicans have a clear, if uncertain, path to victory: To keep Democrats from winning the six seats they need to gain the majority, the GOP is pouring resources into three key races that are too close to call. Those are in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia.

Elsewhere, Republicans are cheered by recent signs that their standing has improved in races that had been considered lost causes. In Montana, polls show Burns closing in on his Democratic opponent. The national GOP this week announced a new round of television ads for Burns, and Bush campaigned for him Thursday.

In Maryland, a Democratic-dominated state, some polls show that Republican Michael Steele has narrowed the gap in the Senate race. The Cook Political Report now calls it a tossup.

In the more difficult battle for the House, a senior GOP strategist says there is still a road to victory -- even if it runs steeply uphill and ends in a wafer-thin majority.

This strategist conceded that at least seven GOP-held seats were lost causes: open seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa and Ohio; and seats held by two incumbents in Indiana (Reps. Chris Chocola and John Hostettler) and one in Pennsylvania (Curt Weldon). But the strategist claimed the party could hold the line elsewhere, identifying 24 GOP seats and four Democratic-held seats for which polls indicate the races are too close to call.

"No one can predict how those seats go," said the strategist, who requested anonymity. "This is where race-by-race dynamics kick in."

Even accepting those assumptions -- which many other Republicans regard as too optimistic -- the GOP would have to win three-quarters of those close races to retain its House majority. That might have been plausible in years when incumbents had an edge. But this year, with anti-Republican winds blowing at gale force, that may be a longshot.

DOJ_NMG_0090955

Republicans are betting that the advantages traditionally enjoyed by GOP incumbents -- their fundraising edge, their record of bringing home federal money for local projects and the party's vaunted get-out-the-vote machinery -- remain formidable and will tilt close races their way.

Indeed, Reynolds' money advantage may have helped him bounce back from a steep drop in polls after the Foley sex scandal.

The lawmaker, from upstate New York, immediately bought television time for an ad in which he apologized for not responding more aggressively to early warnings that Foley had sent salacious e-mails to male congressional pages. Reynolds also was helped by a huge blizzard in his district that eclipsed the Foley scandal and gave him a chance to showcase his political clout by securing federal disaster aid for the community.

In many places, however, incumbency is as much a liability as it is an asset.

In the battle for open seats, the GOP endgame includes a determined effort to hold onto the Foley and DeLay districts. Many strategists regarded those seats as slam-dunks for Democrats, because the GOP was unable to Foley's and DeLay's names on ballots. But both districts are heavily Republican, and party officials are laboring to educate voters on how to cast ballots for the GOP's chosen replacement candidates.

In Texas, Republicans are running a write-in campaign for Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. The party is sending people door to door to explain how to cast a write-in ballot. The Cook Political Report, which long rated the race as likely to go Democratic, now calls it a tossup.

In Florida, Foley's name will be on the ballot, but any vote cast for him will count as a vote for GOP candidate Joe Negron. The GOP won a court ruling last week that allowed signs making that point to be posted in polling places.

On another front, Republicans hope to cut their losses by defeating at least one of the handful of House Democrats considered vulnerable. In Illinois, where Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean serves a GOP-dominated district, Republicans hope a third-party candidate will siphon away enough votes to give the GOP candidate an edge. In Georgia, Republicans are targeting two House Democrats whose hold on their seats has been weakened by redistricting.

Faded Contract Republican Rebels Of '94 Now Face Their Own Revolt Promises To Balance Budget And Shrink Government Lost Steam In Congress Assailing 'Influences Of Power' (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

FOUNTAIN HILLS, Ariz. -- Twelve years ago, J.D. Hayworth and 72 other Republicans rode into the U.S. House of Representatives on a wave that washed out Democrats after four decades in control, ushering in a "Republican Revolution" to cleanse Washington.

Now Mr. Hayworth is at risk of being swept out in much the same way. After six years in which Republicans controlled the White House as well as Capitol Hill, voters' revulsion with failed promises, dysfunction and scandals threatens big losses for the party on Tuesday.

So Mr. Hayworth, once among the most recognizable revolutionaries in Congress's big, brash and combatively conservative "Class of '94," now stands as something of a symbol even for Republicans asking: What went wrong?

A member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Hayworth has been on the defensive about both campaign contributions and his initially unreported use of sports skyboxes from disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his Indian tribal clients. To blunt such bad news, Mr. Hayworth boasts of the government funds that he has brought home, from a pedestrian bridge in Tempe to defense contracts for Arizona firms. Such claims win over some locals, but offend many fiscal conservatives.

The widespread sense that Republicans in Congress have lost their way, drifting into the same abuses they had pledged to end, helps explain why many, like Mr. Hayworth, are in trouble. The Republicans' 1994 "Contract with America" vowed to shrink government, balance the budget and limit members' terms. The Republicans said they would end Congress's "cycle of scandal and disgrace."

That contract is now broken, conservatives say, as the former rebels have morphed into an establishment clinging to power.

The national debt now nears $9 trillion. Rather than curb entitlement programs' growth, Republicans created a new one -- Medicare's prescription-drug benefit -- and rejected President Bush's call to overhaul Social Security. Their original vow to kick the pork barrel has given way to gorging on "earmarks" -- funds lawmakers specifically set aside for special projects -- in the annual appropriations bills. There have been a number of corruption probes.

DOJ_NMG_0090956

"You saw the idealism, and then you saw people lose a little focus, and you saw the corrupt influences of power affect Republicans," says Rep. John Shadegg, a congressman from Phoenix and member of the Republican class of 1994.

ELECTION 2006

Predict how the House and Senate votes will go in our Washington Wire reader contest1. Plus, take a closer look at issues and candidates2 in about 20 House races, review polls3 in close House contests and see complete coverage4.

Among those who lament that the movement has gone astray is Newt Gingrich, the general behind the 1994 revolution, who became House speaker but was forced out four years later. "This is a center-right country with a willingness to tolerate a little bit of incompetence. But it's certainly getting more than it needs," said Mr. Gingrich, in an interview this summer. "The Republican Party drifted away from reform and changed back to a standard political party."

He and other Republicans cite achievements as well. They credit a series of tax cuts that climaxed under President Bush for recent economic growth as well as the mildness of past downturns. With President Clinton, Republicans rewrote welfare policy. They toughened criminal-sentencing laws and minimized workplace and environmental regulations. They would have done more, some say, but for the resistance of less conservative Senate Republicans and the obstruction of Democrats.

As he campaigns, Mr. Hayworth says, "What I'm hearing is we have to work harder, but that the spirit of '94 in many ways has been realized ... in terms of pro-growth economic policies, in terms of rebuilding our national defense."

Some Republican lawmakers, including more recent arrivals, still try to hew to the revolution's principles. Among them are three of Mr. Hayworth's fellow Arizona Republicans -- Reps. Shadegg and Jeff Flake, elected in 2000, as well as Sen. John McCain. They have led a mostly losing fight against the explosion in earmarks.

For many congressional Republicans, the shift from reform to self-preservation was most evident at the start of the current Congress last year. Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, anticipating his indictment on corruption charges, pushed a change in House rules so he could remain as leader. After a public furor, Republicans reversed it. Mr. DeLay resigned last June.

Of the Republicans who entered the House after 1994, just under half remain. Several have moved on to be governors or senators. Ohio's Rep. Bob Ney faces prison after pleading guilty in the influence-peddling Abramoff scandal. Florida's Rep. Mark Foley resigned after disclosures of lewd computer messages he had sent teenage House pages.

While term limits were a big issue in 1994, only a few of the members elected that year voluntarily left after three terms -- the length most espoused. Those who remain now seek their seventh term. As Election Day nears, a number are in trouble with a mutinous electorate. This week, independent analyst Charlie Cook moved Mr. Hayworth's race to the "toss-up" category, from "leaning Republican."

At 6-foot-5-inches and 220 pounds, Mr. Hayworth, a former college football player, is in fighting trim, down from 340 pounds in 1996, when he first struggled for re-election. He predicts both he and the Republicans' majorities will survive next week's election, and afterward, the party "can reassert the principles that brought us to power."

He retains the partisan bombast that made him stand out a dozen years ago. Yet just as voters nationally have tired of Washington's un-civil wars, his personality is an issue here. For the first time in his seven races, the state's largest newspaper, the Arizona Republic, didn't endorse Mr. Hayworth. It recently recommended his 66-year-old Democratic rival, Harry Mitchell, a longtime local officeholder, in an editorial headlined "Mitchell over the bully."

After Mr. Hayworth gave a recent speech to a Kiwanis Club here in Fountain Hills, an affluent suburb of Phoenix, the reaction was mixed. As about 50 Kiwanians departed after lunch, Bill Eckhardt, a 75-year-old Republican, said he'll vote for Mr. Hayworth given his prize seat on the Ways and Means panel. But the club vice president, Republican Bill Schmitt, 67, says he won't.

"I can't stand to be in the same room with him," Mr. Schmitt says. He's fed up with the war, and with Mr. Hayworth, who he says personifies "the slam and bash and tear and disgrace" partisanship of his party. Mr. Schmitt estimates about 20 club members, half of them Republicans, stayed away when they heard the congressman would be speaking.

Afterward, Mr. Schmitt buttonholed Mr. Hayworth. "I said, 'You know, you guys ought to get together as a group and figure out how you're going to clean up your act.'"

In the past year, four Republican House members have been forced from office by scandal. Besides Reps. DeLay, Ney and Foley, Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California is now in prison after pleading guilty to bribery and other charges for essentially selling defense earmarks. Ongoing investigations are looking at several others.

The spending earmarks at the center of some of those investigations reflect the drift since Republicans ascended.

In 1992, still in the minority, then-Rep. Gingrich taunted Democrats, "I am committed to hunting down every appropriation ... that is some politician taking care of himself." But in 1995, the new Republican-led Congress approved a record 1,430 projects worth $10 billion in the year's appropriations bills, according to the conservative group Citizens Against Government Waste. The totals escalated annually -- to 9,963 projects valued at $29 billion for fiscal 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0090957

Scott Lilly, a former House Democratic staffer and now senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank, has documented a proliferation of earmarks in highway bills. For 30 years after a transportation trust fund was created in 1956, highway bills, which are passed every few years specified 14 projects at most; spending decisions were left to the states. Then, in 1987, Democrats salted that year's package with 155 earmarks. The next, in 1991, had 538. "I have never seen anything as outrageous," Ohio's Rep. John Boehner -- now the Republican majority leader -- said back then.

But the Republicans' first highway bill, in 1998, more than tripled the previous 1991 bill's total. Last year's highway bill had 6,371 special projects worth $23 billion.

Earmarks have gone from perks for the powerful to goodies spread all around -- as incumbent protection, grease to get votes for hard-to-pass bills and, as Mr. Cunningham's conviction attests, payback for benefactors. Democrats get a smaller piece of the pie. A Republican database tracks tens of thousands of member requests for new projects. At orientations to Congress, Republican leaders instruct new members how to get projects, Mr. Flake says. "You're told you have to do that to be re-elected."

When House leaders last year strained to pass the Central American Free Trade Agreement, Mr. Flake recalls, "you actually had the Appropriations staffers on the floor of the House taking orders" for highway projects "to secure the last couple of votes." That trade agreement was approved after midnight by two votes.

Similarly, earmarks were currency to get votes for the Medicare prescription-drug bill in 2003. Republican leaders rejected compromise with Democrats, but were faced with conservatives' revolt over their measure. When it appeared to have lost the House tally, the leaders extended the traditional 15-minute limit for voting for nearly three hours, until 6 a.m., openly bargaining with members on the floor until several changed their votes. "One of the most breathtaking breaches of the legislative process in the modern history of the House," write congressional scholars Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein in their new book, "The Broken Branch."

That episode, many Republicans say now, captured how far they had moved from the heady "First 100 Days" of 1995. Then, their initial act was to change House rules to end abuses.

Looking back, a turning point was House Republicans' unpopular 1998 impeachment of Mr. Clinton. They lost seats in that year's midterm elections and Republicans forced Mr. Gingrich's departure. Power shifted from him and House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas, the revolution's philosophical architects, to Mr. DeLay and his former deputy Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who became Speaker. Both are seen as more pragmatic political gamesmen. Mr. DeLay, a former appropriator, expanded the use of earmarks as part of his plan for a permanent Republican majority.

After Mr. Bush's 2000 election, with all power in Republicans' hands, many conservatives had expected to realize their dreams. Instead, says Joe Scarborough, a '94 classmate who now hosts MSNBC's "Scarborough Country," that's when the revolution really ended: "Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.'"

Certainly conservatives who were elected with Mr. Bush have been disappointed, except on tax cuts. They cite the "No Child Left Behind" law, which expanded the federal role over education, the Medicare drug benefit, restored farm subsidies, and nondefense spending increases. Also, they lament, Republicans let Mr. Bush set the agenda, abandoned their own search for conservative ideas and acquiesced as he centralized power in the executive branch. "We're thinking, we've finally made it to Congress and the Revolution is over," Mr. Flake says.

He and other Republicans look to jumpstart the movement once the election is over -- and Congress comes back for a lame-duck session to finish appropriations bills and elect new leaders.

Mr. Hayworth, who unlike his Arizona colleagues has been a leadership loyalist, told the Kiwanis Club, "I was pleased to work with my colleague Jeff Flake on earmark reform so that spending does not come in the dead of night or in a conference room far from the scrutiny of people."

In an interview afterward, he took credit for leading the successful mutiny against last year's House rules change for Mr. DeLay. But Democrat Mitchell, among others, recall Mr. Hayworth's televised defenses of Mr. DeLay at the time. Mr. Mitchell has seized on that to underscore what he says is Mr. Hayworth's complicity in the worst of the Republican leadership's excesses. Amid supporters at the "Cookies From Home" store in Tempe, he said, "If you like the way things are in Washington, J.D. will give you more of the same."

Mr. Hayworth calls the punishing midterm campaigns "a wake-up call to return to those common-sense conservative principles."

"I don't think we've lost our philosophical moorings," he says. "But always in an imperfect world, there will be missteps."

Ranks Of Independent Voters Rising (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090958

The number of independent voters continues to rise, and that should give pause to Republicans trying to keep control of the House and Senate, an analysis of registration and turnout suggests.

About 17 percent of voters registered for next week's election eschew major-party identification, according to a study released Thursday by American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate.

That's up from about 14 percent in 2002, and the trend could help Democrats in their effort to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to achieve majorities, said the center's director, Curtis Gans.

"The people are turning against both political parties and the political process," Gans said. "My judgment is, the intensity factor of this unhappiness benefits the Democrats. ... Karl Rove may prove me wrong."

Gans said the numbers evoke statistical comparisons to 1962, 1982 and 1994, when voters turned against the incumbent parties out of "one form or another of unhappiness or fear."

According to the study, 31 percent of registered voters identify themselves as Republicans, and 37 percent say they are Democrats. The sampling is based on 13 of the 28 states that require partisan registration, plus the District of Columbia. The figures don't add up to 100 percent in part because voter rolls include many people who have died.

"If the political backdrop doesn't radically change between now and next Tuesday, it is also likely that the Democratic midterm vote will exceed the Republican vote for the first time since 1990," Gans wrote in the report.

Of the United States' 138.8 million eligible voters, an estimated 42 to 47 percent are expected to vote. The most recent high in a midterm election was 42 percent in 1982.

Turnout during 2002, the latest midterm election, was 40 percent.

Election '06 Wild Card: 'Indies' (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

.

FORT COLLINS, COLO.

Excluded from debates, left off the polls, ignored by the news media, or dismissed by the public as a "wasted vote," minor-party candidates could tip a few key races in next week's midterm elections - or win them outright.

From the Mountain States, where a virtual unknown is polling 10 percent and just snagged four newspaper endorsements for a US House race, to the coasts of New England, where two independents are poised to win bids to the US Senate, un-red and not-blue candidates are testing how deep the dissatisfaction with the two main parties is running.

"We're really not used to thinking about third parties in midterm elections, but there is a lot of push away from the major parties," says political scientist Ron Rapoport, coauthor of "Three's a Crowd: The Dynamic of Third Parties, Ross Perot, and Republican Resurgence."

This year, 425 minor-party candidates are running for a US House, Senate, or governor's seat, according to Project Vote Smart. About 80 percent of voters will be able to vote for a Libertarian for statewide office, 60 percent for a Green Party candidate, and 30 percent for a Constitution Party candidate, says Richard Winger, who tracks minor-party candidates and issues for Ballot Access News. Reform Party candidates are on statewide ballots in Florida and Colorado.

In 2002, 5.2 percent of all voters voted for some candidate other than a Republican or Democrat at the top of the ballot (usually governor or senator). That's the highest result for a midterm election since 1934. "This year will be up," Mr. Winger predicts. "More and more high-quality people are willing to run as minor-party candidates for public office."

Some are already big names. Running as an independent, Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut is expected to hold his Senate seat after losing the Democratic primary by staking out middle ground between the two main parties. Independent Rep. Bernard Sanders of Vermont is also expected to win his bid for the Senate - the first time since the mid-1970s that the Senate would have two independents concurrently.

"It's rare for there to be more than one independent in the US Senate," says Betty Koed, assistant historian of the Senate Historical Office. The last time the Senate had more than two independents was in the late 1890s, when five Populists, five Silver Republicans, and two members of the Silver Party served.

Independent candidates could tip the outcome in at least three close House races next week. In Indiana's Ninth District, Libertarian Eric Schansberg's candidacy is expected to help the Democrat, former Rep. Baron Hill, in his bid to oust GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel. And Independent John Binkowski could tip the race between Patty Wetterling and state Sen. Michele Bachmann in Minnesota's Sixth District. In an unexpectedly close race in Arizona's Fifth District, Libertarian Warren Severin could sway the race between Democratic challenger Harry Mitchell and embattled incumbent Rep. J.D. Hayworth.

DOJ_NMG_0090959

"There's a lot of dissatisfaction, obviously, among Libertarian voters among the Republicans, but not much enthusiasm for Democrats," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington. In races such as Arizona's Fifth, "it makes it hard to figure out who [the Libertarian candidate] is hurting."

Third-party candidates polling in single digits could also tip close US Senate races in Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, and Tennessee.

Running colorful gubernatorial campaigns in Texas, independents Kinky Friedman and Carole Keeton Strayhorn have held onto double-digit ratings throughout their campaign to challenge the front-runner, GOP Gov. Rick Perry.

For Colorado Reform Party candidate Eric Eidsness, a high point of his US House race came last month. He was the target of an attack ad, with incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R). "It showed I was beginning to count," he says.

A former Reagan administration official, he got into the race because he says he was tired of how Republicans used "the fear factor" to win elections. "People are smart. People know the truth when they hear it. If we agree on a problem, we can fix it," he says.

Victory is a long shot. But four local newspapers have endorsed his candidacy and Mr. Eidsness is polling about 10 percent of likely voters.

Newspapers: Election Advice Or Kingmaking? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, November 3, 2006

EUREKA, S.D. — Between now and Tuesday, all across the USA, you're in for a media barrage of late pre-election news and views. Especially from many newspapers that offer traditional "endorsements."

Before the 2004 elections, I strongly suggested in this column that newspapers should stop all endorsements and "debate, but not dictate." My slightly modified 2006 stance:

·On congressional, state or local office races, voters get such a heavy dose of news, views and propaganda from and about all candidates that they don't need any newspaper telling them for whom to vote.

·But on the ever-growing number of initiatives or referendums, many or most voters are uninformed and newspaper recommendations can be helpful.

That distinction or change of heart came on a visit here to my birthplace. South Dakota has 11 measures on the ballot. The only one most people understand is a referendum that would reverse an almost total abortion ban passed by the Legislature. That's getting heavy local and national media attention because it's a frontal attack on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

The other 10 issues get little media attention. Gov. Mike Rounds told me his advice has been "if in doubt, vote no." This state's newspapers, from the largest Sioux Falls Argus Leader to one of the smallest weeklies, the local Northwest Blade, could be more helpful than that.

Newspapers could play a similar role of informing and advising readers and voters in other states with a heavy issue ballot. Arizona has 19. Colorado, 14. California, 13.

Advice and recommendations by newspapers on issues are helpful and appreciated by readers. Newspaper endorsements of candidates are viewed as kingmaking and resented by readers.

A Duel, But Not Decisive (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

According to the pollsters, pundits and pols -- Democratic and nervous Republican -- a great anti-Republican wave is a-coming. Well, let's assume major Democratic gains: 20 to 25 House seats and four to six Senate seats. The House goes Democratic for the first time in 12 years. The Senate probably stays Republican, but by such an excruciatingly small margin that there is no governing majority.

What to say about such a victory? Substantial, yes. Historic, no. Before proclaiming a landslide, one has to ask Henny Youngman's question: "Compared to what?" (His answer to: "How's your wife?") Since the end of World War II, the average loss for a second-term presidency in its sixth year has been 29 House seats and six Senate seats. If you go back to Franklin Roosevelt's second term, the House loss average jumps to 35. Thus a 25/6 House and Senate loss would be about (and slightly below) the historical average.

True, today there is far more -- and more effective -- gerrymandering as computer power and shamelessness both have grown exponentially. So fewer seats are competitive. But that is true only for the House. You cannot gerrymander the Senate. (Of course, the Democrats are trying even that, with their perennial push for two Senate seats for the 9 to 1 Democratic District of Columbia, which should instead exercise voting rights in the state of Maryland, to which it is geographically, economically and culturally contiguous.) In his sixth year, the now-sainted Ronald Reagan lost eight Senate seats that gave the chamber back to Democratic control. That election was swayed by no wars, no weekly casualty figures, no major scandals. The first inkling of the Iran-contra scandal broke on the morning after the election.

DOJ_NMG_0090960

Nonetheless, even if just one chamber falls to the Democrats this time, it will be interpreted as a repudiation of two things: President Bush and Iraq. The Democrats have certainly nationalized the election by focusing on Bush and the war -- with an overwhelming number of Democratic campaign ads doing little else than showing their Republican opponent hugging or praising or merely shaking hands with the president.

Indeed, the anti-Bush feeling is so strong that Democrats -- ignoring the niceties of federalism and enjoying the benefits of guilt by association -- have been running ads linking Bush with Bob Ehrlich, the popular Republican incumbent in the Maryland gubernatorial race.

Yes, the campaign has been nationalized. But will the results be? In the House, a good five seats (Bob Ney, Tom DeLay, Don Sherwood, Mark Foley, Curt Weldon) are likely to be lost to scandals having nothing to do with Bush or Iraq. Of the losing Senate races, only Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania can be said to be dying for the sins of their party.

The other races, if lost, will be lost largely for local reasons. In Ohio, the state is rocked by an enormous Republican scandal at the gubernatorial level that is taking the whole party down with it, Sen. Mike DeWine included. In Montana, Conrad Burns is in trouble because of his association with Jack Abramoff, not George Bush.

In Virginia, a state that should not even be in play, George Allen has run the worst campaign in living memory, stumbling onto one ethnic land mine after another -- "macaca," the Yiddish mama, N-word allegations. And in New Jersey, the one Democratic seat that could conceivably go the other way and save Senate control for the Republicans, the drag on Sen. Bob Menendez is the very nonnational issue of official corruption.

So when the results come in and the Democrats begin to crow, remember this: By historical standards, this is the American people's usual response to entrenched power -- a bracing and chastening contempt. Sixth-year presidents nearly always bring their parties down. (Republican overreaching on the Monica Lewinsky scandal made Bill Clinton's sixth year an exception.) Moreover, this year, the out-of-the-blue Foley scandal interrupted whatever national momentum the Republicans had gained after successfully passing legislation on terrorist interrogation and detention, and thus refocusing attention on their strongest suit, the war on terrorism.

The election will be a referendum of sorts on Iraq. But it will be registering nothing more than uneasiness and discontent. Had the Democrats offered a coherent alternative to the current policy, one could draw lessons as to what course the country should take. But if either friends or enemies interpret the results as a mandate for giving up, they will be mistaken.

Blues Project: Depressed Voters Roll The Dice (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

If the polls and punditry are correct, the Democrats are about to take control of the House and maybe the Senate. If so, then the American people are about to make one of the biggest rolls of the dice in the country's history.

Congress's daily responsibilities lie largely with domestic affairs. By that measure, the Republicans hardly deserve re-election. They have been profligate, in several unattractive ways. The Democrats, alas, do not deserve the responsibility of congressional power at this moment of peril. They haven't justified it.

Iraq is far and away the most important issue on voters' minds. In this week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 36% said Iraq was the top voting issue followed by 22% for job creation. Sitting at 15% was something called "the war on terror." More starkly, a just-released New York Times/CBS News poll said the issue voters most want Congress to deal with is the war in Iraq at 38%; terrorism is a mere 4%.

The demotion of the war on terror is disturbing but understandable. The Iraq war, though terrible, is overweighted in the public mind. U.S. casualties are low relative to other wars. The pace of Iraq's political formation is not worse than was Russia's after the fall of the Communist Party, or China's will be. What's left is the past year's violence around Baghdad. The nature of that violence -- nearly daily, incomparably awful murders of innocent civilians -- brutalizes and shocks those of us who absorb it through daily media reports. It is a violence beyond the consciousness of a civilized people.

That a foreign war transmitted in the information age in this way can have such a deeply depressive effect on the American psyche is troubling for our role in the world and a fit subject for the 2008 election. But this is the reality the American public absorbs every day now, and if it votes for the other party on Tuesday I think that most of all it will be an attempt at catharsis. What people want most from Iraq is surcease.

DOJ_NMG_0090961

As would any party hungry for a much-needed win, the Democrats' campaign ads have boiled down this angst to a simple storyline: "George Bush's failed war in Iraq." Across the country, it's been all-Iraq and all-Bush all the time.

Washington state's Eighth Congressional District is typical. Democratic challenger Darcy Burner, a Microsoft executive, is running in a close race against GOP incumbent Dave Reichert with this: "He supported Bush's plan to invade Iraq. Supported Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld even when they weren't telling us the truth with a failed strategy and no plan to finish the mission . . . If we stay the course, won't we get more of the same?"

Being the off-year default option may not matter much when the subject is health care or immigration. A party's seriousness of purpose matters a lot, though, when the task is the accumulating terrorist threat described in detail in the 9/11 Commission Report, proven by the London airliner plot and made imminent by the arriving nuclear capability of two rogue states, Iran and North Korea.

What have the Democrats done to prove their seriousness or credibility in addressing such a world? One may ask whether invading Iraq made the threat of terror worse, but the programs the Bush administration put in place to fight the broader war after Sept. 11 were, on balance, good -- aggressive electronic and financial surveillance, the Patriot Act, the pursuit, capture and interrogation of terrorists. Progressive Democrats and press exposés opposed all of this, and when the political going got tough for the administration, senior Democrats piled on, went silent and let the president's authority go into a free-fall merely to achieve the result hoped for this Tuesday.

Potential House committee chairmen such as Henry Waxman and John Conyers -- whose tenure and political formation date to the war years of the 1970s -- promise Iraq-related investigations, which likely will cause our front-line troops and agents in the war on terror to throttle back.

If the Democrats win the House by a large margin, media commentary will call it a "repudiation" of the administration's policies in Iraq. This sort of zero-sum analysis may be the norm now, but it's not at all clear this is the message voters want to send.

A closer look at the Times Oct. 27-31 poll is revealing on this count: 55% favor sending more troops to Iraq; 51% say the U.S. "will have lost" if it pulls out now; 62% think the U.S. will have to remain in Iraq beyond two years; 59% say neither side is winning; a majority, 52%, think the U.S. is likely to succeed there.

On whether the U.S. "did the right thing" with military action against Iraq, it is 44% yes to 51% no. Some 59% say congressional investigations of the administration are "not necessary." On whether invading Iraq has increased the terror threat against the U.S., 46% say it's about the same. George Bush's approval rating on Iraq is 29%, but his approval rating for the war on terror is 44% (with 48% disapproving).

There is more ambiguity -- and common sense -- out there than imagined. Enough ambiguity that come the moment of choosing a course Tuesday, voters may give the Democrats less than they expect.

I think the Joe Lieberman race remains a bellwether. Sen. Lieberman's politics represented a Democratic bridge to the president's war on terror. Stampeded by their party's Web-based left, the Democratic Party elders went to Connecticut and blew up the Lieberman bridge. My reading of the electorate is that it wants that bridge rebuilt and it wants both the Democrats and George Bush on it.

Most people don't vote for parties; they vote their own perceived interests. The American people know they're at risk, and they know the U.S. won't succeed in Iraq or protect them against Islamic terror if their Washington leadership is in a state of unending political war. What voters have gotten the past two years is petulance from embittered Democrats and petulance from a stubborn presidential clique. The stakes have become too high for more of the same. The American people will roll the dice Tuesday to shake up the odds in their favor. God's mercy on the gamblers.

How Low Will Bush Go? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

If Democrats manage to take control of one or both houses of Congress on Tuesday, the reason will be that voters were not adequately roused into a state of heart-pounding, knee-knocking, teeth-chattering fear.

Not that Republicans haven't been trying. George W. Bush used to claim he was "a uniter, not a divider," but that was a long time ago. These days, he'd probably try to deny the quote the same way he tried to disown "stay the course." The Karl Rove formula for political victory has been to draw a bright line between "us" and "them" and then paint those on the other side not as opponents but as monsters.

Thus Bush openly accused those who disagree with his policy in Iraq of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. "The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses," he said the other day.

DOJ_NMG_0090962

Call me naive, but I never thought a president of the United States would stoop so low as to accuse current and prospective members of Congress -- a number of whom, by the way, are decorated war veterans, unlike Bush or anyone in his inner circle -- of being pro-terrorist. But this administration has so lowered the bar on political discourse in this country that it's now more of a limbo stick: How low can you go?

I've pointed out in earlier columns the difference between a leader who faces troubled times with a message of bravery and optimism -- Franklin D. Roosevelt's stirring words about the Great Depression, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself," constitute perhaps the best example -- and a leader such as Bush who encourages people to be afraid because their fear is advantageous to him politically.

This goes beyond other scare tactics that have become standard practice. Republican candidates throughout the land are telling people that the Democrats "want to raise your taxes." The truth of the matter is that many Democrats question some of the Bush administration tax cuts because the benefits have gone so disproportionately to the very rich and because continuing to cut taxes when you're also throwing hundreds of billions of dollars at a long-running war is pure fiscal insanity. But in the context of today's political culture, this kind of distortion doesn't even warrant a raised eyebrow.

Republicans are also trying to demonize individuals, warning that if Democrats take control of the House, Nancy Pelosi (gasp!), who represents San Francisco (shudder!), will become speaker. Never mind that she is actually an effective and pragmatic politician, as evidenced by the fact that, days before the election, she has the Republicans playing defense.

"Wedge" issues are designed to invoke fear. As one would expect, Republicans have tried to portray the New Jersey Supreme Court decision on gay marriage -- which did not, by the way, endorse, mandate or even legalize gay marriage -- as some sort of mortal threat to family values from coast to coast. This effort has been oddly halfhearted, though. Maybe GOP strategists worry that stigmatizing homosexuality won't work so well in the wake of the Mark Foley scandal, which laid bare the party's essential hypocrisy. It's hard to portray the Democrats as the party of Sodom and Gomorrah now that everyone knows there are many powerful gay Republicans working on Capitol Hill.

None of this is pretty, and all of it demeans American politics. But claiming that "the terrorists win" if Democrats are elected to Congress -- a statement whose only conceivable purpose is to make Americans afraid -- is something entirely different. The president knows, and at times has acknowledged, that there are people of good will in both parties who differ with him on Iraq. He also knows, or should know, that fear diminishes us as a nation -- that fear appeals to our baser instincts, not our best ideals; that it makes us smaller, meaner, less noble.

He should know all this, but he uses fear anyway, because fear is effective. John Kerry may have chosen an inopportune time (or just the right moment, from the Republicans' perspective) to demonstrate his inestimable comedic timing and his finely tuned political ear. But while Kerry's recent gaffe produced some last-minute outrage, mere outrage probably isn't enough this time. The only thing that might work is fear, and so far not enough Americans have been made to quake in their boots.

I take that back: The president did say that Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld will serve out the remainder of his term. Run for your lives!

Deborah Walsh And Ellen Malcolm (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

Posted November 03, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1103/p25s01-usmb.html Deborah Walsh and Ellen Malcolm By David Cook

While the 2006 election's outcome will not be known until next week, it is already clear that the contest will set new benchmarks for women candidates.

"We are seeing record numbers of women running for the [US] Senate and ... at the state legislative level we have a new record for the first time in 14 years," says Deborah Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. Even without a record number of women candidates running for the US House of Representatives, "we think that for a number of reasons we are looking at a banner year for women, particularly at the federal level," she said.

Ms. Walsh joined Ellen Malcom, president of Emily's List as the speaker at Thursday's Monitor breakfast. Emily's List is the nation's largest political action committee and plans to spend $45 million this year helping elect women candidates who hold a pro-choice position on abortion.

The current political climate favors women, Walsh says. "People are looking for change, voters are looking for change." She adds that, "There is a sense of 'let's throw the scoundrels out' and when those kinds of voters come along, women are seen as the change, they are agents of change and voters look to them...."

While Emily's List founder Ms. Malcolm sees a strong tide running in favor of Democratic women candidates, the organization is taking nothing for granted and focusing on voter turnout. "One of the things Emily's List has been doing is targeting Democratic women who don't vote in non-presidential elections and communicating with them through the mail, through the phones, on the radio, to some extent door to door," Malcolm says. The goal is "to make sure that we get our people to come out and vote in this election. The Republicans have an advantage on this...."

DOJ_NMG_0090963

Many political professionals agree with Malcolm that President Bush's top political advisor, Karl Rove, and the head of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, have assembled a first-rate voter turnout operation.

But Malcolm argues that the conservative social-issues platform that Rove helped craft has lost its appeal to many voters. "The Rove plan was to take political power by revving up the right extreme-conservative base. And he did that by hammering away on their social agenda and turning out the vote. What he has lost is the majority of Americans and he has lost the middle in this process," Malcolm says.

She argues that Rove's strategy "worked for a period of time. It is clearly not working now. What we see and why we are competitive in these heavily Republican districts is because the middle is moving so strongly to the Democrats ... the Rove plan has run out its string."

If Democrats win the House and San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi becomes speaker, Malcom sees that victory helping move women toward the ultimate prize of the presidency.

"I think having Nancy Pelosi as Speaker of the House is going to send a very wonderful lesson to the American public that women can be strong, they can be tough, they can be effective, and they can lead this country as political leaders. That lesson is not only going to make a tremendous difference, I think, in how the House of Representatives operates, and our ability to try to accomplish something, finally, in Congress," Malcolm says. "But I think it also sets the stage in a very significant way for electing the first woman president."

Hollywood Leans Right, Too (LAT)

By Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, November 3, 2006

Who says Hollywood only supports Democrats?

As the two main parties battle it out for control of the House and the Senate in next week's election, the entertainment industry's political action committees have been working behind the scenes for months in Washington, giving far heftier contributions to, yes, Republicans.

According to the latest campaign filings, 28 entertainment industry PACs — lobbying on behalf of corporations such as Sony, Time Warner, Disney and others — have donated nearly $4.8 million to candidates up for reelection this year.

About 59% of the PAC money has gone to Republicans, including Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Orrin Hatch of Utah and Pat Roberts of Kansas, according to Federal Elections Commission records and the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics (Opensecrets.org).

The Democrats — who are often the beneficiaries of individual contributions from celebs — received 41% of the industry PAC money.

"Well, that should belie the right's belief that Hollywood is just a pack of liberals," said producer Norman Lear, a longtime contributor to Democrats.

In the early 1990s, Hollywood's lobbying organizations contributed equally — and heavily — to both parties. But as the power started to shift in favor of the GOP, the corporate PACs followed suit, giving more money to conservatives — especially those who serve on committees that deal with issues vital to the entertainment industry.

In 1996, 57% of Time Warner's PAC contributions went to the Democrats. This year, Republicans received 59% of the company's PAC money.

"It's important that we keep ties with the Republicans," said John Feehery, vice president of external affairs for the Motion Picture Assn. of America and former aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We need to have credibility when we walk into their offices."

The entertainment industry's individual contributions have topped $12 million this election cycle, according to information released Oct. 10 by the Federal Elections Commission. Donations tilt heavily in favor of the Democrats, according to data compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics. The PAC donations offer balance.

The reason is simple, Hollywood political strategists say: While individuals contribute according to their own ideologies, corporations look at a range of issues important to their businesses. The entertainment industry, like others, tends to give to leaders whose positions it supports, regardless of party affiliation.

The MPAA — which depends on studio heads (most of them Democrats) for donations — gave $41,000 to Republicans. By comparison, the Democratic candidates — including Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California — received $26,584.

DOJ_NMG_0090964

Both Specter and Hatch often turn up on the industry PAC contribution lists because they serve on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees issues such as intellectual property rights.

What's more, Feehery pointed out, Hatch is also a musician, and so can appreciate the challenges facing artists.

"We try to focus on supporting the people who support the industry," Feehery said. "The fact of the matter is Republicans have been very good on copyright issues."

Santorum receives donations, Feehery said, because "he has expressed a lot of interest in our industry and has been helpful on some content issues, like PauseParentPlay, which helps parents make decisions on what their children watch in a way that doesn't involve government control."

As for Roberts, Feehery said: "He has a good relationship with [MPAA top executive] Dan Glickman."

But sometimes, in retrospect, Hollywood bosses wonder about the wisdom of PAC donations.

For example, the Universal Music Group PAC gave $2,500 to Florida Rep. Mark Foley before the controversy erupted over his explicit messages to a congressional page. The group gave $2,000 to Sen. George Allen, (R-Va.), before he came under criticism for using the word "macaca," considered a racial slur, at a rally.

"George 'Macaca' Allen?" Lear said when told of the contribution. "Oh, good God, I couldn't be more embarrassed."

Generally, however, the fact that the PACs favor the Republicans does not come as a surprise to industry insiders.

When told about the contributions, celebrity political consultant Andy Spahn was matter-of-fact. "They've been the party in power."

Longtime Hollywood publicist and activist Howard Bragman added. "As lefty as I am, I do understand bipartisanship.

"You can't leave the Republicans on the cutting room floor."

Three For Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

THE THREE Maryland congressmen representing suburban districts near Washington face only token opposition in the general election. All are Democrats -- one a seasoned veteran who may play a key leadership role if his party takes control of Congress; one an up-and-coming two-termer who's staked out a reputation for legislative know-how; and one a journeyman who narrowly survived a hard-fought primary. We endorse them all.

The veteran is Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of the 5th District, which includes Southern Maryland and parts of Prince George's and Anne Arundel counties. Mr. Hoyer, currently the Democratic whip, is an effective 13-term House member who knows the folkways of Capitol Hill as well as anyone and exercises power as a member of the House Appropriations Committee. He has been a key member of this region's congressional delegation, working to secure funding to replace the Woodrow Wilson Bridge, among other priorities. The Republicans, whose candidates have rarely attracted even a third of the vote against Mr. Hoyer, have given up for the time being; his only opponent, Steve Warner of the Green Party, is a developer who is a political novice.

The up-and-comer is Rep. Chris Van Hollen of the 8th District, which includes parts of Montgomery and Prince George's counties. Mr. Van Hollen, having weighed and rejected a race for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat, is an astute lawmaker who's managed to be effective on education and issues affecting federal workers and contracting despite his status as a junior member of the minority party. His Republican opponent, Jeffrey M. Stein, is a lawyer whose race seems more a personal journey than a political one; he has not campaigned actively and believes Mr. Van Hollen is doing a fine job.

The journeyman is Rep. Albert R. Wynn , who for 14 years has represented Maryland's 4th District, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties. We endorsed Mr. Wynn's opponent in the Democratic primary, Donna Edwards, and criticized him for casting votes that seemed at odds with the district's interests while meddling in local politics in Prince George's. We assume that Mr. Wynn, having eked out a primary win by fewer than 3,000 votes, has gotten the voters' message. If he sticks to his job in Congress and listens more closely to his constituents, he can be an able lawmaker. His Republican opponent, software developer Michael Moshe Starkman, moonlights as campaign manager for Mr. Stein. And like Mr. Stein, he is running what amounts to a vanity race.

Weighing Minimum Wage Hikes (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. -- If Democrats succeed in retaking one or both houses of Congress next week, a top priority will be increasing the minimum wage for the first time since 1997. That raises a persistent question: Does lifting the minimum wage destroy so many jobs that it hurts more than it helps?

DOJ_NMG_0090965

In 2002, voters here raised the state's minimum wage -- and mandated automatic annual increases to keep up with inflation. Oregon's 100,000 or so minimum-wage workers are paid at least $7.50 an hour, a rate that will increase to $7.80 in January, well above the federal $5.15 minimum.

On Tuesday, voters in six other states are considering raising the minimum wage, all of which would index minimum wage to inflation as do Oregon, Washington, Florida and, beginning in 2007, Vermont. Democrats see the minimum wage as a way to bolster their base, much as initiatives on gay marriage and other cultural issues boost Republican turnout.

STATE WAGES

· U.S. Department of Labor: Minimum Wage Laws1

During the 2002 debate in Oregon, foes of a minimum-wage increase argued that it would chase away business and cripple an economy that traditionally had higher unemployment than the national average. "With so many Oregonians already unemployed, raising the minimum wage and then increasing it annually would devastate our economic recovery," Bill Perry, head of the Oregon Restaurant Association, wrote at the time.

Four years later, though it is impossible to say what would have happened had the minimum not been raised, Oregon's experience suggests the most strident doomsayers were wrong. Private, nonfarm payrolls are up 8% over the past four years, nearly twice the national increase. Wages are up, too. Job growth is strong in industries employing many minimum-wage workers, such as restaurants and hotels. Oregon's estimated 5.4% unemployment rate for 2006, though higher than the national average, is down from 7.6% in 2002, when the state was emerging from a recession.

Some employers are being squeezed, for sure, and their experiences will become ammunition for those who will fight any increase in the federal minimum wage. Agriculture is pinched because sellers can't raise prices, set on global markets, when labor costs go up. Some businesses say they have avoided expanding in Oregon because labor costs have risen, the sort of change in behavior at the margin that foes of a minimum wage worry about.

At Petite Provence eatery in Portland, co-owner Didier Blanc says the minimum wage, while paid only to servers, has had an "aftershock effect," forcing him to raise wages for all employees. While servers earn the minimum, bakers and cooks earn between $9 and $12 an hour. The costs are passed on to customers.

"After it goes up, everybody at $9 an hour and above will want some kind of raise," says Mr. Blanc. "We have to pass it on in our prices because it goes straight to our bottom line."

So far, though, customers have been willing to pay. Mr. Blanc and his partner have two successful shops and are talking of opening a third. "I don't worry about it," he says of the higher wages, "because if I have to raise prices, next door will have to do the same thing, too."

Chris Dussin, owner of Old Spaghetti Factory, a Portland-based chain with 38 restaurants in 16 states, sees it differently. "You can only raise prices so much before you're going to chase the customer away," he says. Costs at his three Oregon restaurants have gone up $300,000 since the minimum-wage increase -- more than revenues. Mr. Dussin says his bottom line "is eroding" and his profit margin has fallen to 2% or 3%. He raised prices on some items, cut the number of hostesses and has increased the number of tables for each server.

"It's important to take care of people in minimum-wage jobs, but what's missed is the impact on the economy and job creation," he says. "It's not feasible to hire 10 people, so I'm just going to hire seven." He says labor costs scotched plans to open a restaurant in Bend, Ore., a tourist hotspot. The next Old Spaghetti Factory will be in Boise, Idaho, which has a minimum wage of $5.15 and -- unlike Oregon -- allows employers to pay less to workers who collect tips.

Oregon's increase has continued to be a political issue. The Republican candidate for governor, former Portland school-board member Ron Saxton, has argued that indexing depresses employment and particularly hurts agriculture, an important employer here. The incumbent governor, Democrat Ted Kulongoski, counters that repealing indexing would amount to a wage cut.

The legislature last year passed a tax credit to help farming operations pinched by the minimum wage. Gov. Kulongoski refused to sign it after state analysts determined it was so broadly written that it could apply to all wages paid and would cost the state too much.

Now restaurant and agriculture industries are lobbying for repeal of the automatic cost-of-living increase, which has raised the minimum wage 8.7% since 2003. "The question is: How many businesses are going to go down until we decide this is unsustainable?" says Tim Bernasek, general counsel of the Oregon Farm Bureau.

Academic economists traditionally have argued that raising the minimum wage inevitably leads employers to hire fewer workers. The experience of the late 1990s and a landmark study of employment in the fast-food industry by economists David Card and Alan Krueger in New Jersey (which raised its wage) and Pennsylvania (which didn't), has undermined that view.

But they haven't won over everyone. In a new report, economists David Neumark of the University of California at Irvine and William Wascher of the Federal Reserve Board say a review of more than 90 studies in more than 15 countries since the early 1990s shows nearly two-thirds of the studies find a "consistent" though not always statistically significant negative impact on employment. Fewer than 10 found a consistently positive impact. While there's "no consensus," they say, "the weight of empirical evidence" supports the traditional view.

DOJ_NMG_0090966

Art Ayre, Oregon's employment economist, says the effect of the minimum wage varies by region and industry. Amy's Kitchen, a California organic-food producer, opened a 250-employee production facility in Medford, about 270 miles south of Portland, where wages for workers producing frozen pizzas will start at about $8 an hour. Among other things, higher wages were offset by electric and workers' compensation insurance rates, which are lower than in California.

Demand for workers is so strong in some areas that businesses already pay more than the minimum. A 7-11 store in Wilsonville, about 25 miles south of Portland, offers $8 an hour and up for an employee to handle the register and stock coolers.

Supporters of the wage increase say it has been a boon to the state's economy. "Minimum-wage workers are the only class of workers you can give a raise to and guarantee that they're going to spend the money and spend it in the local economy," says Dan Gardner, state labor commissioner. "They're not saving for a Hawaiian vacation."

Foes say Oregon has hurt its ability to attract and retain business, and warn that the effects will be long-term. Restaurant and farm industries argue that voters didn't understand that indexing meant businesses would have to keep raising wages.

The Oregon Restaurant Association is lobbying to freeze indexing and implement a tip credit, which would allow employers to pay tipped workers $7.50 an hour but not be subject to the automatic increases. Still, the number of employees working in the industry has jumped 15% since 2002. Mr. Perry, the head of the restaurant association, says as Oregon's population grows, so does its desire to eat out. But he says the wage increase will force many restaurants to raise prices and scale back on service.

The biggest yelps have come from Oregon's $4 billion farm industry. The 2002 minimum-wage law applies to all workers, even seasonal fruit pickers. So while a competing blueberry farm in New Jersey can pay $6.15 an hour and one in Chile may pay even less, Oregon farmers pay $7.50.

Since 2002, employment in the agriculture industry has grown about 7% to 58,600 workers. But state officials say much of the growth is attributable to the state's booming nursery industry, which is more able to pass on increased costs to customers.

Barb Iverson and her brother say higher wages prompted them to stop cultivating daffodils and potatoes at their Willamette Valley farm. "Why grow a potato here when you can do it in Idaho for $5.15 an hour?" asks Ms. Iverson.

As for the workers, those in low-wage jobs say they're grateful for the state's automatic inflation increase. Pumping gas at a Conoco gas station in Woodburn, Matthew Holt, 25, says the $7.50 an hour he earns is barely enough to make ends meet. "The increase each year does help a little, but when inflation goes up, then everything goes up," he says.

The 25-year-old has two children. His wife works nights at Wal-Mart for $9.80 an hour. Mr. Holt, who completed high school but couldn't afford college, works 40 hours a week at the gas station and plans to get another minimum-wage job at Pizza Hut.

While he says he'd like to have a better paying job, he says there's nothing available for someone without a college degree or training. "You've got to have a skill or a trade," he says. "If you don't, there's no chance of finding a job making more than minimum wage."

The Democrats And Defense (WP)

By Kurt Campbell And Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

The last-minute campaign furor over Sen. John F. Kerry's "botched joke" about the uneducated becoming "stuck in Iraq" was no joke for the Democratic Party. Once again, with an election looming, it found itself cast as the peacenik, antiwar, hostile-to-the-military, soft-on-defense, weak-on-terrorists party.

Whether that will stick won't be known until Tuesday. Polls have shown that voters for a change are more likely at the moment to trust Democrats on Iraq and terrorism than Republicans. But that support seems perishable, and even if Democrats win one or both houses of Congress, they face a long-term challenge of redefining their image when it comes to national security.

That's where Kurt Campbell and Michael O'Hanlon come in. Their provocative new book, "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security," offers a manifesto of sorts for a party still struggling to find its voice in the post-Sept. 11 world. As a party, Democrats have been torn between two poles as represented in the extreme by Joseph I. Lieberman, the hawkish Connecticut senator, and Ned Lamont, the antiwar liberal who beat him in a Democratic primary.

Campbell and O'Hanlon come closer to Lieberman than to Lamont, offering a muscular vision for U.S. power in a dangerous world tempered by the sort of pragmatism they say the Bush administration has been missing. "Democrats must make clear that they, like Republicans, understand that effective diplomacy must often be backed by the credible threat and sometimes use of military force," they write.

DOJ_NMG_0090967

In fact, they argue that President Bush has it right in some ways, praising his priorities in terms of promoting democracy and free trade, defeating terrorists, and opening a new relationship with India. "Hard-power Democrats, independents, and moderate Republicans should therefore not run against the Bush legacy on matters of ideas so much as of seriousness, competence, and execution."

This may be a hard sell even within their own party, where the loudest voices these days argue for a radical departure from Bush's policies. A succession of think tanks and foreign policy elites have been trying to counter the angry blogosphere with a more nuanced position for the party, with limited success. If Democrats win on Tuesday, the internal fight over national security will grow even more pronounced. Democrats have prospered this year mainly by being against Bush without coming up with a genuine alternative. If they find themselves in charge on Capitol Hill, they will face pressure to develop a common posture.

Campbell and O'Hanlon bring years of experience and study to the debate. Campbell served as a Pentagon official under George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton and now works as senior vice president at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. O'Hanlon is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a frequent commentator on foreign policy.

As they note, Democrats have been hobbled for decades by the public perception of weakness. The party of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman and John F. Kennedy was transformed by the Vietnam War and has wrestled with national security ever since.

Clinton's discomfort with the military -- his awkward initial salute to Marines standing guard at his helicopter, his fight over gays in uniform, his tentative response to Bosnia -- exemplified the problem to many. But during eight years in office, he grew more accustomed to his role as commander in chief, responding more confidently to the Kosovo crisis.

Bush, though, has used the issue against Democrats as a cudgel for years, managing to paint Kerry, a combat veteran decorated for service in Vietnam, as weak on security. This year, Bush has cited votes against his counterterrorism legislation to assert that Democrats do not even want to spy on, detain or try terrorists; he went so far this week as to declare that if Democrats win, so will terrorists.

The authors argue that it is not enough to simply shout back; Democrats, they say, "sometimes try too hard to sound like anti-Republicans -- and wind up weakening themselves more than their political opponents in the process."

Instead, they propose a detailed agenda dealing with homeland security, the military, Iraq, terrorism, nonproliferation, energy and China. They propose increasing active-duty armed forces by 50,000, creating State Department rapid-response teams for post-conflict situations and setting up regional National Guard planning centers to better respond to crises such as Hurricane Katrina or a terrorist attack. They would continue missile-defense development but at a lower level, cut the F/A-22 program in half, revamp the Joint Strike Fighter program, retire more Minuteman missiles and Trident submarines, and cut back the V-22 Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft.

On Iraq, they heartily agree with fellow Democrats that Bush "bungled" the war and "dispelled any notion of innate Republican superiority in matters of international hard power." But they criticize their party's rush for the door. "Democrats have focused mostly on missteps in Iraq. But there has been a less vibrant debate about the potential downsides of a precipitous American military withdrawal and how the dangerously eroding U.S. position in Iraq might somehow be made more promising."

It's a debate Campbell and O'Hanlon want to make more vibrant. If Democrats find the right course, the authors argue, the party has a chance to make a historic shift in the party's political perception. If not, they say, "Democrats are apt to remain on the political sidelines, left to contemplate what went so terribly wrong."

Federal Censorship Commission? (WSJ)

By Bob Wright

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Two years ago, I warned in these pages of the danger that the government, in response to the infamous "wardrobe malfunction" during January's televised Super Bowl, would use the threat of fines and license-revocation to create a climate of self-censorship among broadcasters. I take no pleasure in saying "I told you so." But the chill in the airwaves is unmistakable, and the viewing public is the biggest loser. The most recent example involves dozens of CBS affiliates who refused to rebroadcast the documentary "9/11" for fear they would be fined for the coarse words uttered by rescuers. This is one of many instances of broadcast licensees altering or canceling worthwhile programming out of concern about finding themselves in the Federal Communications Commission's crosshairs.

The FCC doesn't operate in a vacuum. It is responding to a degree of public unease with the content available in homes. And it is sensitive to campaigns orchestrated by interest groups with cultural and political agendas. But America long ago determined that government's role in shaping media should be extremely limited. This is true even in the case of broadcasters, who willingly assume public-service obligations in exchange for being licensed to transmit content over public airwaves. No one imagined these obligations to include accepting censorship.

DOJ_NMG_0090968

Some FCC officials have said publicly that they would welcome the return of the family viewing hour -- a voluntary agreement first made 30 years ago among the three broadcast networks to offer family-friendly programming during the 8 o'clock hour. But with cable and satellite, access to VOD services, DVD players and digital recording devices, the vast majority of Americans have programming at their fingertips that will meet any conceivable interest at any time of the day or night. That's great news for parents. But it also highlights the flaw in the notion that, in 2006, the government should mandate that a specific hour be set aside for a certain type of programming on broadcast TV, or indeed that the FCC should attempt to regulate all of broadcast network primetime TV based on standards to protect kids.

For starters, two-thirds of households do not have children under 18. One could reasonably suggest that government policy should not try to force all of broadcast TV to disregard the programming tastes and desires of two-thirds of all households. But FCC regulators do more than just ignore these households. They are blind to the reality of today's media environment. With more than 50% of homes having Internet access and 85% subscribing to cable and satellite services, the media choice is staggering. The average home receives 100 TV channels. Broadcast channels sit side-by-side with cable; and the under-18 cohort that the FCC focuses on so intently no longer knows the difference. Indeed, kids watch cable significantly more than broadcast and spend time on the Internet with unlimited access to material of every description.

So an FCC policy intent on ensuring that there will be nothing on broadcast TV that is inappropriate for kids during certain hours is doomed to failure. Do the math: 85% of households have cable and satellite, leaving 15% receiving broadcast TV only. Two-thirds of those households do not have kids under 18. Thus, the FCC appears to be basing its actions on a policy that is relevant to 5% of households. Moreover, government efforts to regulate content are invariably riddled with unfortunate consequences.

For example, breaking with established precedent, the FCC recently found a live network news program to be "indecent" because a single expletive was unexpectedly uttered by someone being interviewed by a reporter. What public interest is served when news organizations, unwilling to take the risk of incurring a fine, stop interviewing individuals live on camera -- or air all newscasts only after being cleared by a language censor? This ruling also jeopardizes the live sports broadcasts. What if a microphone accidentally picks up a fan yelling something on the FCC's list of bad words? A sports broadcast becomes a multimillion dollar gamble.

So what is the answer? It is certainly not that government should regulate content on cable TV and the Internet. But there is a reasonable solution. Just as parents use technology on the Internet, ratings information and blocking technology are available for TV. Broadcast and cable networks have a ratings and parental-advisory system, and today's TV sets are equipped with V-chips that block specified programming from entering a home. The entire TV industry is striving to provide parents with help to guide them through today's thicket of offerings. To make sure parents are aware of the control they have over programming, the TV industry and Ad Council are collaborating on a $300 million educational campaign.

No one suggests broadcast networks adopt an "anything goes" approach. All broadcast networks employ standards experts who vet thousands of hours of programming to make sure it doesn't violate sensibilities. Of course they make mistakes, and neither audiences nor government officials have been shy in voicing concerns -- to which the networks respond. Over-the-air broadcasters -- who are the most responsible, community-focused providers of programming in the business -- do an excellent job. Indeed, the vast majority of complaints about specific shows filed with the FCC (99% in 2004) came from organized interest groups who regularly trawl for complaints from individuals who never saw the show in question.

The FCC should formulate policies that take advantage of advanced technology, rather than hark back to solutions developed in -- and for -- a bygone era. An appropriate FCC policy would recognize that our TV audience is quite varied; that some programs at all hours should appropriately serve the two-thirds of households that do not have children; and that blocking technology is a 21st-century solution that is consistent with the Supreme Court's admonition that the government is constrained by the First Amendment to use the least restrictive means to address "indecent" programming content.

Mr. Wright is vice chairman of GE and chairman and CEO of NBC Universal.

The Second Election Without Soft Money Suggests That 2004 Was Not A Fluke (WP)

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

THE MCCAIN-FEINGOLD campaign finance law was supposed to be -- or so its critics warned -- a body blow to political parties. Starved of the six- and seven-figure "soft money" checks to which they had become addicted, opponents said, the parties would wither, their influence eclipsed by outside groups that remained free to accept unlimited sums. Democrats, who were especially dependent on soft money, would find themselves at a fatal disadvantage.

None of that has happened. Not in 2004, when the parties raised a combined $1.5 billion ($785 million by Republicans, $684 million by Democrats) -- amazingly, more than their hard and soft money combined in any previous election. And not in 2006, the first midterm campaign conducted under the new rules, when the combined party fundraising was $768 million as of mid-October ($438 million by Republicans, $330 million by Democrats), according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute. The parties, now limited to maximum annual contributions of $26,700 from individuals, haven't recouped all the soft money they once vacuumed up, but they have rebounded far more robustly than anyone had predicted.

DOJ_NMG_0090969

Instead of being hobbled by the abolition of soft money, Democrats are actually more financially competitive with Republicans than before. At this point in the 2002 election cycle, their total fundraising was $185 million behind the Republicans' figure; this year, that gap has shrunk to $108 million. The Democrats' House and Senate campaign arms have more than doubled their hard-money fundraising from four years ago.

All of this is welcome news. Unlimited soft-money checks were a corrupting influence; they needed to be done away with no matter the impact on the political parties. That soft money could be abolished and the parties remain a vibrant political force is a double benefit. Indeed, as a financial matter, the biggest difference between the 2004 and 2006 elections is the relatively more muted role of the outside groups known as 527s.

This remains a flawed system; it looks good only by comparison to the even more flawed previous regime. And the 2006 campaign has pointed up one particularly ridiculous aspect of campaign finance law that ought to be fixed before 2008: The rules limit how much political parties can spend on candidates in consultation with them but allow parties to spend unlimited amounts on behalf of candidates so long as they act "independently." Thus there is the spectacle of a Republican National Committee ad attacking Tennessee Democratic Senate candidate Harold E. Ford Jr. that the chairman of the RNC says he can't control -- because it was produced by an "independent" arm of the RNC. There's no good reason to force the political parties to engage in this charade of setting up independent groups. In fact, as the Ford ad shows, there's every reason to set up a system that requires those who underwrite ads to take responsibility for them.

US Envoys To Visit Asia To Prepare North Korea Nuclear Talks (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, November 3, 2006

Senior US diplomats will travel to Asia Sunday to prepare for a resumption of six-way negotiations with North Korea aimed at ending Pyongyang's newly proven nuclear weapons program, the State Department said.

The envoys will press Japan, China and South Korea to maintain tough UN-mandated sanctions against North Korea in the run-up to the negotiations and to ensure a united front in insisting the talks lead to Pyongyang's full denuclearization, department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Under pressure from the sanctions imposed after North Korea carried out its first nuclear test explosion on October 9, the Stalinist regime agreed earlier this week to return to the multilateral disarmament negotiations it had been boycotting for nearly a year.

But US officials remain wary of Pyongyang's motives, fearing the unpredictable North Korean leadership could use its new nuclear status as leverage to seek an easing of the sanctions against it while stalling on demands it verifiably give up the arsenal.

"We don't want this just to be about talk, we want it to be about getting some concrete, positive outcomes," McCormack said.

The US team will be led by Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's senior deputy, and include Robert Joseph, the hawkish head of the State Department's non-proliferation initiative who has been charged with overseeing implementation of the sanctions against North Korea.

They will meet Sunday and Monday with Japanese leaders in Tokyo before heading to Beijing for two days of talks with both Chinese and Russian officials, McCormack said. The pair will visit Seoul November 8 and 9.

China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States are the five parties which have been trying for the past three years to convince North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic incentives and security guarantees.

The two sides reached a framework agreement in September 2005 under which North Korea agreed to give up its nuclear weapons, though the sequencing of the process was left for further negotiations.

Pyongyang walked away from those talks two months later after Washington slapped sanctions on a Macau-based bank accused of laundering money and passing counterfeit US currency on behalf of the North Koreans.

The US action led the bank, Banco Delta Asia, to freeze some 24 million dollars in North Korean assets, believed to include personal funds belonging to North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il and his entourage.

There were also reports at the time that Washington had angered Pyongyang by backing away from a promise to provide North Korea with a light-water nuclear reactor for its civilian energy program as part of the deal.

As part of this week's deal to resume negotiations, Washington told North Korea it was willing to discuss the Banco Delta Asia sanctions as part of the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0090970

McCormack reaffirmed Thursday that the six-party talks were expected to resume before the end of the year and that Washington wanted the starting point to be the September 2005 framework agreement.

The mission for Burns and Joseph, he said, was to "create the right conditions, the best atmosphere" for the negotiations.

McCormack said there were no plans for the US envoys to meet with the North Koreans during next week's trip.

"I don't see that happening", he said.

U.S. Speeds Attack Plans For North Korea (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The Pentagon has stepped up planning for attacks against North Korea's nuclear program and is bolstering nuclear forces in Asia, said defense officials familiar with the highly secret process.

The officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the accelerated military planning includes detailed programs for striking a North Korean plutonium-reprocessing facility at Yongbyon with special operations commando raids or strikes with Tomahawk cruise missiles or other precision-guided weapons.

The effort, which had been under way for several months, was given new impetus by Pyongyang's underground nuclear test Oct. 9 and growing opposition to the nuclear program of Kim Jong-il's communist regime, especially by China and South Korea.

A Pentagon official said the Department of Defense is considering "various military options" to remove the program.

"Other than nuclear strikes, which are considered excessive, there are several options now in place. Planning has been accelerated," the official said.

A second, senior defense official privy to the effort said the Bush administration recently affirmed its commitment to both South Korea and Japan that it would use U.S. nuclear weapons to deter North Korea, now considered an unofficial nuclear weapon state.

"We will resort to whatever force levels we need to have, to defend the Republic of Korea. That nuclear deterrence is in place," said the senior official, who declined to reveal what nuclear forces are deployed in Asia.

Other officials said the forces include bombs and air-launched missiles stored at Guam, a U.S. island in the western Pacific, that could be delivered by B-52 or B-2 bombers. Nine U.S. nuclear-missile submarines regularly deploy to Asian waters from Washington state.

The officials said one military option calls for teams of Navy SEALs or other special operations commandos to conduct covert raids on Yongbyon's plutonium-reprocessing facility.

The commandos would blow up the facility to prevent further reprocessing of the spent fuel rods, which provides the material for developing nuclear weapons.

A second option calls for strikes by precision-guided Tomahawk missiles on the reprocessing plant from submarines or ships. The plan calls for simultaneous strikes from various sides to minimize any radioactive particles being carried away in the air.

Planners estimate that six Tomahawks could destroy the reprocessing plant and that it would take five to 10 years to rebuild.

Asked about the strike planning, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the U.S. government is seeking a "peaceful, diplomatic solution" to the threat posed by North Korea.

Regarding any military options, Mr. Whitman said, "The U.S. military is prepared and capable of carrying out all of its assigned missions."

The planning does not mean that the United States will attack, only that military forces are ready to do so if President Bush orders strikes. Concerned about threats from rogue states such as North Korea, Mr. Bush called for a ballistic missile defense system, parts of which are operational.

Defense officials said a key factor in the ramped-up planning effort is China's new attitude toward North Korea. Beijing's leaders, upset that North Korea conducted the test, supported a U.S.-led United Nations' resolution.

Chinese opposition to military action had limited defense planning, the officials said. In the past, U.S. military plans required warning Beijing, a move considered likely to compromise any planned action because of the close military ties between China and North Korea.

The Bush administration regards the new level of Chinese support as a "green light" for more aggressive military planning.

U.S. officials think North Korea will conduct another underground test soon because Pyongyang is demanding to be recognized as a declared nuclear power. Both China and the U.S. gauged the test as only partially successful.

DOJ_NMG_0090971

The Yongbyon plant, 32 miles from the coast and a half-mile from a river, is considered a key target because U.S. intelligence agencies suspect that it is where the plutonium fuel used in the Oct. 9 test was produced.

Defense planners also said equipment destroyed at Yongbyon would be difficult to replace once newly approved U.N. sanctions are in place.

Another set of targets could be the nuclear test site near Kilchu, in northeastern North Korea. That site includes several research and testing-control facilities in the mountains -- and possibly one more tunnel where a nuclear device could be set off, the officials said.

Recent intelligence reports also provided new information about Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, which remains hidden in underground facilities in northern North Korea, the officials said.

The U.S. Special Operations Command has been planning raids against North Korean nuclear facilities for some time. It has conducted training for joint operations with South Korean special forces as well as unilateral U.S. operations.

U.S. Pacific Command spokesman Capt. Jeff Alderson declined to comment on military planning but said the command is continuing to shift forces to the Pacific and has four missile-defense ships deployed in Japan.

Mr. Bush said recently that any transfer of nuclear weapons by North Korea would be a "grave threat," phrasing viewed as diplomatic code for a military response. Defense officials said the military option will be used if North Korea is caught transferring nuclear arms to other states or terrorist groups.

Six-Party Fever (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

After launching long-range ballistic missiles and setting off a nuclear device, North Korea's Kim Jong Il suddenly announced this week that he is prepared to return to the six-party talks after nearly a year's absence. Something must have happened to inspire this abrupt display of totalitarian pliancy, and it wasn't the intercession of Jimmy Carter.

The Bush Administration is treating the decision as something of a vindication of its policy, and that's partly true. At the U.N., Ambassador John Bolton answered Kim's fireworks displays by engineering unanimous Security Council resolutions 1695 and 1718, the second of which includes sanctions.

At the Treasury Department, meanwhile, Undersecretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence Stuart Levey aggressively cracked down on North Korea's money-laundering and counterfeiting schemes in places like Macau's Banco Delta Asia. Now Kim can no longer easily access his overseas slush funds to grease the spokes of his military machine.

Most important, Beijing finally decided to lean on its truculent neighbor, with some Chinese banks cutting off remittances to North Korea and, according to one report, the Chinese government briefly turning off the oil spigot without which Kim's regime would quickly collapse. China's helpfulness may owe less to any innate sense of good global citizenship than to its fear that a nuclear North Korea will eventually inspire a nuclear Japan. But whatever the case, the Chinese moves vindicate the Administration's long-held view that only regional pressure can sway Pyongyang, and that there's little to gain from direct bilateral talks.

Yet these small victories won't mean much if the Administration agrees in the six-party talks to abandon the very tools that brought North Korea back to the table in the first place. On Tuesday, Christopher Hill, the State Department's emissary to the talks, agreed that the U.S. would discuss the financial measures it's imposed on Kim's regime; in return, the regime will "discuss" denuclearization.

Problem is, however, that while the U.S. can be counted on to honor its diplomatic promises, the North Koreans cannot. Does anyone today remember North Korea's pledge last year to abandon its nuclear programs? At the time, Mr. Hill described the supposed breakthrough as "one of the best examples of multilateral diplomacy in this part of the world." Kim walked away from his pledges within a week, complaining that he wouldn't return until the U.S. stopped leaning on his finances.

There is also something troubling about an American initiative that's willing to be flexible, even if only in theory, about enforcing American law. Kim's forays into nuclear physics are dangerous and destabilizing, but they are not, strictly speaking, criminal. But his country's counterfeiting of American currency is criminal, as is its involvement in the heroin trade, and the idea that the U.S. might ease the pressure on North Korea's underworld activities as a diplomatic gambit takes realpolitik too far.

Barring outright regime change in Pyongyang, the goal of any American diplomatic initiative is to demonstrate to Kim, as the U.S. did to Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, that unless he disarms his regime will continue to be isolated and starved for cash and trade. His return to the table is probably a ploy, but at least it demonstrates that he is susceptible to financial and economic pressure. Keep that pressure up, and the six-party talks might actually succeed.

Iran Revolutionary Guards Hold War Games After U.S. Exercise (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0090972

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

TEHRAN, Nov. 2 — Iran's hard-line Revolutionary Guards began another series of war games on Thursday days after a United States-led naval exercise began in the Persian Gulf.

During the Iranian exercise, called Great Prophet 2, dozens of missiles were fired, state-run television news reported.

It showed film of missiles fired from mobile launchers in the deserts near Qum, a religious city south of Tehran, the capital.

"Iranian experts have made some changes" to Shahab missiles, the news report said, "installing cluster warheads in them with the capacity to carry 1,400 bomblets."

"The first and main goal of this exercise is to demonstrate power and national determination to defend the country against any possible threat," it added.

Iran also conducted war games in August and April.

Heliport operations in the Strait of Hormuz are expected to follow the latest games.

The maneuvers appeared to be a response to the United States-led naval exercise in the Persian Gulf that began Monday, involving 25 nations, some of them neighbors of Iran. The exercise is aimed at enhancing security in the Persian Gulf and blocking the transportation of unconventional weapons.

A spokesman for the Iranian Foreign Ministry condemned the exercise on Sunday and urged neighboring countries to set up their own security arrangements. "We do not consider this exercise appropriate," said Muhammad Ali Husseini, the spokesman.

Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, leader of the Revolutionary Guards, said on television that Iran's war games were "no threat for the region or neighboring countries."

General Safavi said the games would last 10 days and would take place in the Persian Gulf, the Sea of Oman and several Iranian provinces.

Iran Test-fires Longer Range Missile (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 3, 2006

Iran test-fired dozens of missiles, including the Shahab-3 that can reach Israel, in military maneuvers Thursday that it said were aimed at putting a stop to the role of world powers in the Persian Gulf region.

The show of strength came three days after U.S.-led warships finished naval exercises in the Gulf that Iran branded as "adventurist." Iran remains locked in dispute with the West over its nuclear program, which Washington says is geared to producing atomic weapons but Tehran says is only for generating electricity.

Asked about Thursday's maneuvers, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she thought the Iranians "are trying to demonstrate that they are tough."

"The Iranians also I think are not unaware that the security environment is one in which if they actually were to do something Iran would suffer greatly and so I think they probably understand that," Rice said on the Bill Cunningham radio show on WLW Cincinnati.

"They are trying to say to the world you are not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon," she said. "The world has to say to them, yes, we will."

Iranian state television reported that several kinds of missiles were tested, and broadcast footage of them being fired from mobile launchers.

"We want to show our deterrent and defensive power to trans-regional enemies, and we hope they will understand the message," the head of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, said in a clear reference to the United States, Britain and France, who were among the six nations that took part in the Gulf maneuvers this week.

Iranian state radio said: "The maneuver is aimed at providing security in the region without the intervention of trans-regional powers, which are trying to justify their presence by portraying the region as convulsive."

In Israel, Infrastructure Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer said he was not surprised by the missile tests, and warned that to leave Iran unchecked would pose a risk to the world.

"Iran is following a direct line after North Korea. Therefore this problem is not Israel's but that of the entire world," Ben-Eliezer said, referring to North Korea's recent nuclear test and its frequent launches of long-range missiles.

Iran's Shahab-3 missile, which can carrying a nuclear warhead and is believed to have a range of more than 1,240 miles, is believed to be based on North Korea's Nodong missile. Iran is said to have funded the Nodong's development.

Iran, which denies obtaining missile technology from North Korea, has been testing the Shahab-3, which means "shooting star" in Farsi, since the late 1990s and publicly paraded the rocket for the first time in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0090973

The Iranian missile tests "should bother not only Israel. It should bother the Arab countries, Islamic countries, the Gulf region, North Africa and Europe. We are always warning the world about this phenomenon called Iran," Ben-Eliezer said.

Iran already has held three large-scale military exercises this year. It often uses maneuvers to test weapons developed by its arms industry.

Safavi, whose elite Revolutionary Guards conducted the missile tests, said the maneuvers that began Thursday, named "Great Prophet," would take place in the Gulf, the Sea of Oman and several provinces of Iran. He did not say how many troops were involved.

State radio quoted the air force chief of the Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Hossein Salami, as saying: "A large number of advanced missiles, different in range, warhead and kind, were successfully test fired at the same time."

State TV reported that among the rockets fired was the Shahab-2, which has a warhead that can distribute 1,400 bomblets at the same time. It also said the troops launched solid-fuel Zalzal missiles, guided missiles as well as Scud-B, Zolfaghar-73 and Z-3 rockets.

Iran has already held three large-scale military exercises this year. In its April exercises, Iran tested what it called an "ultra-horizon" missile, which is fired from helicopters and jet fighters, and the Fajr-3 missile, which can reportedly evade radar and use multiple warheads to hit several targets simultaneously.

While U.S. officials have suggested that Iran is exaggerating the capabilities of its newly developed weapons, Washington and its allies have been watching the country's progress in missile technology with concern. Last December, Israel successfully tested its Arrow missile defense system against a rocket similar to Iran's Shahab-3. The Arrow was developed jointly with the United States.

The U.S.-led maneuvers that finished Monday focused on surveillance, with warships tracking a ship suspected of carrying components of illegal weapons. The nations that took part were Australia, Bahrain, Britain, France, Italy and the United States.

The U.N. Security Council is considered imposing sanctions on Iran, which has ignored demands that it cease uranium enrichment, a process that can produce the fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs.

Iran Fires Longer-range Missiles, To West's Dismay (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Iran fired its longer-range Shahab-3 ballistic missile for the first time, official media said, kicking off 10 days of war games and renewed warnings from the West over its nuclear program.

"Shahab missiles, carrying cluster warheads, with a range of 2,000 kilometers (1,200 miles), were fired from the desert near (Iran's clerical capital) Qom," state television reported.

That range is sufficient to threaten US bases in the Gulf.

The war games came amid US-led efforts to impose UN-mandated sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

They also came a day after a US-led naval force launched maneuvers for the first time in the Gulf near Iran in a test of capabilities to halt trafficking in weapons of mass destruction -- an initiative seen as a clear message to the Islamic republic.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice chided Iran: "I think they're trying to demonstrate that they're tough."

The hardline Revolutionary Guards fired the missile during the first phase of military maneuvers in the central desert.

"Dozens of Shahab-2 and -3, Zolfaghar-73, Scud B, Fath-110 and Zelzal have been launched in the presence of (Guards chief) General Yahya Rahim Safavi and other high-ranking commanders," the television report said.

"The cluster head of the Shahab-2 has the capability to disperse 1,400 bomblets with great destructive power."

It was the first time that Iran had fired the longer-range Shahab-3 and commanders said they would also be employing other "new equipment" during the war games.

Russia said it would monitor Iran's military moves after the reports of the missile-firing but ruled out the possibility that the Islamic republic had the technological means to create even longer-range missiles.

"If we are talking about intercontinental ballistic missiles, according to our information, Iran does not possess the technological capability" to create missiles with a 5,000-kilometer (3,100-mile) range, the head of Russian military's general staff Yury Baluyevsky told ITAR-TASS news agency.

Dubbed "Great Prophet 2," the air, land and sea maneuvers are to extend across 14 provinces with the focus on the Gulf and the Sea of Oman.

"The first and main goal of this exercise is to demonstrate power and national determination to defend the country against any possible threat," Safavi said.

"Heliport operations will be carried out in the Hormozgan region (on the Strait of Hormuz) and some of the Persian Gulf islands."

DOJ_NMG_0090974

The strategic Strait of Hormuz is the obligatory passage for tankers exiting the Gulf that carry much of the world's oil supply.

The Iranian maneuvers come on the heels of naval exercises launched in the Gulf on Monday by a US-led flotilla including warships from Australia, Bahrain, France, Italy and Britain.

"That is a propaganda and political maneuver without military value," Safavi said then.

"If forces from out of the region want to jeopardize Iran's security and interests, the Revolutionary Guards and the Basij (volunteer militia) will use all their capabilities to strike their enemies and their interests," he warned.

But the Guards commander insisted Iran's exercises were no threat to its neighbors.

"This maneuver is no threat for the region or neighboring countries," he said, adding: "Our neighbors are our friends and we consider our neighbors' enemies our enemies."

The aim of the exercises was the "defense of sensitive centers, strategic bottlenecks and confrontation of possible troubles," he said.

It is Iran's third round of war games this year. In August, the armed forces held country-wide maneuvers dubbed Zolfaghar Blow. Iran also staged Great Prophet 1 exercises in April.

Rice said Thursday's missile test was Iran's way of telling the world "you're not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon".

"The world has to say to them, yes, we will," she said.

The United States and its big power partners are negotiating among themselves a package of sanctions designed to persuade Iran to give up its uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists the program is aimed at providing fuel for nuclear power plants while Washington and others suspect the ultimate aim is to develop atomic weapons.

Referring to Iran's refusal to comply with a UN Security Council resolution demanding it abandon suspect nuclear activities, Rice said: "I think the Iranians are a threat and that's why the international community's got to be strong in resisting their ambitions."

Iran Fires Missiles In War Games (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr In Tehran And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process even as Europe took the first steps at the United Nations Security Council towards obtaining a resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend its nuclear fuel programme.

Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week.

"The product of the second cascade will be achieved soon after gas injection," the official said.

Iran began running one cascade of 164 centrifuges at its Natanz facility under UN inspection in January. It denies it has a weapons programme and says the uranium will only be enriched to the low level needed to fuel a civilian nuclear reactor.

Experts in Tehran believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened following the Islamic republic's refusal to heed a UN security council demand to suspend the programme that set an August 31 deadline.

"It's a significant part of Iran's policy… to show 'stick policy' will lead only to escalation of [the] crisis and won't hurt Iran's irreversible path," commented Aftab website which is close to Hassan Rowhani, the former nuclear negotiator.

Regime insiders say Iran's top leadership is not particularly worried about nuclear-related sanctions.

On Wednesday France, Germany and the UK – the so-called EU3 that had been negotiating with Iran – presented a draft sanctions resolution to the US, Russia and China for discussion.

Diplomats said one issue at dispute between the EU3 and the US was the future of the Bushehr reactor under construction by Russia in southern Iran. The draft says the "construction" of Bushehr is exempt from the sanctions, but the US has sought to block Russia's planned supply of nuclear fuel next year.

Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block.

The European proposal would seek to prohibit nuclear and ballistic missile cooperation with Iran - unless exempted - by taking "necessary measures" to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of materials and technology. It would also halt related financial transactions, block international travel for Iranians connected to those activities and freeze their overseas assets.

DOJ_NMG_0090975

A list is to be drawn up of individuals subject to the travel ban and asset freeze. It is not clear how far up the political hierarchy such a list might go.

Discussions among the five permanent members of the Security Souncil and Germany are to start on Thursday.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament that the UK was working closely with other veto-wielding Security Council members to get a "proper, binding resolution".

The US and Europe say the proposed resolution is intended as a first step, and would be followed by steadily escalating measures if Iran did not comply.

At the same time, diplomats are worried that the process could end up replicating the crisis with North Korea whereby Iran would respond to threats by expelling UN inspectors and quitting the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty. For this reason Europe – including the Russians who have a $1bn contract – are insisting that the Bushehr project should be allowed to continue.

European officials hope negotiations will resume with Iran but on the precondition that it first suspend its enrichment programme.

President George W. Bush reiterated yesterday that the US would be ready to join Europe in negotiations following verifiable suspension.

"We've got a lot of issues with Iran," Mr Bush told a news conference. "The first is whether or not they will help this young democracy succeed," he said, referring to Iraq. He said the "second issue" was whether Iran would help the Lebanese government, and that the "big issue" was "whether or not Iran will end up with a nuclear weapon".

Six Major Powers To Resume Talks On Iran Sanctions Friday (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Six major UN powers are due to resume delicate negotiations Friday on a package of sanctions against Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work, UN diplomats said.

The informal meeting will notably hear from Russian ambassador Vitaly Churkin, who travelled home this week to work out Moscow's response to a draft resolution drawn up by Britain, France and Germany, they said.

The negotiations were suspended a week ago with Russia and China still deeply reluctant to agree to tough sanctions and Washington feeling the proposals from its European allies did not go far enough.

The draft calls for a series of nuclear- and ballistic missile-related trade sanctions, a freeze of assets related to Iran's nuclear and missile programs and travel bans on scientists involved in those programs.

But it would allow Russia to continue building a billion-dollar nuclear power plant in the Iranian city of Bushehr -- an exemption crucial to gaining Moscow's approval for any resolution, diplomats said.

Iran faces sanctions after rejecting an earlier Security Council resolution requiring it to suspend a long-secret program to enrich uranium -- a process that can eventually provide fissile material for nuclear weapons.

Tehran insists the program is only to provide fuel for civilian nuclear power stations.

The six powers -- the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany, which has close ties to Iran -- have offered Tehran a package of economic and diplomatic incentives if it gives up the enrichment program.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called her five counterparts on Tuesday to urge speedy passage of the sanctions resolution and on Thursday warned that inaction was not an option.

"I think the Iranians are a threat and that's why the international community's got to be strong in resisting their ambitions," she said.

Rice also responded to the first launch by Iran earlier in the day of a new long-range ballistic missile, the Shahab-3, during war games seen as a warning to the West over the nuclear showdown.

"They're trying to say to the world, 'You're not going to keep us from getting a nuclear weapon.' The world has to say to them, yes, we will," Rice said in a radio interview.

"But the Iranians also I think are not unaware that the security environment is one in which if they actually were to do something, Iran would suffer greatly and so I think they probably understand that," she added.

But diplomats said there was still protracted and tough haggling to come as Russia and China remain reluctant to accept biting sanctions against a country with which they have close energy and trade ties.

The head of Russia's national security council, Igor Ivanov, reaffirmed Russia's reticence on the issue Thursday, warning that any Security Council decision "should be aimed not at punishing Iran but at continuing to resolve the problem through political means."

US officials have refused to elaborate publicly on their objections to the European draft, though the fact that Washington has so far not agreed to co-sponsor the measure is a clear sign that differences remain.

DOJ_NMG_0090976

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack did say earlier in the week that Washington wanted firm guarantees that construction of the Bushehr power plant would not provide Iran with access to sensitive fuel-cycle technology.

But McCormack expressed confidence that the issues could be resolved and that the Bushehr project was not a deal-breaker.

"The bottom line is, at the end of these negotiations on a resolution, we believe we are going to get a good, strong resolution that sends a message to Iran that it must come into line with what the international community has demanded that they do," he said.

Abbas To Consider Seeking New Elections (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, November 3, 2006

Mahmoud Abbas is inclined to seek new elections if talks with Hamas militants on forming a moderate government don't produce results in about two weeks, a top aide to the moderate Palestinian president said Thursday.

Abbas has been trying to end a punishing aid cutoff by setting up a government acceptable to the West, either in a power-sharing arrangement between Hamas and his Fatah movement, or by appointing independent technocrats. However, Hamas has balked at demands that it recognize Israel, and no solution to the deadlock has emerged.

In other developments Thursday, Israeli attack helicopters, tanks and ground troops tightened their grip on the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, killing an elderly civilian, two militants and a police officer on the second day of Israel's biggest push in months to stop Palestinian rocket fire.

Palestinian hospital officials said another five militants were killed and several wounded in airstrikes during the early hours Friday. The military said aircraft targeted rocket launch sites in the area.

In a separate operation, an airstrike on a car in Gaza City killed three Hamas members travelling inside, one of them a local militant commander, witnesses said. An army spokeswoman said a vehicle carrying "terror activists" was hit.

Independent legislator Mustafa Barghouti, who has been shuttling between the two sides, said Thursday that an agreement on a new government is close, but he would not disclose details. "We have made good progress. We are almost there," Barghouti said after meeting with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

Barghouti later met Abbas to brief him on his five hours of talks with Haniyeh and told reporters the two men had also spoken directly by phone.

He said tentative agreement has been reached on a political program acceptable to the West. However, negotiations have broken down in the past, despite upbeat forecasts.

The head of Abbas' office, Rafiq Husseini, said the Palestinian leader still hopes to reach a solution. But if negotiations fail, Abbas "feels instinctively that the best thing for him to do is to go back to his people," meaning a new election, Husseini said in an interview at the presidential headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Under the Palestinians' Basic Law, Abbas cannot call an early election. However, he could try to get around that by holding a referendum on early elections.

Hamas was elected in parliament elections in January, and the next vote is not due for another three years. Abbas was elected separately in 2005.

Abbas aides, speaking privately, have said the Palestinian leader has set a two-week deadline for wrapping up negotiations with Hamas. Husseini confirmed that Abbas has given a time frame.

"The president does not like lengthy negotiations, lengthy discussions ... and therefore he has to put deadlines," Husseini said. "I think everybody is talking about a deadline of a couple of weeks ... and I think this must be true."

Still, Abbas' low-key leadership style makes it unlikely he will seek a showdown with Hamas. In the past, he has repeatedly backed down from such confrontations.

Violence in and around the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun has increased since Wednesday with a total of 20 Palestinians killed, including the four new deaths early Friday. Israeli attack helicopters, tanks and ground troops on Wednesday launched the military's biggest push in months to stop Palestinian rocket fire.

The Israeli army said more than one-third of the 800 rockets fired at Israel in recent months were launched from Beit Hanoun.

At a Hamas rally after nightfall Thursday in Gaza City, Haniyeh called the Israeli offensive "terrorism."

Despite the offensive, militants fired six rockets at Israel from northern Gaza on Thursday, the military said. Two Israelis were slightly wounded and a house was damaged.

A Western diplomat, meanwhile, said he expected new security arrangements to be in place at the Karni cargo crossing between Gaza and Israel, the coastal strip's main lifeline, before the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0090977

The U.S.-backed arrangements, including new scanners, European monitors and deployment of elite Palestinian forces, are to prevent closures of Karni over security threats. In recent months, Karni has been closed down repeatedly by Israel amid warnings of possible attacks by Palestinian militants.

Last week militants smuggled high explosives through the crossing. They were intercepted on the Israeli side, the military said.

Israeli Troops Kill 6 Palestinians In Second Straight Day Of Fighting In Gaza Farming Town (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 2 — Israeli troops on Thursday rounded up Palestinian men and battled militants for a second straight day in the northeastern corner of the Gaza Strip, killing six Palestinians, including militants and civilians, Palestinian medical workers said.

The Israeli operation in Beit Hanun, a farming community that has been the scene of frequent fighting, is one of the largest since Israeli forces entered Gaza four months ago. It is intended to stop, or at least limit, the persistent Palestinian rocket fire from the area into Israel, the Israeli military says.

Despite the large Israeli presence, Palestinians still managed to launch several more rockets Thursday from nearby areas in northern Gaza. One hit a house in the Israeli town of Sderot, which is just beyond Gaza's perimeter fence, and two Israeli civilians were wounded, Israeli officials said.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, speaking in Gaza City, just a few miles from the fighting, said the Israeli action would not succeed. "We are completely sure this will fail, as all previous campaigns failed," he said.

In Beit Hanun, the streets were largely deserted except for Israeli tanks and other armored vehicles that kicked up clouds of dust as they patrolled the town. Most of the town's 30,000 residents remain holed up in their homes. The Israeli military interrupted Palestinian radio broadcasts, telling women, children and older men to stay inside for their safety.

However, in a separate announcement on loudspeakers, the Israeli forces ordered all males ages 16 to 45 to gather at a square in the town. Many were put onto trucks and driven outside the town for questioning. Most were later released, but about 15 were held for further questioning, the Israeli military said. While the fighting was less intense than on Wednesday, when the Israeli incursion began, there was sporadic gunfire throughout the day.

On Thursday night, Israel carried out airstrikes against Palestinians responsible for firing rockets, the Israeli military said. Two Palestinians were killed, according to Palestinian medical workers. There were conflicting reports about whether they were militants or civilians.

Earlier in the day, two Palestinian militants and two civilians were killed, said officials at Kamal Adwan Hospital. One of the civilians, Diab al-Bassioni, was in his 70s. Mr. Bassioni was hit by a bullet when he stepped outside to get water, his neighbors told Agence France-Presse. More than a dozen Palestinians were wounded, hospital officials said.

In two days of fighting, at least 14 Palestinians have been killed and more than 60 wounded, according to Palestinian hospitals. Most of the dead and wounded have been militants, though a number of women and children have also been hurt, according to the hospitals. One Israeli soldier was killed Wednesday, and two were lightly wounded on Thursday, the Israeli military said.

For the past five years, Beit Hanun has been one of the Palestinian militants' favorite places from which to launch rockets toward Israel. Beit Hanun is only about two miles from Sderot, but the rockets have a limited range and are wildly inaccurate.

The Gaza militants have fired about 300 of their 800 rockets so far this year from Beit Hanun, according to the Israeli military. Most of the other 500 have been launched from elsewhere in northern Gaza.

The militants frequently fire from the orange and lemon groves on the outskirts of Beit Hanun, but Israel has bulldozed many of those orchards, removing the cover for the militants, as well as the livelihood of many residents.

Many militants come from Gaza City, or other parts of Gaza, and not Beit Hanun. Some local residents oppose the Palestinian rocket fire because the town bears the brunt of the Israeli military response, but others support the Palestinian attacks.

Israel has staged repeated raids into northern Gaza over the past five years in an effort to halt the rockets. While the incursions have reduced the rocket fire in some instances, it has never stopped it completely.

Syria Denies Plan To Topple Lebanon Govt. (AP)

By Samar Kassabli

AP, November 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0090978

Syria on Thursday denied U.S. accusations that it was seeking to topple Lebanon's Western-backed government with the help of Iran and Hezbollah.

The Foreign Ministry said Syria has stayed out of its neighbor's affairs since pulling its troops out of Lebanon last year.

"The U.S. administration's attempts to circulate that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are seeking to destabilize Lebanon are not true," the Foreign Ministry said. "Since it withdrew its troops from Lebanon, Syria has voiced its support for anything that the Lebanese agree on through their national dialogue."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday there was "mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah, and their Lebanese allies are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

A strongly worded statement from the White House did not detail that evidence. It did single out Syria for an alleged plan to derail possible prosecutions for the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who had tried to draw his country away from Syrian domination.

Lebanese and international pressure following Hariri's February 2005 assassination forced Syrian troops to end their 29-year presence in Lebanon.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, accused Syria and Iran on Monday of violating a U.N. embargo meant to keep Hezbollah from rearming after the Lebanese guerrillas' 34-day war with Israel last summer. He said Tuesday that violations of that embargo are part of the "evidence base" the White House used.

Syria denies it is violating the embargo.

Terje Roed-Larsen, the top U.N. envoy for Syria-Lebanon issues, said representatives of the Lebanese government "have stated publicly and also in conversations with us that there has been arms coming across the border into Lebanon."

The Lebanese government denied having shared such allegations.

"Neither the government, nor I told anybody about this," Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora reporters Wednesday.

Lebanese Defense Minister Elias Murr said Roed-Larsen's comments were "inaccurate."

Israel has said weapons smuggling for the Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah was continuing despite the U.N. embargo. Israel has said its military overflights of Lebanon are necessary to monitor the situation.

The Lebanese government has deployed thousands of soldiers on the border with Syria to stop smuggling. A U.N. maritime force led by Germany is patrolling the Mediterranean off Lebanon to enforce the embargo.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah gave Saniora's government an ultimatum on Tuesday: establish a Cabinet of "national unity" by Nov. 13 or face street protests. Such a Cabinet would give the Islamic militants and their allies veto power over key decisions.

U.S. officials said they consider Nasrallah's threat serious.

Threat Deepens Lebanon Political Crisis (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, November 3, 2006

Two months after its devastating war, Lebanon is again on the edge of crisis — at the center of a power play involving the United States, Syria, Iran and Israel.

Neighboring Syria on Thursday denied accusations it wants to topple the Lebanese government, but an ultimatum earlier in the week from the Syrian-allied Hezbollah to stage mass protests to force early elections has alarmed Washington and Europe.

At stake is the August cease-fire that halted the Israel-Hezbollah war, and Western efforts to bolster democracy in Lebanon. The crisis also could undermine U.S. diplomatic overtures to Syria and Iran to help calm Iraq, where both countries have influence among armed groups.

Politics in this ethnically diverse nation have boiled over in recent weeks, washing away a brief period of unity during the war, when Lebanon suffered a pounding from Israel's military after Hezbollah guerrillas crossed the border and captured two Israeli soldiers.

Hezbollah, an armed Shiite group that has often fought Israel, also has 11 legislators in Parliament and has been increasingly aggressive in its political plays. The threat Tuesday from its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, racheted up tensions between pro-Syrian and pro-Western groups.

Nasrallah warned of street protests if Prime Minister Fuad Saniora did not accept his group's demands for a "national unity" Cabinet, in which Hezbollah and its allies would have a veto on key decisions. Nasrallah set a deadline of Nov. 13.

Hezbollah now has two ministers on the 24-member Cabinet and can count on support from three more, but eight votes are needed to veto key decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0090979

Nasrallah's threat, as well as five grenade attacks in Beirut in recent weeks, have stoked tensions and raised fears of more violence, particularly after a pro-government Christian group said Thursday that it was ready to take to the streets "to defend the Lebanese republic."

At the same time, Israel has been flying warplanes over Lebanon to pressure the international community into curbing an alleged flow of weapons from Syria to Hezbollah's fighters.

Saniora has dismissed Israeli claims of weapons smuggling and denied his government told the United Nations of such actions. But U.N. envoy Terje Roed-Larsen said he was told by Lebanese officials that arms were still flowing from Syria to Lebanon in violation of a U.N. embargo.

On Wednesday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said there was "mounting evidence" that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah "are preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Snow said any attempt to stir up demonstrations, threaten or use violence against Lebanon's U.S.-backed leadership would be a clear violation of the country's sovereignty and of three U.N. Security Council resolutions.

His comments drew a quick denial from Syria.

"The U.S. administration's attempts to circulate that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are seeking to destabilize Lebanon are not true," the Syrian Foreign Ministry said Thursday in a statement.

The statement noted Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon last year under international pressure to end a nearly 30-year occupation. Since then, it said, "Syria has voiced its support for anything that the Lebanese agree on through their national dialogue."

Washington isn't alone in its concerns, however. The European Union, which provided the bulk of troops monitoring the August cease-fire, also has expressed worries about challenges to Saniora's government.

"The EU will be with you. You can be sure of that," EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana told Saniora at a news conference in Beirut last weekend.

While Hezbollah threatened street action, its leader said demonstrations would be peaceful and stressed that the Lebanese people have a democratic right to demonstrate — something the United States has not in the past opposed.

But Washington considers Hezbollah a terrorist organization and the group's push for a confrontation with Washington's Lebanese allies appeared to persuade the White House to take a public stand behind Saniora, who has strengthened ties with the United States.

In a statement Thursday, Hezbollah said the U.S. is trying to draw Lebanon into its dispute with Iran and Syria and enlist the country in the "Bush administration's war against those it considers enemies."

Despite the sharpening rhetoric, Nasrallah left open the possibility of compromise, perhaps by expanding the number of Cabinet portfolios.

The Arabic newspaper As-Safir said Thursday that officials in Saudi Arabia were discussing a formula to add more representation to the Cabinet.

Nasrallah, who met with the Saudi ambassador last week, said in the Tuesday interview that he would not object to Saniora staying on as prime minister as long as the Cabinet was reshuffled and expanded.

Somali Extremists Threaten Bombings (AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy

AP, November 3, 2006

Islamic extremists in Somalia are threatening to stage suicide bombings in parts of East Africa, the U.S. Embassy said Thursday in the latest warning that conflict in Somalia could spread in this volatile region.

The embassy, in a warning to Americans living or traveling in Kenya, said it had received reports of "extremist elements" targeting Kenya, Ethiopia and other "surrounding countries," which it did not identify.

"These threats specifically mention the execution of suicide explosions in prominent landmarks within Kenya and Ethiopia. American citizens are advised to remain vigilant and to use extreme caution when frequenting prominent public places," the statement said.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another. But an increasingly powerful group, the Council of Islamic Courts, seized control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and now controls much of Somalia's south.

The embassy's warning came one day after talks collapsed between the militants and Somalia's U.N.-backed interim government, which controls only the western city of Baidoa.

A leading member of the Islamic militia, Abdirahman Janaqow, told The Associated Press he didn't believe his group had prompted the embassy's warning. He charged that the statement was "designed to create problems."

DOJ_NMG_0090980

Officials of the acting Somali government did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

The U.S. government has charged that some in the Somali militant group have tied to al-Qaida.

Experts warn that Somalia could become a proxy battleground for neighboring Eritrea and Ethiopia. Eritrea, which broke away from Ethiopia in a 1961-91 civil war and fought a 1998-2000 border war with its rival, supports the Islamic militia. Ethiopia backs the interim government.

A confidential U.N. report obtained by AP last week said 6,000 to 8,000 Ethiopian troops are in Somalia or along the border. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea are inside Somalia. Eritrea denies having any troops there, while Ethiopia insists it sent only a few hundred advisers.

Kenya, and Tanzania just to its south, have already been victims of al-Qaida terrorism, with the bombings at the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam in 1998 and attacks on a hotel and an Israeli airliner in Kenya in 2002.

The attacks emanated from Somalia, where the growing militant movement has prompted concerns that the chaotic nation could become fertile ground for Osama bin Laden's terror organization. Two leaders of the Islamic courts appear on U.S. and U.N. lists of people known to have ties to al-Qaida, although both men have repeatedly denied the allegations.

U.S. Urges Caution In Kenya, Ethiopia (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

The United States warned its citizens in Kenya and Ethiopia yesterday about the possibility of suicide attacks by "extremist elements" from Somalia amid rising fears of a regional war in the Horn of Africa.

The State Department urged Somalia's neighbors to stay away from the struggle between the country's weak central government and the powerful Islamic courts that control the capital, Mogadishu, and much of the country.

The U.S. Embassies in Nairobi and Addis Ababa cited reports of "terrorist threats emanating from extremist elements within Somalia which target Kenya, Ethiopia and other surrounding countries." The threats "specifically mention the execution of suicide explosions in prominent landmarks within Kenya and Ethiopia," the embassies warned.

The messages called on Americans to be vigilant and to use extreme caution in public places.

Intelligence officials and nongovernmental organizations in the region are warning of an escalation of the Somali conflict, with Ethiopia supporting the interim government and Eritrea backing the Islamists. Kenya is home to many Somali expatriates.

Recent troop movements and artillery fire have added to the anxiety. "Given the situation on the ground, the proximity of the forces and the artillery duels of the last few days, an escalation is likely," regional analyst Matt Bryden told [a] news agency. "It could be hours, it could be days, it could be weeks."

The United States has accused the Islamists of harboring al Qaeda operatives.

"There are concerns that the ... current situation in Somalia might lend itself to wider violence in the region, and we are doing everything we can to see that does not happen," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"We believe the most hopeful course forward begins with transitional federal institutions and the Islamic courts coming together," he said.

Bomb attacks on the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in August 1998 killed 224 persons, including 12 Americans.

Somalia's government yesterday rebuffed efforts to reorganize peace talks after they failed this week in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum.

Diplomats said mediators were trying to persuade the two sides to return to the table in the middle of the month, and the Islamists said they were "always ready and prepared" for negotiations." But government delegate Ahmed Omar Gagale told [a news service]: "The government delegation has refused to set a date and a place."

In Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian Foreign Ministry issued a blunt assessment of the deteriorating situation, blaming "extremist" Islamists for the failure of the talks and the looming war.

EU Cancels Talks Between Turkey, Cyprus (AP)

By Robert Wielaard

AP, November 3, 2006

The European Union on Thursday canceled a meeting bringing together the foreign ministers of Cyprus and Turkey, talks called to resolve a dispute threatening Turkey's already troubled drive to join the EU.

Turkey opened EU membership talks in October 2005 but opposition has since grown — notably in France and Germany — to bringing a large, poor, Muslim nation into the bloc, particularly one that is slow to embrace political reform and that effectively refuses to recognize EU member Cyprus.

DOJ_NMG_0090981

Failing to overcome hurdles, the EU canceled a two-day meeting aimed at mediating in the Turkey-Cyprus feud, said Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja, whose country holds the rotating EU leadership. The talks had been scheduled for Sunday and Monday in Helsinki, the Finnish capital.

"We have been prepared to arrange a round of talks (with) all parties in Finland. Unfortunately, this has not been possible," said Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja.

The EU wants Ankara to drop its refusal to open Turkish ports to Cypriot planes and ships — a key condition for the entry talks to continue. Ankara wants the EU to do more to end the isolation of Turkish Cypriots, whose government only Turkey recognizes.

Tuomioja said in a statement that the stumbling blocks were "questions related to direct trade between the EU and the northern part of Cyprus" and "the uninterrupted continuation of Turkey's accession negotiations."

The Mediterranean island of Cyprus has been divided into a Greek-Cypriot south and a breakaway Turkish-Cypriot north since Turkey invaded in 1974 after a failed Athens-backed coup by supporters of union with Greece. Cyprus entered the 25-member EU in May 2004.

Turkey has no diplomatic relations with the island's internationally recognized Greek Cypriot government, and backs the breakaway Turkish Cypriot state in the north.

In Cyprus, government spokesman Christodoulos Pashiardis blamed the cancellation on Turkey. "We understand that this development is due to the positions and terms put forward by the Turkish side," Pashiardis said.

"The Cypriot government will continue to consult with the Finnish presidency, maintaining the same constructive stance and behavior as it had done up until now."

Under pressure from Greece and Cyprus, the EU may abandon the membership talks if Ankara does not live up to an agreement extending its customs union with the EU to the Greek Cypriot part of Cyprus.

In 2004, Greek Cypriots rejected a United Nations-backed plan to reunite the country on the eve of its entry into the EU, essentially excluding the Turkish-speaking north from receiving EU benefits even though Turkish Cypriots endorsed reunification in a separate referendum.

Greek and Cypriot media reports have said Finland is proposing to reduce restrictions on the Turkish-speaking part of Cyprus if Turkey opens its ports to the Greek Cypriots.

The Finnish government had no comment on the reported proposals.

Earlier this month, Greece and Cyprus forced the EU to postpone the opening of a new chapter of Turkey's EU membership talks — on industrial policy — until a solution to the customs dispute was found.

In Greece, Prime Minister Costas Karamanlis said Turkey had failed to implement basic reforms needed before it joins the European Union.

He called on the European Commission to clearly state Turkey's shortcomings in a forthcoming progress report on the country's membership prospects.

"The truth is that, so far, Turkey has not taken basic and necessary steps on ... its obligations regarding the European Union," Karamanlis said.

Uneasy NATO allies Greece and Turkey have long-running disputes over airspace and undersea exploitation rights in the Aegean Sea, and have come close to war three times since 1974.

Karamanlis said a standing Turkish threat to declare war if Greece extends its territorial waters is an "unacceptable anachronism."

Vietnam To Prosecute Three U.S. Citizens In Terrorism Case (WP)

By Grant McCool

The Washington Post, November 3, 2006

HANOI, Nov. 2 -- Seven people, including three Vietnamese-born U.S. citizens, will be prosecuted on charges of plotting violence against Vietnam's communist government, officials said Thursday.

The prosecutor included charges against a U.S. citizen whose 13-month detention has drawn attention in the United States before a Nov. 17-20 visit to Vietnam by President Bush.

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) has linked the detention of Orlando resident Thong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee to passage of a bill that would grant Vietnam permanent normal trade relations status. "Senator Martinez is doing everything in his power as a U.S. senator to get Mrs. Foshee back to Florida," said his spokeswoman, Kerry Feehery.

Washington and Hanoi signed a trade deal May 31 that helped usher Vietnam toward its expected accession next week to the World Trade Organization. The White House hopes to win approval of permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam before Bush's visit.

DOJ_NMG_0090982

On Thursday, prosecutors in Vietnam "asked the Ho Chi Minh City People's Court to bring to court seven defendants involved in a terrorism case," according to a statement carried by the official Vietnam News Agency.

A Cold War Ghost Haunts Elections In Nicaragua (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- When the U.S. ambassador here said of a presidential candidate that "if it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, and swims like a duck, it probably is a duck," he ruffled a lot of feathers.

Since the comments earlier this year, the candidate, José Rizo, a white-haired coffee farmer, has been lampooned in the Nicaraguan media as a "pato," or duck, which is also Nicaraguan slang for homosexual. Ambassador Paul Trivelli's friends say the diplomat meant to imply only that Mr. Rizo, 62 years old, is a creature controlled by former Nicaraguan President Arnoldo Alemán, who is under house arrest for embezzlement. But many here suspect the Spanish-speaking Mr. Trivelli knew the full meaning of the word.

"He called me a duck, and that means homosexual," says Mr. Rizo, who says he isn't gay -- and is angry he has to defend himself. Mr. Trivelli declined to be interviewed for this article, as did other U.S. Embassy officials.

The duck flap is illustrative of what Nicaraguans consider U.S. intrusion in this Sunday's presidential election, where former Sandinista comandante and president, Daniel Ortega, 61, whom Washington despises, is running well ahead of banker Eduardo Montealegre, 51, whom Washington favors. Mr. Rizo is running a distant third, but he is attracting U.S. attention in part because support for him would split the anti-Ortega vote -- and keeping Mr. Ortega out of office is extremely important to U.S. officials.

The current controversy carries echoes of the 1980s, when the U.S. sought to overthrow Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government, which had allied itself with the Soviet Union. The current Ortega campaign evokes strong emotions in the State Department as a reminder of that time. Even retired Lt. Col. Oliver North, a prominent figure in the Cold War battle against the Sandinistas, has become involved, criticizing the U.S. for shunning Mr. Rizo, who Col. North believes has the best chance of defeating Mr. Ortega.

Since arriving in Managua last year, Mr. Trivelli, 52, has become a familiar figure in the Nicaraguan media, where he often slams what he calls the country's antidemocratic forces -- Mr. Ortega's Sandinistas and Mr. Rizo's Liberal Constitutional Party, or PLC. The U.S. is battling corruption, he says, which is a threat to Nicaragua's democracy and especially virulent in the PLC. "We will never approve of a candidate, or a party that has as a candidate Arnoldo Alemán, his family, his cronies or someone designated by him," Mr. Trivelli said earlier this year on Nicaraguan television.

Last month, the Organization of American States, which is monitoring elections here, issued a statement that "lamented" outside interference in the election and criticized Ambassador Trivelli by name.

Even some of America's friends here think Mr. Trivelli has been heavy-handed. Carlos Briceño, a U.S. citizen who heads a television station in Managua, says he was telephoned by a deputy of Mr. Trivelli who said the election was a matter of U.S. national interest and suggested his news coverage should reflect that concern. "The U.S. has lost the parameters of what is permissible and what is totally unacceptable," Mr. Briceño says.

In response to such criticisms, a State Department spokesman said in a briefing yesterday, "We're not trying to shade opinion or to try to take a position. This is a democratic election."

Mr. Trivelli, a career foreign-service officer, headed the Central America desk at the State Department before being appointed ambassador last year. One European diplomat says the tall and bearded Mr. Trivelli is known for being withdrawn and somewhat brusque. While of Italian descent, says the diplomat, Mr. Trivelli "obviously didn't learn anything from Machiavelli."

The Americans aren't the only ones throwing their weight around. Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chávez, has been supplying Sandinista mayors with cut-rate oil for public transportation and fertilizer to be sold to local farmers.

Mr. Rizo, who like many affluent Nicaraguans travels frequently to the U.S. for family and business matters, said recently that he has encountered visa problems at Mr. Trivelli's embassy. When his 10-year U.S. visa expired this summer, Mr. Rizo says he got only a three-month visa, after a tough grilling at the embassy. That visa has already expired and he must apply for a new one.

The U.S. Embassy also has lifted the visas of more than two dozen prominent figures in Mr. Rizo's PLC party, most of them judges, alleging in most cases that they are corrupt. The visa issue has been decried by the PLC as politically motivated. In Managua circles and the press, the visaless officials are called "los desvisados" -- the ones whose visas were lifted.

A State Department spokesman says the government is barred by law from commenting on individual cases, but that the U.S. doesn't revoke visas for political reasons.

The U.S. has opposed the PLC since Mr. Alemán, a 300-pound political boss known as "El Gordo," or "the Fat Man," cut a deal in 1999 with Mr. Ortega, the head of the Sandinista opposition. As part of the "pacto," the two parties rewrote election laws so that a presidential candidate could avoid a run-off and win with just 35% of the vote, rather than 45% as before. That was a boon for Mr. Ortega, who is anathema to a large part of the electorate in this dirt-poor country of 5.5 million.

DOJ_NMG_0090983

In the most recent polls, Mr. Ortega has about 33% of the vote, compared with 25% for Mr. Montealegre and 17% for Mr. Rizo.

The U.S. has a turbulent history with Nicaragua, which it has treated as a kind of protectorate. In 1909, the U.S. sent gunboats to Nicaragua, forcing the resignation of President José Santos Zelaya, who had executed two Americans. U.S. Marines occupied the country for most of the next 24 years. But the Marines were unable to quell a revolt by nationalist Gen. Augusto Sandino and left the country in 1933. The U.S. turned power over to an ally, Gen. Anastasio Somoza, whose family ruled until the Sandinista triumph in 1979 put Mr. Ortega in power.

Nicaragua became a Cold War battleground when the Sandinistas allied themselves with the Soviet Union. The U.S. engaged in a proxy war, backing Contra rebels in the 1980s. Mr. Ortega left power peacefully in 1990 when he lost an election, but Cold War ghosts continue to haunt Managua and Washington. Some Bush national security officials got their start during the Contra wars, which may help explain why the U.S. is determined to stop their nemesis, Mr. Ortega. "Daniel Ortega sets them off," says Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "He sets the reptilian part of their brains to work."

Mr. Ortega has run for president three times since his 1990 loss, but this is the first election in which he has a real chance to win, thanks to the new 35% rule. These days, Mr. Ortega runs as the candidate of reconciliation. He picked as a running mate a former Contra leader, Jaime Morales, whose mansion Mr. Ortega had once confiscated, and chose as a campaign song John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

One of Mr. Rizo's few prominent U.S. allies is Col. North, who as a Reagan White House official sold arms to Iran and used the proceeds to fund the Contras -- which provoked a scandal in Washington. In his syndicated column, Col. North, who is also a television host for Fox News, last month slammed the U.S. for distancing itself from Mr. Rizo. He later flew to Managua, where he made an appearance with Mr. Rizo at a breakfast. Mr. Rizo's campaign also ran a television spot using a still shot of Mr. North, with the White House in the background.

Mr. Trivelli wasn't amused, saying the ad wrongly suggested the U.S. was backing Mr. Rizo. Such propaganda by the PLC is "paja," he told reporters, using a word that means "bogus," but has a second slang meaning of "masturbation." The ensuing controversy over yet another linguistic faux pas was the talk of Managua.

The city's mayor Dionisio Marenco, a top aide to Mr. Ortega, jokes that Mr. Trivelli is acting as Mr. Ortega's campaign manager. "I hope he keeps saying stuff," says Mr. Marenco.

Ortega Gives US The Jitters (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, November 3, 2006

On a steamy night in Managua, a young man with a gaunt face and wispy moustache walks over to a car at a traffic light, draws back his rain-soaked sleeve and, with slow and awkward strokes, draws the letters FSLN on one of the passenger windows. Then he clenches his fist as if victory for his beloved Sandinista party were already assured.

The scene only lasts a few seconds. But as Nicaragua prepares for presidential elections on Sunday, it speaks volumes about the growing feeling that Daniel Ortega, the former leftwing guerrilla leader, and his FSLN Sandinista movement have a real chance of returning to power after an absence of 16 years.

Opinion polls, though inaccurate in other recent elections in Central America, show that Mr Ortega has about 33 per cent of the vote and a lead of at least eight points over his nearest rival. If he could increase that to 35 per cent on Sunday, and maintain at least a five-point lead over the second-place candidate, he would win.

With Nicaragua's population of just 5.2m and gross domestic product of less than $5bn (€4bn, £2.6bn), one obvious question is why any of this matters. The main reason is that the US cares – a lot.

Nicaragua's domestic affairs have always been an intense focus of US foreign policy, and its history is pockmarked by US interventions. But when Mr Ortega swept to power in 1979 in an armed revolution during the cold war, the country – and Mr Ortega – became a virtual obsession in Washington. The US government has spent much of the last decade and a half trying to ensure that he does not return.

His increasingly close relationship with Hugo Chávez, the rabidly anti-US Venezuelan president, has only made relations worse.

The 60-year-old veteran revolutionary has run in – and lost – the last three presidential elections. Little seems to have changed on the campaign trail either: the jingles set to John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" may be new but he still turns up hours late and then makes speeches that last longer than most people would like.

DOJ_NMG_0090984

However, there is a widespread perception that years of democratic government have failed to alleviate the country's extreme poverty. Enrique Bolaños, the centre-right outgoing president, is set to leave office with modest growth, declining inflation and strong gross central bank reserves. But even that relative stability has failed to affect ordinary people.

On the streets of Managua, beggars abound and barefoot children splash around in rubbish-filled gutters instead of going to class. A recent report by the education ministry pointed out that this year's budget only provided about $40 in maintenance allowance per school.

Mr Ortega may also benefit from the deep rifts that have divided Nicaragua's parties. The right has split, thanks in large part to the corruption scandals surrounding Ricardo Alemán, the former centre-right president under house arrest for corruption.

Indeed, Eduardo Montealege of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance (ALN), Washington's preferred candidate, and José Rizo of Mr Alemán's Liberal party (PLC) have spent the campaign fighting each other rather than doing battle with Mr Ortega.

The left has also split – although not as drastically as the right. The breakaway Sandinista Renovation Movement (MRS) led by Edmundo Jarquín, a former official at the Inter-American Development Bank, could get at least 10 per cent of the vote.

Mr Ortega has tried to widen his support by bringing in faces traditionally associated with the opposition and moving to the right on many issues. Jaime Morales, his vice-presidential candidate, was a member of the so-called Contra rebels, who fought a long and bloody war against Mr Ortega in the 1980s and were illegally bankrolled by Washington.

Mr Ortega has campaigned with a substantial dose of anti-US rhetoric, and has even mentioned renegotiating aspects of Cafta, the trade agreement that came into force this year between Central America, the Dominican Republic and the US.

But he has also been quick to distance himself from the radical Sandinista policies of the past, such as confiscation of private property and obligatory military service. In a move that shocked many people, he recently even helped approve a law that makes it illegal for pregnant women facing life-threatening complications or victims of rape to have an abortion.

The US is in no doubt that outright victory for Mr Ortega on Sunday would be disastrous for Nicaragua, and has warned that it would also give Mr Chávez a foothold in the region.

But Carlos Fernando Chamorro, editor of the weekly Confidencial newspaper and son of Violeta de Chamorro, the former centre-right president who beat Mr Ortega in 1990, is less concerned. He argues Mr Ortega is a pragmatist and that means not doing anything too radical to upset the US. He also says that Mr Ortega would face a deeply divided National Assembly.

Nicaraguan Vote Links Past, Present U.S. Foes (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist leader of Nicaragua, could join a wave of leftists coming to power in Latin America if he wins his country's presidential election Sunday.

A victory by Ortega would be the second this year for a leftist in Latin America. Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won a second term last month. Other leftist leaders: Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez and Evo Morales of Bolivia.

Ortega's history of confrontation with the United States and support from Chávez have turned a national election into an international confrontation. Chávez is a fierce critic of President Bush who says the United States is interfering in the region.

Though Ortega, 61, leads in pre-election polls, he might not get enough votes Sunday to win outright. To win, a candidate must get 35% the vote and have a 5-percentage-point advantage over the closest runner-up. Otherwise, the top two candidates advance to a runoff election in mid-December.

A poll by M&R Consultores published Oct. 27 showed Ortega and his Sandinista National Liberation Front with 33% support. The U.S.-favored candidate, Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, had 25%. The poll of 4,501 potential voters had a margin of error of +/-1.5 percentage points.

Ortega is positioning himself as a reformed revolutionary. Wednesday, he pledged to promote the private sector and build on free-trade agreements. To support his theme of unity, he has enlisted a former archrival as his running mate.

Montealegre and fellow conservative Jose Rizo of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party, in third place in polls, have made the need to defeat Ortega a key message of their campaigns. The candidates are trying to woo voters still waiting for market reforms to improve conditions for Nicaragua's 5.14 million people. According to the CIA, Nicaragua is one of the Western Hemisphere's poorest nations and has one of the world's most unequal distributions of income.

Ortega's candidacy has not only raised the hackles of the United States, but it also elicited memories of Nicaragua's civil war of the 1980s, which pitted Ortega's Soviet-backed Sandinista government against U.S.-backed contra rebels.

The Reagan administration's effort to topple the Sandinistas became part of the Iran-contra scandal: The administration secretly sold arms to Iran and used the proceeds to fund and arm the contras.

The civil war killed about 50,000 people. It ended in 1990, when a U.S.-backed candidate, Violeta Chamorro, was elected president.

DOJ_NMG_0090985

The United States has been outspoken in its desire to see Ortega lose. U.S. Ambassador Paul Trivelli has questioned Ortega's commitment to democracy.

On a visit here last month, Oliver North, the former White House aide at the heart of the Iran-contra controversy, warned that a vote for the Sandinista leader would mean a return to conflict.

"If (someone else) were running for president of Nicaragua and said, 'I am a friend of Fidel Castro and Hugo Chávez, and I oppose U.S. policy,' that would be enough to create some friction, to put it mildly," says Otto Reich, a senior official in the Reagan administration. "The fact of history compounds the problem."

Sitting in his office next to Ortega's home, Bayardo Arce, a top Sandinista party member, says the United States will continue to be the country's principal market if his party wins. But he adds that Nicaragua also will reach out to the rest of Latin America.

That interest in inter-Latin American relations has been highlighted by a deal struck by the Sandinistas with Venezuela to provide discounted oil to alleviate Nicaragua's energy crisis. For the past year, Nicaraguans have suffered regular blackouts, in part because of the high cost of oil. The Venezuelan deal has been criticized by opponent Montealegre and outgoing President Enrique Bolaños as a vote-getting ploy.

Dionisio Marenco, mayor of the capital, Managua, an Ortega ally and a leader of the fuel program, denies a political motive. "If the same offer were given on these terms by Bush, or by (Mexican President Vicente) Fox, or anyone in Saudi Arabia or the Sultan of Brunei, I'd take it," he says.

Nicaraguan voters, meanwhile, are divided. Some former contras are siding with Ortega. His running mate is his former contra archrival, Jaime Morales.

Mario Romero, 38, a taxi driver, has Montealegre bumper stickers all over his car. He fought in the Sandinista army, and his brother was killed in the war. "Ortega?" Romero says. "Never again."

Ortega Poised To Take Helm In Nicaragua (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Months of campaigning for Nicaragua's presidency has ended in a flurry of fireworks and flowery rhetoric from supporters of Daniel Ortega, the one-time Sandinista leader and Washington headache who appears poised for a comeback on Sunday.

Thousands of Ortega supporters paraded through the streets of Managua this week, waving banners for his Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) and sporting his "pink tide" hats espousing a return to the party's leftist ideals.

But the modern-day Mr. Ortega -- a balding, pudgier version of the young firebrand who led the overthrow of the Somoza family dictatorship in 1979 -- appears to have mellowed a bit, and in doing so, has garnered just about enough support to win Sunday's election without a runoff.

Aged 60, the FSLN leader who during the 1980s presided over the Sandinista fight against the U.S.-funded Contra rebels now preaches "unity for a triumphant Nicaragua" and has embraced his one-time rivals.

His running mate is none other than Jaime Morales Carazo, a former top Contra political negotiator, nicknamed "the godfather," whose home was seized by the Sandinistas. Mr. Ortega lives there to this day.

Mr. Ortega has also promised to honor the basic principles of the country's free market approach to economic development. In a ceremony Wednesday -- the last day of official campaigning -- he signed an agreement with officials at the Ministry of Commerce pledging to respect its 10-point approach to rectifying the financial woes of the region's poorest countries.

Along with embracing his political adversaries and cozying up to economic officials, the media-savvy Mr. Ortega knows the importance of playing to the country's poor, telling Nicaraguans they have been reduced to "beggars" during the last 16 years of democratic rule.

All that has pushed Mr. Ortega to the top of a crowded field. Recent polls show him just shy of securing enough votes to win outright on Sunday.

To avoid a second election, a candidate must garner 35 percent of the vote and be at least five percentage points ahead of the next leading candidate.

Some analysts are predicting a first-round win for Mr. Ortega, while others think he will fall short, forcing a runoff between the two top vote-getters in December.

"Polling in Nicaragua is rarely accurate and always a 'work in progress,' " noted Manuel Orozco, an analyst with the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue.

DOJ_NMG_0090986

If he can't secure a victory in the first round, then Mr. Ortega would face a tough battle against either Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre, who split from the ranks of the ruling Liberal Constitutional Party (PLC) to form his own party, or former vice president and PLC candidate Jose Rizo. Mr. Montealegre has the support of the United States.

Edmundo Jarquin, a former economist with the Inter-American Development Bank who heads a dissident social democratic campaign that rivals the FSLN on the left, poses little threat to the FSLN leader, but he could siphon off just enough votes to deny Mr. Ortega a first-round victory.

But Mr. Ortega's opponents aren't ready to concede defeat.

"It's going to be a very close race," said Terencio Garcia, a lawyer in Managua who is an adviser to the Rizo campaign. He predicted that the PLC candidate would emerge from the first round and contest Mr. Ortega for the presidency next month, provided the Sandinista doesn't resort to "dirty tricks" on election day.

Mr. Rizo has the added burden of the U.S. support for Mr. Montealegre.

Thousands of electoral officials from Nicaragua, the Carter Center, headed by former President Jimmy Carter, and the European Union, will be on hand to monitor every polling station. A national fraud, said one electoral observer, would be "highly unlikely with the number of people that will be watching the ballot boxes."

"Ortega was ripe for being denied [the presidency]," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, noting the former leader has already lost the last two presidential elections. "Now, if he wins, there's no telling what he's going to do."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz, Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

China defense budget

The Pentagon has had two rounds of discussions with the Chinese military on the defense budget process, with the United States explaining in detail how its military spending works and China revealing very little about its secret military budget.

Chinese military officials met Pentagon officials in June and provided a very limited explanation of the process Beijing uses to support its weapons and forces.

"We're trying very hard to get an exchange of experts on the budgeting process so that we can understand how they create their budgets, since this is an area where we have a very large disagreement with them," a senior defense official said.

China is engaged in a major military buildup but will not disclose the amounts or systems it is building. The budget secrecy, among other factors, has prompted the Pentagon to start a major force buildup in the Pacific as a "hedge" against China emerging as a threat.

U.S. officials traveled to China in December to explain how U.S. budgets are created, including details such as line items for life-cycle costs of weapons systems or costs for bases.

The Chinese did not reciprocate and in June provided "a lesser level of detail" on its budget, the official said. "But at least it was the beginning of a discussion about how the two budget processes are fundamentally different," the official said.

The Chinese did not explain how much it costs them to build a Russian-designed Su-27 bomber and limited the briefing to principles they use to guide budgeting, a second official said.

China does not include its foreign arms purchases, which in recent years have included billions worth of Russian, European and Israeli weapons. It also does not include budget costs for its space program, which the military runs, or funding for numerous research institutes that make military satellites, another costly procurement item, the senior official said.

"We are right now at that very process level with them," the official said. "We don't know if they're going to be willing to engage us at the next level but we're going to try."

Chinese officials complained last year that the Pentagon exaggerated Beijing's military spending in the annual report to Congress.

The latest report states that Chinese military spending is so secret that Pentagon estimates are off by 20 percent to 180 percent of what the Chinese are actually spending.

China claims its latest annual defense budget, which has been growing by double-digit percentages over the past decade, is about $35 billion. The Pentagon estimates it is $105 billion or more.

Chinese officials insist the Pentagon is overestimating defense costs. But some Pentagon officials said the Chinese budget talks are part of a Beijing deception program aimed at minimizing the aggressive arms buildup.

Somalia war clouds

A former military specialist with close ties to the Horn of Africa tells us the situation in Somalia is getting worse after the rise of the terrorist-linked Islamic Courts Union (ICU). The ICU earlier this year took over major portions of the country and is seeking to impose Islamist rule.

DOJ_NMG_0090987

The opposition Somali government in Baidoa is said to be in danger of being defeated in the next few weeks.

The U.S. Central Command and the Special Operations Command are closely watching the country but so far have not been taking major action to prevent the creation of a new terrorist base in Somalia.

According to the former military official, there are six senior al Qaeda operatives in Somalia working with the ICU. Additionally, Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorists are in the country, also backing the ICU. Iranians are said to be in Somalia as well, eyeing a large uranium ore deposit in the south.

The government in Baidoa is being backed by thousands of Ethiopian troops now in Somalia. U.S. support should be provided, including weapons, advice and "a bit of intelligence," thesource says.

Global Strategies Group, a private security firm, this week sent a warning notice to nongovernment organizations that opposing forces in Somalia are getting ready for conflict and that "the situation is very tense."

Talks in Khartoum between faction representatives broke down yesterday, and the ICU is demanding that all Ethiopian troops leave Somalia.

"It is assessed that if conflict does erupt, it will be with little or no notice and will quickly spread to other areas," according to the notice.

Abizaid's assessment

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the man in charge of the bulk of fighting in the war on Islamic extremists, sat down with defense reporters recently to size up the conflict. A few salient points:

·"I believe that our strategy for the area can't be to control it. No nation on Earth has ever controlled the Middle East. As a matter of fact if you try to control the Middle East, you'll rapidly find out that the Middle East is going to control you."

·"We need to build capacity, local capacity, to do the institution building to make societies that are going to be more resilient against the broader extremist trends in the area. The extremism is not mainstream. In many ways we're kind of at a point where we could have been if we decided to resist Fascism in the '20s or Bolshevism in the 1900s."

·"The problem is, you know, a lot of [people] have a hard time understanding why it's to our advantage to be out there in the middle of this. And it's to our advantage so that these terrible ideological movements do not become mainstream and start moving us in a direction that can move toward World War III."

Guidebook

The Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., is putting the finishing brush work on a new counterinsurgency manual. But there is no time for rest.

It is beginning work on a more far-reaching field guide that will describe how to conduct full-spectrum operations. One change:Post-war stability operations will be woven into war plans. It's a lessons-learned from Afghanistan and Iraq, where the importance of rebuilding was driven home. A new Pentagon directive puts the chore on a par with the fighting itself.

As the Army sees it, a brigade combat team can be fighting to secure a town in one sector while other brigade soldiers are starting stability operations in a nearby town.

The doctrine is known as FM-3-0, or field manual-3, last updated in June 2001, a few months before the September 11 attacks. Chapters include "the Army and the Role of Land Power" and "Conducting Full Spectrum Operations."

China's Hu Urges Sudan To Seek Solution Over Darfur (AFP)

AFP, November 3, 2006

Chinese President Hu Jintao has praised the efforts of Sudan President Omar al-Beshir to bring peace to the troubled Darfur region and urged him to seek a proper solution to the humanitarian crisis.

"The Chinese side admires and supports Sudan in the realization of north-south peace and is willing to participate in the rebuilding," China Central Television quoted Hu as telling Beshir.

"China understands the concerns of the Sudan government on this issue, and hopes that Sudan can maintain dialogue with all sides, adjust its position and strengthen efforts to reach a proper resolution to maintain a stable situation in Darfur and continue to improve the humanitarian situation."

During the bilateral meeting at the Great Hall of the People, Beshir said the situation in Darfur was improving and that his government was seeking the help of the African Union to push forward the peace process, it said.

Beshir is one of nearly 40 African leaders visiting Beijing for a three-day China-African forum starting Friday aimed at strengthening political and economic relations between the two regions.

Darfur is a region the size of France where at least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million been left homeless since a rebellion against the Khartoum government broke out in early 2003.

The fighting pits the regime in Khartoum and allied Arab militia against Darfur's mostly black African population, which is seeking autonomy for the region.

DOJ_NMG_0090988

Beshir's government has been widely held responsible for most of the violence, while fighting between rebel and government forces in the region has intensified, cutting off humanitarian aid to hundreds of thousands of displaced civilians.

Hu's statements come as the United States looked set to pull back from its muscular approach to ending what it calls genocide in Darfur.

President George W. Bush announced a policy review this week after repeatedly failing to obtain Sudanese government compliance with a US-sponsored UN resolution demanding the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur.

"The United States is going to work with the international community to come up with a single plan on how to address this issue and save lives," Bush said Tuesday.

Beijing has abstained from votes on sending in peacekeepers to Darfur and voiced opposition to UN sanctions on Sudan, which is a key supplier of oil to China.

"We hold that the United Nations should and can play an active role in the settlement of this (Darfur) issue," China's foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao told journalists Thursday.

"But we believe that on the specific measures, the international community needs to respect the rational concerns of the Sudanese government and get the consent of the Sudanese government."

The New York-based Human Rights Watch also Thursday urged China to pressure Sudan into accepting UN peacekeepers, while criticizing Beijing for engaging African nations who are accused of gross rights violations.

"China's policies have not only propped up some of the continent's worst human rights abusers, but also weakened the leverage of others trying to promote greater respect for human rights," the group said in a statement.

China Courts Africa, Angling For Strategic Gains (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 2 — Billboards here show elephants and giraffes roaming the savanna. Traffic has been curtailed, construction sites shut down and even the sky has been tantalizingly, if temporarily, blue.

Beijing has put on its best face to court Africa, “the land of myth and miracles,” as official posters call it. Political leaders of 48 of the 53 African countries, including 40 heads of state, are to arrive this weekend for a huge diplomatic event, the China-Africa forum.

The official purposes of the three-day event are to expand trade, to allow China to secure the oil and ore it needs for its booming economy and to offer aid to help African nations improve roads, railways and schools.

The unofficial purpose is to redraw the world’s strategic map by forming tighter political ties between China, which has the world’s fastest-growing major economy, and Africa, a continent whose leaders often complain about being neglected by the United States and Europe.

“African leaders see China as a new kind of global partner that has lots of money but treats them as equals,” said Wenran Jiang, a political scientist at the University of Alberta who has studied Chinese-African ties. “Chinese leaders see Africa, in a strategic sense, as up for grabs.”

China’s enthusiasm for Africa has raised concerns among many in the West while the United States is distracted by its efforts to curb terrorism, and France, Britain and other former colonial powers exert less influence in Africa than they once did.

China does not follow the international lending standards intended to fight corruption in the region. It has embraced the leaders of Sudan and Zimbabwe, two countries that are under heavy pressure to improve their poor human rights records. Major oil companies have complained that China uses its influence to secure business opportunities for its state-owned companies.

Chinese officials say those concerns are overblown or hypocritical, and they deny that they have a grand scheme to create an exclusive sphere of influence in Africa. But China has nearly $1 trillion in foreign currency reserves, boundless entrepreneurial energy and a strong drive to compete there on its own terms.

“The Western approach of imposing its values and political system on other countries is not acceptable to China,” said Wang Hongyi, a leading specialist on Africa at the China Institute of International Studies. “We focus on mutual development, not promoting one country at the expense of another.”

China’s economic goal is to secure Africa’s abundant supplies of oil, iron ore, copper and cotton at the lowest possible prices, analysts say. Chinese companies view Africa as an open market, neglected by Western multinationals, that they can cultivate with their trademark low-priced goods.

But if the goal is mostly mercenary, not unlike European objectives in Africa 150 years ago, the method is avowedly anti-imperialist.

DOJ_NMG_0090989

The forum's slogan — "Peace, Friendship, Cooperation, Development" — underscores China's pledge not to discriminate or intervene. It even invited the five African countries — Burkina Faso, Malawi, Gambia, Swaziland and São Tomé and Príncipe — that still extend diplomatic recognition to its rival Taiwan, though none agreed to attend.

In the long term, Chinese officials say they hope not only that the overture will give their companies an edge in the competition for resources, but also that it will give their diplomats an advantage at the United Nations and other international organizations, where African countries can constitute a powerful voting bloc.

Unlike China's initial push into Africa under Mao, which aimed to support the Socialist governments of postcolonial Africa, the focus is now on commerce.

"China has offered Africa a new model that focuses on straight commercial relations and fair market prices without the ideological agenda," said Moeletsi Mbeki, a South African businessman and political analyst.

"They are not the first big foreign power to come to Africa, but they may be the first not to act as though they are some kind of patron or teacher or conqueror," he added. "In that sense, there is a meeting of the minds."

The event in Beijing, like most big political affairs in China, promises to be long on ceremony and propaganda and short on substance. President Hu Jintao is meeting a procession of heads of state.

The state media have promoted the "three 50s": 50 years of Chinese-African cooperation, 53 African countries, $50 billion in two-way trade (a projected figure for 2006). China Central Television is conducting a nationwide survey to select 10 outstanding African icons. Contenders include Cleopatra, South African diamonds and the Sahara.

Chinese diplomats hint that by the end of the meeting they will unveil a variety of trade and aid concessions. These may include a list of African goods that can enter China tariff-free, increases in aid and technical cooperation and debt forgiveness.

China's trade with Africa is growing faster than with any other region except the Middle East, increasing tenfold in the past decade, to just shy of $40 billion last year. China buys timber from the Congo Republic, iron ore from South Africa and cobalt and copper from Zambia. An estimated 80,000 Chinese expatriates live in Africa, selling shoes, televisions and everything else the world's factory produces.

More vitally, Africa has helped quench China's growing thirst for oil. Angola, which China cultivated assiduously in recent years, has edged out Saudi Arabia as China's largest foreign source of oil.

Sudan, shunned by the West for its genocidal civil war in Darfur, was a net oil importer before China arrived there in 1995. China has since invested heavily in oil extraction, helping Sudan export about $2 billion worth of crude annually, half of that to China.

Beijing's aggressive pursuit of commodities has often been accompanied by generous aid programs, low-interest loans and other gifts that some Western interests say undermine efforts to foster good governing in Africa. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have expressed their concerns that China's unrestricted lending, including a $2 billion credit line for corruption-plagued Angola, has undermined years of painstaking efforts to arrange conditional debt relief.

Some African economists complain, too, that China wants to extract raw materials for industry and then sell manufactured goods back to Africa, a mercantilist pattern that failed to bring sustained growth in the past.

China has also prompted concerns among human rights groups by using the threat of its veto in the United Nations Security Council to protect Sudan and Zimbabwe against international sanctions. The rights groups say China's arms exports to Sudan fuel the conflict in Darfur, which has claimed at least 200,000 lives and has forced more than two million people from their homes.

"China insists that it will not interfere in other countries' domestic affairs, but it also claims to be a great friend of the African people," said Sophie Richardson of Human Rights Watch. "But that doesn't square with staying silent while mass killings go on in Darfur."

For years, Chinese officials insisted that such concerns were the internal affairs of the countries involved, but they have recently changed their stance somewhat.

Zhai Jun, an assistant foreign minister responsible for African affairs, said last week that the Africa forum would address human rights and good government, and he specifically mentioned Sudan.

"The humanitarian situation in Darfur should be improved," Mr. Zhai said. "We will adopt our own method and use the upcoming summit to do our part."

Even if China does speak out on some rights issues, its basic strategy of engaging African countries on their own terms remains the core of its foreign policy.

Mr. Jiang, of the University of Alberta, said that unlike in the cold war, when China's foreign involvement was motivated by ideology, Beijing now had a commercial strategy as the developing world's biggest beneficiary of globalization to unite with the region most conspicuously left behind.

DOJ_NMG_0090990

It will be up to each country's leaders, and ultimately each country's people, to decide how to use the wealth, he said. "From China's perspective the Western powers and Western companies have had their chance in Africa and really nothing has happened," he said.

"China is trying a different approach," he added. "It is saying, 'Let us have a chance.' "

China Elevates Its Economic Profile In Africa (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, November 3, 2006

China's thirst for oil and raw materials is leading to a major expansion of its involvement in Africa. From Sudan to South Africa, Chinese officials and merchants are building roads, handing out generous aid packages and negotiating lucrative business deals.

This weekend, 48 African leaders are expected in Beijing for a China-Africa summit that will underscore the growing links between the world's fastest-growing economy and a continent that has been a globalization backwater.

What's happening in oil fields, copper mines and retail markets across Africa illustrates that China's galloping economy is spurring Beijing to adopt a higher global profile. That means new customers and aid donors for Africa's 54 nations. But it also threatens to saddle already struggling nations with the poor working conditions, fouled environment and rampant corruption that characterize China's anything-goes economy.

"China is taking a realpolitik point of view, trying to secure natural resources to continue fueling its high rates of economic growth. … For Africa, it's a mixed bag," says Todd Moss, senior fellow at the Center for Global Development in Washington.

Last year, trade between China and Africa totaled $39.8 billion, up more than one-third from the year before. Unlike the West, China applies no import fees on products from 28 African countries.

But China's rise has not been without controversy. African shop owners complain that matching the price of their new Chinese competitors is almost impossible.

In July, Zambian workers at a Chinese-owned mine rioted over arduous working conditions. Five were shot and wounded by police in the melee. Michael Sata, the opposition party candidate for president, vowed to expel Chinese traders from Zambia in the run-up to the Sept 28 balloting, which he lost.

China's involvement in Africa is driven by both oil and diplomacy. Today, imports account for 40% of China's oil consumption and are expected to reach 60% by 2020. In response, Chinese oil companies have embarked upon a global search for new supplies. In Africa, they've found them in such nations as Angola, Chad, Congo, Libya and the Central African Republic.

But the oil fields haven't come cheap, according to Zhongxiang Zhang, a senior fellow at the East-West Center in Honolulu. In January, China National Offshore Oil paid $2.27 billion for a 45% stake in a Nigerian field — $270 million more than a rival Indian bidder offered.

China regards its foreign oil deals as national security investments, so it hasn't shied from paying top dollar. Additional deals are expected. "The Chinese approach is governed by a significant amount of fear and desperation," says Joshua Kurlantzick of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, who estimates China's African oil industry investment to date at $15 billion.

On the diplomatic front, China considers African support at the United Nations vital on issues such as the status of Taiwan and human rights.

China's expansion in Africa also is complicating U.S. efforts to manage African debt relief and punish with international sanctions nations such as the Sudan, where government-backed militias are engaged in what President Bush has labeled genocide.

In 1996, state-owned China National Petroleum acquired its first stake in a Sudanese oil producer. Today, China buys about two-thirds of Sudan's oil exports and is the pariah state's major arms supplier and investor.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, also has resisted proposed sanctions on Sudan.

For African nations, China offers a commercial partner and aid donor that lacks the West's scruples on human rights or government corruption. China has granted preferential loans to 26 African countries, including countries such as Ghana and the Republic of the Congo that have been granted debt relief by the World Bank and IMF.

World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz last week criticized China's lending practices, including the fact that Chinese banks do not comply with a set of social and environmental standards endorsed by 80% of the world's commercial banks.

China isn't backing down. "The World Bank has its own ideology under Wolfowitz's leadership of emphasizing human rights (and) democracy," says Chu Shulong, a foreign policy expert at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "China does not have these conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0090991

The Asian giant also is keen to promote its state-led economy as a model for African nations that bridle at the free market gospel of the International Monetary Fund and U.S. Treasury Department.

China's unabashed commercial orientation, however, is ironic considered against its promotion of leftist revolutions in Africa during the 1960s and 1970s. Under Mao Zedong, Chinese officials also promoted socialist solidarity with the continent's post-colonial nations by dispatching doctors and engineers to work on behalf of the poor.

Today, Beijing is festooned with red banners, a major highway is being restricted for summit-goers' private use, and officials talk of a major new aid package to be unveiled this weekend.

But analysts cautioned against exaggerating China's growing role. Moss says many announcements of new deals are never implemented, adding: “There is a lot of hype around the ‘Chinese invasion.' ”

China Woos African Trade (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, November 3, 2006

BEIJING

For Chinese officials, this weekend's summit here of more than 40 African leaders is a chance to celebrate Beijing's booming economic ties with the continent.

For Western governments, though, the jamboree highlights a new and troubling source of friction with China: the Asian giant's readiness to bail out African regimes that the US and Europe are trying to pressure into improving their human rights and good governance records.

Behind the handshakes, and the giant billboards from which elephants look down on Beijing's expressways, the summit raises vexing ethical questions about China's role in the world.

In its drive to feed the booming Chinese economy's voracious appetite for oil and other raw materials, the Chinese government has not always been choosy about the African friends it has made - such as pariah regimes in Sudan and Zimbabwe.

Its indiscriminate glad-handing, though, is frustrating recent Western efforts to use trade, aid, and investment to compel certain African regimes to clean up corruption and dubious ethics.

For their part, Chinese officials say that business is business, and that it is not their job to tell others how to run their countries.

"It is never our view that a country should interfere in another country's internal affairs," Deputy Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said last week. "We've never imposed on other countries our values ... and we do not accept other countries imposing their values on us either."

That principle has guided China's dealings with the world for 50 years, points out He Wenping, head of African studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. "It has played a very positive role in developing Chinese influence," she says. "Developing countries appreciate it very much. It won't change in the near future."

China's business with Africa is exploding; trade has increased tenfold over the past decade to nearly $40 billion a year, making Beijing the continent's third largest trading partner, just behind the US and France. Chinese investment now tops $6.4 billion, largely in oil installations but also in prestige projects such as railroads in Angola and Nigeria, sports stadiums in Mali and the Central African Republic, and Africa's largest dam in Ethiopia, according to Deputy Trade Minister Wei Jianguo. China's president, prime minister and foreign minister have all visited the continent this year.

Alongside Chinese rhetoric about cooperation among developing countries sits the Asian giant's insatiable need for oil and raw materials. Angola and Sudan are China's biggest African trading partners, selling Beijing 25 percent of its oil imports. Within five years, officials here say, that share will rise to 33 percent.

Beijing secured its position in Angola with a $2 billion loan. That windfall came just in time for Angola, which is ranked 151 out of 158 nations in Transparency International's 2005 corruption ratings. Thanks to Chinese generosity, Angola managed to avoid submitting to good governance conditions that the International Monetary Fund was attaching to its financial assistance.

China's investments in Sudan's oil industry, and its payments for Sudanese oil, have also emboldened Khartoum to rebuff United Nations efforts to send an international force to Darfur, where some 200,000 people have been killed since 2003.

"Khartoum can tell the rest of the world" where to go, complains Peter Takirambudde, head of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch. "They've got the cash. China gets a nice deal and in return it undertakes to see no evil and speak no evil about human rights. That's the most dangerous trend."

Beijing insists that it has used its influence with the Khartoum government to try to convince the authorities to accept a UN force. "We are using our own channels to try to bring the parties to a more sensible position" Mr. Zhai told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0090992

Chinese analysts also say that as latecomers to international investment, Chinese state-owned and private firms have been forced to explore markets that Western firms have not already snapped up, sometimes for political reasons.

International aid donors, though, worry that China's scruple-free approach undermines their efforts to improve African governance. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz complained last week that Chinese lenders "do not respect" a set of internationally agreed principles to ensure that loans to African countries fund projects that meet high social and environmental standards, and hoped that Beijing would not follow past Western practices of propping up corrupt African dictators.

Africans themselves are beginning to complain - especially businessmen and trade unionists in countries such as South Africa, where cheap Chinese imports are undercutting local manufactured goods and threatening local firms. In Zambia, anger over poor conditions at a Chinese-owned copper mine - where a Chinese security guard shot three workers in July - colored last month's presidential election campaign.

That incident should serve as "an early warning bell for the Chinese government and companies," says Dr. He. "These economic frictions can become a political issue."

One problem, says Wang Hongyi, an analyst with the China Institute of International Studies - a think tank linked to the foreign ministry - is that "even at home it is hard to supervise private companies." Another is that Chinese companies unaccustomed to strong trade unions or environmental laws at home find them difficult to deal with abroad.

Chinese firms, however, "are judged by the same standards as other international companies that operate in Africa," says Chris Alden, an expert in African politics at the London School of Economics.

In the long term, he predicts, Chinese investors - both state and private - "will conform to the same positions as other international players because governance issues will be as much a problem for them as they are for other multinationals.

"As China becomes a card-carrying member of the group of leading states, it will move away from its policy of not attaching conditions" to its loans and investment, Dr. Alden suggests. And with Beijing's activities in Africa under increasing international scrutiny, it will be obliged to "untangle and normalize relations" as it settles down to deal with classic donor problems such as debt management and trade disputes.

As it does so, says Mr. Takirambudde, "China will have to develop relations with Africans at large, not just with the top dogs.

"In the short term they can disregard" the behavior of their African partners, he adds. "But in the long term that is not sustainable. Eventually they will be forced to take account of these issues."

Under Fire, South Africa Shakes Up Its Strategy Against AIDS (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Nov. 2 — Departing from years of indecision and, on occasion, denial, South Africa's government is considering a new and sweeping assault on an AIDS pandemic that already includes one in eight of the world's H.I.V. infections.

Every day, 1,000 South Africans are infected with H.I.V., and 800 more are killed by AIDS, the government says. With that backdrop, the deputy minister of health, Noziza Madlala-Routledge, said in an interview on Thursday that a new AIDS strategy to be announced in December might include proposals to broaden the distribution of life-saving antiretroviral drugs, remedy the shortage of health care workers and improve treatment of H.I.V.-positive pregnant women.

The new strategy will be overseen by a restructured national AIDS council charged with halving the number of new H.I.V. infections by 2011.

The issues top a list of what AIDS activists and nongovernmental experts have long called serious shortcomings in the government's AIDS program. In a striking departure from the past, government officials are drafting the plan in close consultation with those same critics, who have long been all but excluded from past considerations.

Ms. Madlala-Routledge said critics "have identified blind spots" that the government, preoccupied with building a new nation, had missed.

"We've definitely reached a turning point in our country, with civil society and government working in concert," Ms. Madlala-Routledge said. "We recognize that the campaign against AIDS needs all of us."

Experts and activists outside the government said they were heartened by the government's new approach, but would wait to see what new programs were announced and how vigorously they would be carried out.

"I don't think we're popping the Champagne corks quite yet," Jonathan Berger, who directs the AIDS Law Project at the University of the Witwatersrand, said this week. "There are still going to be, on certain key issues, quite significant differences of opinion."

The most important change, he said, may be that the two sides are now talking seriously about how to resolve those differences.

DOJ_NMG_0090993

Practically, the signal change may be that the government's lightning-rod health minister, Dr. Manto Tshabalala-Msimang, has been sidelined from day-to-day control of AIDS policy.

President Thabo Mbeki ordered the current deputy president, Phumzile Mlambo-Ngcuka, to oversee a cabinet-level review of AIDS policies in September, saying the AIDS crisis "is bigger than any individual, minister or department."

Soon afterward, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang entered a hospital for a respiratory infection, and little has been heard from her since. Her deputy, Ms. Madlala-Routledge, has taken over AIDS issues for the ministry.

To many here, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang's fall from grace is proof of democratic pressures at work. Mr. Mbeki, who once questioned the scientific link between H.I.V. and AIDS, fell silent on the issue years ago after being internationally criticized. Until now, Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang was the public face of his government's AIDS policies.

An unrelenting advocate of vitamin and nutritional defenses against H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, she has been widely derided for calling antiretrovirals "poison" and for advocating a diet heavy in garlic, beetroot and other traditional remedies to forestall AIDS. Under her tenure, the government resisted giving pregnant women drugs to reduce the transmission of H.I.V. to fetuses until it was forced by a court order.

The government has since begun mass distribution of anti-AIDS drugs at major hospitals. But the slow pace of that rollout and Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang's resistance to drug therapies have ballooned into political issues here, where one in nine South Africans — and one in four adults — is infected with H.I.V.

The discontent became evident this year within the African National Congress, the dominant political party, when Parliament's chief whip urged Mr. Mbeki to work "intimately" with AIDS activists in the interest of millions of H.I.V.-positive citizens. And it bubbled over last August at an international AIDS conference in Toronto, where South Africa's national exhibit, featuring baskets of garlic and beetroot, shocked many.

The United Nations' special envoy to Africa on AIDS, Stephen Lewis, denounced the country's AIDS policies as "worthy of a lunatic fringe" before 20,000 delegates at the conference. At the same time, 81 international scientists sent Mr. Mbeki a petition urging him to dismiss Dr. Tshabalala-Msimang.

Since the Toronto conference, AIDS activists and experts say, the government's position has undergone a sea change. Last weekend, the deputy president and the deputy health minister were the marquee speakers at a Johannesburg conference of AIDS activists and public interest groups; both called for a united assault on AIDS.

South Africa's Treatment Action Campaign, an organization of 20,000 mostly H.I.V.-positive AIDS activists, has been by far the most vocal critic of the government's programs. In an interview from Cape Town on Thursday, the group's general secretary, Sipho Mthathi, said there was now "a growing enthusiasm, across the board, around the possibility of what we can do as a country in a united fashion" to combat the pandemic.

U.N. Official Held, Accused Of Graft (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- A senior U.N. procurement officer was arraigned in federal court yesterday, accused of two counts of steering about $62 million worth of contracts to two companies in his native India.

Sanjaya Bahel, 55, was arrested in New York on Wednesday evening, and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan lifted Mr. Bahel's diplomatic immunity at the request of federal prosecutors.

Mr. Bahel is accused by the U.S. District Attorney's Office, Southern District of New York, of steering contracts to an associate at Thunderbird Industries and Telecommunications Consultants India Ltd. (TCIL), which is owned by the Indian government.

In exchange, the associate, Miami businessman Nishan Kohli, sublet to Mr. Bahel an East Side apartment at a reduced rate, prosecutors said, later selling him the condominium for so little that the transaction raised red flags in the building's board.

According to the indictment, Mr. Bahel "granted exceptional access to Kohli, providing Kohli with a line of communication and source for information within the U.N. that exceeded what U.N. vendors could typically expect to receive."

In addition, the procurement official "even canceled bids by competing companies and re-bid contracts in order to give a competitive advantage to Kohli's business interests."

Mr. Kohli was arrested Wednesday night, charged with trying to bribe or wrongly influence the U.N. official.

TCIL secured contracts worth about $50 million to sell the United Nations radio communications equipment, desktop computers, laptop computers and other items, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Thunderbird won a three-year contract worth more than $12 million to provide engineering manpower to U.N. missions, although the contract was never executed, according to the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0090994

The United Nations suspended Mr. Bahel without pay in August amid an investigation of the procurement office by U.N. auditors and an outside company, Deloitte & Touche.

In January, eight U.N. staff members were suspended in connection with the inquiry, some with pay, pending the outcome of an audit by the U.N. Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS).

Of these, four have returned to work, and two, including procurement chief Andrew Toh, are awaiting a resolution.

Mr. Bahel, who has worked with the United Nations since 2000, has drawn no pay since Aug. 31, when he was charged by the organization with misconduct.

As the chief of the commercial activities service in the U.N. Postal Administration, his most recent position, Mr. Bahel received a salary of $104,000 to $132,000 a year.

Irregularities in his contracting activities were first discovered by an independent committee looking into corruption related to the Iraq oil-for-food program. None of the contracts Mr. Bahel handled was related to the Iraq effort.

After an OIOS inquiry turned up nothing amiss, the U.N. Department of Administration and Management sought an audit by Deloitte & Touche.

That audit, which cost $3 million, relied on OIOS findings but went further to uncover irregularities in scores of contracts.

An even more detailed audit by Deloitte & Touche, which would have looked for additional irregularities or wrongdoing, was canceled after resistance from member states and some U.N. officials.

If convicted, Mr. Bahel and Mr. Kohli face up to 10 years in prison.

More U.N. Corruption (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 3, 2006

Kofi Annan has famously described the United Nations as an institution of "unique legitimacy." But when he turns over the Secretary Generalship to South Korean Ban Ki Moon two months from now, he will be leaving behind an organization whose reputation for integrity and competence has never been lower.

The latest scandal is the arrest and indictment this week of U.N. procurement official Sanjaya Bahel on bribery charges. He's accused by federal prosecutors of steering more than $50 million worth of contracts to bidders in exchange for such considerations as a cheap Manhattan apartment. And his alleged misdeeds may have compromised U.N. peacekeeping missions in places like Liberia, Congo and Kosovo, where a U.N. internal investigation says favored contractors were allowed to skimp on employee salaries and pocket the money for themselves.

Last year, Russian Alexander Yakovlev pled guilty in a case involving $1 million in bribes on $79 million in contracts. And earlier this year a U.N. internal probe concluded that more than $300 million worth of contracts may have been improperly handled, either through mismanagement or outright criminality. One person who had a cozy relationship with the U.N. procurement office, by the way, was none other than Mr. Annan's son Kojo, whose role in a firm that benefited from Iraqi Oil for Food contracts has never been fully clarified.

Which reminds us that Mr. Annan's promise of U.N. reform has also gone nowhere. Christopher Burnham, the talented American brought to the U.N. Secretariat to promote reform, is quietly returning to private life. His attempts were mostly stymied by the U.N. bureaucracy and General Assembly, not that Mr. Annan tried all that hard to move its members.

It would be nice to think we can expect better from Mr. Ban. But it is telling that the South Korean Foreign Minister helped secure his new post with blandishments and pledges of aid to some of the Security Council countries that voted on him. Judging from the record of U.N. scandal, he's right to conclude that what really talks at Turtle Bay is money.

Avoiding Calamity On The Cheap (NYT)

The New York Times, November 3, 2006

A much-anticipated study on climate change ordered up by Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain has attempted to calculate the economic costs of global warming. Though necessarily conjectural, the study warns that if we continue on our current course, atmospheric temperatures could rise four degrees or so in this century, producing a hugely disruptive mix of rising sea levels and withering droughts.

This in turn would drain the world economy of trillions of dollars, with social and economic costs on a scale “similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century.”

The study, led by Sir Nicholas Stern, former chief economist of the World Bank, says that the only way to avoid that dismal outcome is to slash worldwide emissions of carbon dioxide by investing hundreds of billions of dollars in cleaner technologies. The report has been criticized for overestimating the consequences of warming and underestimating the costs of mitigation. Still, its basic point seems unassailable: failure to act now will exact much greater penalties later on.

DOJ_NMG_0090995

Developing and deploying the necessary technologies will require a collective global effort. But the world's leading producer of greenhouse gases, the United States, is doing scandalously little. A detailed examination by The Times's Andrew Revkin pointed out that Washington spends only $3 billion a year for all energy research and development. Of this, only a fraction — $416 million, according to the Energy Department — was spent last year on climate-friendly, renewable technologies like wind, solar power, cellulosic ethanol and hydrogen. By contrast, Washington spends $28 billion on medical research and $75 billion on military research.

The administration claims that it is in fact doing more, especially if various tax incentives for cleaner fuels like ethanol are included in the mix. Even so, in an age when people are worried not only about warming but also about the country's growing dependence on imported oil, the federal effort on alternative energy sources is pathetically small.

The Bush administration's lack of commitment to research might not be quite so lamentable if it had been prodding the private sector into investing in cleaner energy. Private capital is not likely to emerge in big enough quantities unless a significant cost is attached to carbon emissions — either in the form of a carbon tax or a mandatory cap on emissions. But the administration has refused to ask Congress to impose either.

Since the dawn of the industrial revolution, the atmosphere has served as a free dumping ground for carbon gases. If people and industries are made to pay heavily for the privilege, they will inevitably be driven to develop cleaner fuels, cars and factories. Most of the industrialized world has accepted the need for either carbon taxes or strict regulation, and Europe has already imposed a cap on emissions from its cars and factories.

Mr. Bush and many in Congress remain steadfastly opposed — still convinced, it appears, that calamity can be avoided on the cheap.

DOJ_NMG_0090996

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 06, 2006 1:10 PM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, November 06, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061106.pdf; dojclips061106.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News

Ex-Indiana Man Locked Up With Nation's Worst In Lockdown (INDYSTAR) 3
Federal Authorities Detain 16 Travelers At Houston Airport (HC) 4
Inside Politics (WT) 5
GOP Rep. Faults White House On Iraq Site (AP-Y) 6
Documents: To Saddam, From Mars (NSWK) 7
Trailers, Secrets And Los Alamos (NSWK) 7
Breached Lab Data Mostly Low-level (LAT) 8

Homeland Response

Did Bank Stop A Fraud Or Terrorist? (PHI) 9
Bank Customer Stirs Terror Probe (PHDN) 9
Heinz Field Arrests Spur Terror Response (PPG) 10
A Former Top Justice Department Lawyer Defends The Post-9/11 Decisions He Helped Make. (WP) 11

War News

Soldiers In Iraq Say Pullout Would Have Devastating Results (WP) 13
And Now, Back To The War (WP) 14
The Case For Dividing Iraq (TIME) 15
Looking For Light In Iraq (USNEWS) 19
Whose Idea Was This? (TIME) 19
Iraq: A New Enemy Emerges—'The Shiite Zarqawi' (NSWK) 20
Two Texans In Trouble (USNEWS) 21
Stuck In The '60s (USNEWS) 21
U.S.-Style Campaigning At The U.N. (WP) 22
The Long, Cost-Free War (NYT) 23
Is Pakistan An Ally? (LAT) 25

DOJ

Enron Prosecutor Lands At Latham (LAW) 26

Criminal Law

Inside Bomber Row (TIME) 26
Menino Looks To Replicate Gang Truce (BOS) 30
FBI Numbers Suggest Manchester Safer Than Most Cities Its Size (NHUL) 31
Electronic Monitoring Now Includes Sweat Sniffers, Screeching Black Boxes (USAT) 32
Alexander Lockup Fails Children, Report Asserts (ARDEM) ..32
Secret Jury To Hear Gang Case Summary (WT) 34
Case Could Change Rules About Officers' Searches Of Laptops (SDUT) 34
Laptop Seizure Raises Concerns Over Firms' Data (LAT) 35
Lab Delays Hinder Crime-solving (MHCA) 37

Civil Law

A Powerful Voice In Patent Disputes (WP) 39
Judge To Rule On Hughes Estate Claims (USAT) 40

Civil Rights

State GOP: Missing Voting Machine Cards In Memphis Could Be Used Fraudulently (AP) 42
IPod Friendly Program Will Monitor Election Complaints (LAWJW) 42
A New Breed Of Watchdog For Election Day By JUNE KRONHOLZ (WSJ) 42
Eastern Kentucky School District Facing Civil Rights Inquiry (AP) 44

Antitrust

Morgan Stanley And Visa Settle Dispute (FT) 45
CVS's Deal Maker Faces Toughest Test Integrating Caremark (WSJ) 45
Regulators Clear Google's YouTube Deal (WSJ) 47

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS

Report: Feds Refusing FBI Terror Cases (AP) 47
Justice Dept. Disputes Report On Terror Cases (USAT) 48
FBI Willing To Go Undercover In Congress If Necessary (MCT) 49
Probe Hits Jefferson In Wallet (NOTP) 50
2 Prison Guards Found Guilty (ORS/AP) 52

FBI May Use Billboards In Art Hunt (BOS) 53
FBI Leader In Boston Gets Post In D.C. (BOS) 53
Shooting Victim Was Undercover (WT) 54
California 'Pot Docs' Put Selves At Risk (USAT/AP) 55
Carlyle-Clarke Pleads Guilty To Drug Conspiracy (MR) 56
S. Texas Law Enforcement Seeks Drug Incinerator (HC/AP) 57
Guilty Plea In Murder For Hire Case (HC) 59

Immigration

Texas Starts Internet Border Watch (AP) 59
Web Cameras Will Focus Eyes Of Texas On Border (FWST) 60
A closely watched immigration fight (USNEWS) 61
Border Agents Seek New Trial (WT) 62
Drones to patrol mexican border (WT) 62
After The Amnesty: 20 Years Later (CSM) 63

Congress-Administration

Bush Hails Verdict As Milestone For Iraq (AP-Y) 67
Campaigning Bush Seizes On Saddam Verdict (AFP-Y) 69
Hussein Sentence Could Heighten Rifts In Iraq (WSJ) 70
Bush Applauds Hussein Verdict (WP) 71
Bush Trumpets Hussein Verdict To Rally Support (NYT) 72
Saddam Ordered To Hang For '82 Massacre (WT/AP) 74
Saddam Hussein Death Sentence A Milestone (CSM) 75
Saddam Verdict Is Met With Mixed Reactions In Iraq (LAT) 77
Iraqis Consider The Impact Of Verdict (USAT) 79
Hussein Sentenced To Death By Hanging (WP) 80
Hussein To Die By Hanging (CHIT) 82
Hussein Is Sentenced To Death By Hanging (NYT) 84
In A Divided Iraq, Reaction To Saddam Death Sentence Conforms To Sectarian Lines (NYT) 87
Reactions To Verdict Reflect Shifts In Iraqis' Fortunes (WP) 88
Saddam Hussein Sentenced To Hang (FT) 90
Mideast Expected The Verdict But Doubts Whether It's Fair (NYT) 91
World Opinion Divided On Saddam Sentence (AP) 92
Analysis: Verdict May Not Stop Violence (AP) 93
Hussein Trial Was Flawed But Reasonably Fair, And Verdict Was Justified, Legal Experts Say (NYT) 94
Saddam Sentenced To Death By Hanging (MCT) 96
Iraqis' Emotions Flow After Verdict (USAT) 98
King Sneer (WP) 98
The Saddam Hussein Verdict (NYT) 99
Criminal Against Humanity (WSJ) 100
Verdict For Saddam Hussein (WP) 101
Justice For Saddam (WSJ) 102
Cheney: Vote Will Not Deflect Us In Iraq (FT) 103
Win, Lose Or Draw, Bush Faces Unfamiliar Terrain (NYT) 103
Parties Crank Up Voter Turnout Efforts (WP) 105
All Signs Point To A US House Run By Democrats (CSM) 107
Hopes Run Low For Republicans (FT) 108
Poll Finds U.S. Sentiment Similar To '94 (USAT) 109
Parties Pour 11th-hour Cash Into Close Races (USAT) 110
National Issues, Led By Iraq, Dominate Final Appeals In Congressional Campaigns (NYT) 111
Bitter Campaign Boils Down To Party Turnout (WT) 115
Campaigns Implore The Party Faithful To Bring Their Loyalty To The Polls (WP) 117
Two Parties Far Apart In Turnout Tactics Too (LAT) 118
In Campaigns' Last Hours, A Get-out-the-vote Contest (CSM) 120
The Green Card (WSJ) 122
Democrats Focus On Pennsylvania (WT) 122
For Republicans (USAT) 123
For Democrats (USAT) 124
Limiting The Damage (NYT) 125
'It Didn't Have To Be That Way' (WSJ) 126
Hastert May Face Post-Election Unrest (WP) 128
Senate Control In Play, Polls Find (USAT) 130
How The Senate Could Turn Blue (CHIST) 131
Sen. Dole Says Dems Content To Lose War (USAT) 132
Candidates Making Final Push To Break Out (WP) 132
Protectionist Stance Is Gaining Clout (WSJ) 135
Politics Gone Mild For Investors The Prospect Of Shift In Congress Doesn't Carry Much Of A Threat; Popular Theory: 'Gridlock Is Good' By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ) 137
As Drug Prices Climb, Democrats Find Fault With Medicare Plan (NYT) 138

Other News

Noted With Horror (WP) 140
US Joblessness Ebbs To Rare Historical Low (CSM) 140
The Fed's Confession (WSJ) 142
Once Safe, Public Pensions Are Now Facing Cuts (NYT) 143
Houston Missed The Real-Estate Boom Of East And West Coasts, But Now It's Payback Time (WSJ) 145
A Program That Works (WT) 146
Don't Abort Precedence (LAT) 147
College Sports Get A Warning (NYT) 148
Iran Says It's Open To Talks With U.S. (AP) 148
Iran Would Consider New US Request For Iraq Talks (AFP) 150
Russia Asks Europe To Revise Its Plan For Iran Sanctions (AFP-Y) 150
Behind China's Stance On North Korea (WSJ) 151

DOJ_NMG_0090999

U.S. Discusses N. Korea In Japan (WT/AP).....153
Little Lost Ones (WSJ).....154
Israel Vows To Hit Gaza Until Rockets Subside (NYT).....155
Israel Vows To Press Gaza Offensive (AP).....156
Syria Hints At Resistance Vs. Israel (AP).....157

Editorial Wrap-Up

Protecting The Right To Vote (NYT).....157

TERRORISM NEWS

Ex-Indiana Man Locked Up With Nation's Worst In Lockdown (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, November 6, 2006

The Indiana truck driver found guilty of conspiring to betray the United States has been secluded in a Colorado super-maximum-security prison under a secret order approved by the U.S. attorney general.

Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on the few conversations he's allowed to have, heavily restricts his access to news reports and prohibits anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him.

Some inmates at the prison, which houses the federal government's worst of the worst, spend at least 23 hours a day in soundproof cells. They cannot speak to or make eye contact with other inmates.

These "special administrative measures," also called "SAMs orders," are meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security.

William Dazey Jr., one of Shaaban's public defenders at the trial this year, said the special order is an unusual step. "I have not seen evidence that would support the notion Mr. Hafed is a threat to the United States," Dazey said.

Shaaban, who also is known as Shaaban S. Hafed, acted as his own attorney at trial, but outside of the courtroom his standby defense lawyers described him as an international con man. They said he offered Saddam Hussein's government "a lot of hot air." Prosecutors could not prove Shaaban actually had access to U.S. secrets.

At Shaaban's sentencing, U.S. District Judge John Tinder recommended placing Shaaban in a federal prison at Terre Haute, closer to his wife and young son in Greenfield.

But the judge had no control over Shaaban's placement nor any say in the secret administrative order quieting him. Assistant U.S. Attorney Sharon Jackson requested the restrictions, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales personally initialed the order.

The Justice Department declined to comment on the order, and the local FBI office referred calls about it to Jackson, who could not be reached. First Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Morrison, who helped try the case, declined to say how Shaaban's prison communications could threaten national security.

About 40 federal inmates, most of them convicted terrorists, are facing nearly identical restrictions, according to the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Shaaban was stripped of his U.S. citizenship after being found guilty in January of six federal charges, including illegally acting as an agent of the Iraqi government before the U.S. invasion there in 2003.

He was sentenced to 13 years, four months in prison after an 11-day Indianapolis trial in which prosecutors portrayed him as a clever spy who had offered to sell the names of more than 60 clandestine CIA operatives to Iraqi intelligence officials for millions. Shaaban said in secretly taped interviews he planned to use the money to launch a pro-Arab broadcast station in the U.S.

To impose special administrative measures, the attorney general has to certify a "substantial risk" exists that an inmate's communications could result in death or serious bodily injury to others.

DOJ_NMG_0091000

The regulation states the inmate must be notified of the restrictions and the justification. However, Shaaban received an order that laid out the conditions of his incarceration with the reasons behind it blacked out.

Among possible reasons for the order, court observers say:

A jury found Shaaban guilty of threatening his brother with death by decapitation to keep him from testifying. But federal prosecutors produced no evidence he could deliver on the threat or initiate violent acts while behind bars.

While the prosecutors he mocked at trial could not prove Shaaban had access to any government secrets before his arrest, he received access to U.S. intelligence files while he represented himself at trial.

Many of the inmates under such severe restrictions are unsympathetic figures. But there are critics who question the necessity -- and the psychological effects -- of limiting virtually all contact with the outside world for years at a time.

"You're cut off. It's not a whole lot different from being at Guantanamo Bay," the U.S. naval base where the U.S. military is holding people it labels "enemy combatants," said Khurrum Wahid, an attorney with offices in New York and Miami who defends terror suspects.

"A lot of this is show. It's playing to people's fears about terrorism."

Other federal convicts subject to "SAMs orders" include well-known inmates serving life sentences:

Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the blind Egyptian cleric who conspired to blow up New York landmarks, including the World Trade Center, which his followers bombed in 1993.

Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Richard Reid, who tried in 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe to blow up an American Airlines flight bound for Miami as the plane flew over the Atlantic Ocean.

Abdel-Rahman is in a special prison for inmates with medical problems. Moussaoui and Reid are with Shaaban at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex, a prison campus in Colorado about 90 miles south of Denver.

The complex is home to the federal system's only super-maximum-security prison, known in some circles as the "Alcatraz of the Rockies." Security cameras in the most secure areas monitor inmates around the clock. Some never leave their cells because they are subject to body-cavity searches when they do.

Shaaban joined other notorious inmates when he arrived at the prison in August. They include Oklahoma City bombing participant Terry Nichols, "Unabomber" Theodore Kaczynski and former FBI agent and Soviet spy Robert Hanssen.

Shaaban himself protested the restrictions during a phone interview in June from the Marion County Jail. "They treat me like Moussaoui -- worse than Moussaoui," he said. "It's a prison in a prison."

The jail was not enforcing the order. Now that the Bureau of Prisons is restricting his calls, Shaaban's wife, Hanan, is trying to find an attorney who can help challenge the order, said David Dana, the Northwestern University law professor in Illinois handling Shaaban's appeal of his convictions and sentence.

That will be an uphill battle. Published reports show the Justice Department is increasingly using the orders as a tool to incapacitate certain inmates. And federal rulings show judges are reluctant to buck government claims that such steps are necessary to protect American lives.

Federal Authorities Detain 16 Travelers At Houston Airport (HC)

By Armando Villafranca

Houston Chronicle, November 4, 2006

Data submitted by the passengers don't match files

Federal authorities delayed the departure Friday of 16 international travelers, including 15 Mexican nationals, who were boarding a Mexico City-bound plane at Houston's Bush Intercontinental Airport.

A U.S. Customs and Border Protection official said data submitted by the passengers did not match the data on file when they entered the United States.

Under a law that went into effect in June 2005, passenger manifest information for all international inbound and outbound flights must match. Passengers are detained when the exit data, such as passport numbers, do not match those submitted when entering the country.

"The post-9/11 Congress passed a law mandating this manifest information for inbound and outbound flights," said Kelly Klundt, CBP spokeswoman in Washington.

She said Congress passed the law to reconcile exit data with entry data for all international passengers.

The law was part of legislation that led to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security in 2003 and included new requirements to tighten security at airports and along U.S. borders.

Klundt declined to say what information was missing or did not match when the 16 passengers tried to board the 9 a.m. Continental flight.

She could not comment on how frequently this occurs. The problem was discovered during a random check of passenger manifests.

All 16 were allowed to board later flights. No information was available about the passengers or how or when they entered the country initially.

Dave Messing, Continental spokesman, said the airline was unaware of any discrepancy until it was notified by CBP officials. He said the data are submitted to the carrier at the ticket counter and any error is uncovered by CBP officials monitoring international travel.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Senate polls

The latest Rasmussen Reports poll on the Senate race in Tennessee shows Republican Bob Corker with a 53 percent to 45 percent lead over Democrat Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.

The survey of 500 likely voters, conducted Thursday, has a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points.

That result tipped the Tennessee race from "tossup" to "leans Republican" in Rasmussen's "Senate Balance of Power" analysis, which shows 45 Democrat seats, four "lean Democrat," 48 Republican and one "lean Republican" seats. Control of the Senate, according to Rasmussen, now depends largely on two remaining "tossup" seats in Missouri and Virginia.

The latest Rasmussen poll in Missouri has Republican Sen. Jim Talent with a 48 percent to 46 percent lead over Democrat Claire McCaskill. In Virginia, Rasmussen shows Republican Sen. George Allen narrowly leading Democrat James H. Webb Jr., 49 percent to 48 percent.

Spelling contest

"In the 22nd District of Texas -- Tom DeLay's old district -- workers for Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula Gibbs are handing out pamphlets that warn" in screaming all-capital letters, "don't let Nick Lampson and his liberal Democrat allies take away your choice this election," Byron York writes at National Review Online (www.nationalreview.com).

"The handout lays out instructions for writing in Gibbs' name, plus the urgent directive [also in all-caps] 'Remember on Tuesday November 7, vote for Shelley Sekula Gibbs for U.S. representative twice!'

"The twice! part refers to the fact that, to fully support Sekula Gibbs, people who want to vote for her have to first vote for her to finish out the last couple of months of DeLay's term -- she's on the ballot for that -- and then write in her name to vote for her to be the next full-term congressperson from the district," Mr. York said.

"That's where things get complicated. The phrase 'write-in' is not entirely accurate in this race. In most of the precincts in the 22nd District, voters won't write anything. Instead, they will work on a machine -- called the Hart InterCivic Voting System -- in which they will be required to turn a wheel to select letters on a screen."

Mr. York explained that to vote for Mrs. Sekula Gibbs, voters will have to spell the name correctly, including hitting "space" between all three names and "enter" after every character including the spaces.

"It does not take a prophet to see that there will likely be some irregular entries from people trying to vote for Sekula Gibbs. If the race is close, there will be intense fights over every variation of her name entered into the Hart InterCivic system.

"What will be accepted as a legitimate vote and what won't? Texas law says only that 'A vote on an office or measure shall be counted if the voter's intent is clearly ascertainable ... .' What that will mean in practice is not entirely clear. It seems likely that obvious misspellings of Sekula Gibbs's name will count, as will short versions like 'S Gibbs.' On the other hand, in a close contest, Republicans and Democrats might end up fighting over every vote."

DOJ_NMG_0091002

Connecting dots

"So, less than a week before the midterm elections, four workers from Acorn, the liberal activist group that has registered millions of voters, have been indicted by a federal grand jury for submitting false voter-registration forms to the Kansas City, Missouri, election board. But hey, who needs voter-ID laws?" the Wall Street Journal said in an editorial.

"We wish this were an aberration, but allegations of fraud have tainted Acorn voter drives across the country. Acorn workers have been convicted in Wisconsin and Colorado, and investigations are still under way in Ohio, Tennessee and Pennsylvania," the newspaper said.

Acorn is the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now.

"The good news for anyone who cares about voter integrity is that the Justice Department finally seems poised to connect these dots, instead of dismissing such revelations as the work of a few yahoos. After the federal indictments were handed up in Kansas City this week, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement that 'This national investigation is very much ongoing,' " the editorial continued.

"Let's hope so. Acorn officials bill themselves as nonpartisan community organizers merely interested in giving a voice to minorities and the poor. In reality, Acorn is a union-backed, multimillion-dollar outfit that uses intimidation and other tactics to push for higher minimum-wage mandates and to trash Wal-Mart and other non-union companies."

Home-grown nuke?

Two leading U.S. nuclear scientists say a team of terrorists with industrial equipment, physics and engineering skills and access to highly enriched uranium could build a crude atomic weapon in the United States for less than $10 million.

Writing in Foreign Policy, the prestigious journal of the Carnegie Endowment, Peter Zimmerman and Jeffrey Lewis add that there is no evidence that al Qaeda or any other terrorist group currently possesses the technical expertise necessary to complete such an effort.

Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden "perhaps has yet to find his Robert Oppenheimer," they conclude, referring to the scientist who led the World War II Manhattan Project to build the atomic bomb.

The article follows revelations that U.S. intelligence agencies posted on the Web documents from ousted Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein's nuclear-weapons program that include detailed charts, diagrams, equations and lengthy passages about technical challenges.

But some analysts told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that they were deeply skeptical of the Foreign Policy article.

Arms-control specialist Milton Leitenberg of the University of Maryland called the scenario "super-optimistic," and said the authors had glossed over the difficulty of finding the kinds of highly qualified specialists the project would need.

"How does that kind of organization find those kinds of people, in the real world?" he asked.

Kerry's dream

"Many months ago, I penned a column asking John Kerry to go away, or at least back to the U.S. Senate to pursue elder statesmanship instead of further national political ambition," John Brummett writes in the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

"Alas, he has not done so," Mr. Brummett said. "So, the Democrats must try to win the midterm elections while carrying Big John on their backs as they endeavor to extract his big foot from his big mouth. I'm not sure they have either the strength or dexterity.

"Apparently Kerry carries the notion that Hillary Clinton won't run for president or can't win and that Barack Obama's bright flame will flicker. Apparently he carries the notion that -- Evan Bayh, John Edwards, Wes Clark and Bill Richardson aside -- he would then naturally ascend to carry his party's banner again. ... The problem is that there usually are sound reasons a politician loses an election. It's probably that he's not a good candidate. That was, and remains, Kerry's problem."

GOP Rep. Faults White House On Iraq Site (AP-Y)

AP, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091003

House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra criticized the Bush administration on Sunday for its handling of a trove of once-secret documents from Saddam Hussein's covert nuclear program disclosed on a federal Web site.

Hoekstra, R-Mich., complained the U.S. intelligence community hadn't properly declassified the documents.

"Well, you know, we have a process in place. It looks like they screwed up," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

President Bush's director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, ordered the documents posted on the site last March, at the request of Republicans in Congress who wanted to show Saddam was a real threat.

Scientists at a federal lab raised concerns that the site, as a repository for millions of pages the U.S. government found in Iraq the past 15 years, held sensitive nuclear information. Negroponte abruptly shut the site down Thursday night after The New York Times contacted his office for an article published Friday.

His office began reviewing the consequences, including who accessed the documents. Four Democratic senators demanded he also tell them why and how the site began, what role members of Congress played and whether the administration ignored U.S. intelligence officials' concerns.

"How valuable that information was, I really don't know," Hoekstra said. "Now we release — or they inadvertently release some of these documents and they show that the Iraqi program may be much further along than anybody ever anticipated."

Hoekstra said his committee would review the documents to determine the former Iraqi leader's goals and capabilities before the war in 2003.

Documents: To Saddam, From Mars (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - National Intelligence Director John Negroponte shut down a government Web site after the disclosure that it had posted nuclear-research documents from Iraq's pre-Gulf War I weapons program. Set up in March at the insistence of congressional GOPers, the site was designed to post documents seized by the U.S. military in Iraq. But many were trivial memos and oddball letters: a telephone-repair request from an Iraqi military agency, copies of the 1987 Baghdad phone book, an Islamic Web-site article claiming the United States was developing weapons designed to sexually arouse soldiers, a 2001 letter to Saddam Hussein from a woman seeking money to preserve the planet "Iquestra" (she described herself as a commander of the Martians).

Why were taxpayer dollars spent on such a project? Late last year House intel-committee chair Pete Hoekstra and Senate intel chair Pat Roberts pressed Negroponte's office to make the Iraqi docs available. They and others, including The Weekly Standard magazine, said the material might show Saddam did have WMD or ties to Al Qaeda. So the Defense Intelligence Agency began to review 48,000 boxes of material, located in a U.S. military warehouse in Doha, Qatar, and started posting it on an Operation Iraqi Freedom Web site. DIA spokesman Don Black said several hundred analysts, linguists, translators and contractors took part, weeding out diplomatically sensitive docs or those mentioning the names of U.S. persons (a potential violation of the U.S. Privacy Act).

Outside of a few conservative bloggers, the Web site got little attention until The New York Times revealed last week that the site had posted documents showing diagrams and drawings from Iraq's early-'90s nuclear program that might be useful to those seeking to develop a bomb. Negroponte closed the site. Meanwhile, Black admits no docs have turned up altering the postwar intel view that Saddam had no WMD and no working relationship with Al Qaeda at the time of the 2003 U.S. invasion.

Trailers, Secrets And Los Alamos (NSWK)

By John Barry And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - It began as a routine police call. At 4:16 p.m. on Oct. 17, two Los Alamos County police officers were dispatched to the Royal Crest Trailer Park. The cluster of mobile homes is located next to Los Alamos National Laboratory, the sprawling New Mexico compound that houses one of America's two main facilities for designing nuclear weapons. A resident had complained that two neighbors were shouting at each other and throwing rocks through the windows of their trailer. The cops expected to find the usual: a domestic dispute that had gotten out of hand. Instead, they discovered what one Los Alamos official—who, like all lab and government sources in this story, would not be named talking about sensitive matters—calls "potentially the greatest breach of national security" in decades.

DOJ_NMG_0091004

When the police entered the trailer, they found 20-year-old Justin Stone and his girlfriend. Stone said he was a guest of the trailer's owner, 23-year-old Jessica Quintana, who wasn't there at the time. Stone was wanted on a probation violation from an earlier crime. So the police arrested him. When they later got a search warrant, the cops found what appeared to be the makings of a crude personal crystal-meth lab. (Stone later pleaded no contest to possession of drug paraphernalia.) Among the dozens of items they hauled away were three computer thumb drives—the small storage devices that plug into a USB port and can hold hundreds of megabytes of data.

The police plugged the memory sticks into their computers. They found more than 400 pages of classified documents downloaded from Los Alamos computers, some containing sensitive data on nuclear-weapons design. A quick check revealed that Quintana had until recently been employed by a contractor at Los Alamos. A file clerk who worked in the lab's document-storage vaults, her job was to scan aging paper documents into a modern digital format. The police called the FBI, which discovered another cache of nuclear documents: 456 paper pages, many stamped SECRET—RESTRICTED DATA.

Quintana has not been arrested or charged with any crime. Her lawyer, Steven Aarons, told NEWSWEEK that she took all the material home one afternoon in early August because she was under deadline pressure to create an index of what she had digitized. When she was finished, Aarons says, Quintana intended to destroy the material. "She wanted to take it to a shredder ... She never did so."

Recently, a series of humiliating security failures—vanishing computer hard drives, unauthorized downloads of secret data—have tarnished the lab's once vaunted reputation. Those lapses were supposed to have been fixed. Panicked officials are now trying to determine how a low-level clerk was able to walk out of a high-security facility with hundreds of pages of nuclear secrets.

The brief answer: laxness and budget cuts. Though she had completed only one semester of college, in early 2005 Quintana was granted what the nuke world calls a "Q clearance," which meant she had access to nuclear-weapons designs. She had further access to a category of information code named Sigma 15. This meant she could handle material detailing how to override the security locks on U.S. nuclear weapons. The vaults she worked in contained data from 50 years of nuclear tests.

Multiple layers of security supposedly protect such sensitive material. The lab's hard drives are locked in cages to keep someone from plugging in, say, a thumb drive. To prevent temptation, clerks are supposed to work with a partner.

But those protections seem utterly to have failed. Aarons says that Quintana had a partner, but the company she worked for saved money by having them work separately. Quintana was able to insert the thumb drive she kept on her key chain into a caged computer because, Aarons says, the cages were never locked. Though employees were supposedly subject to searches, Quintana went home with the documents in her briefcase. Los Alamos officials, while declining to comment on specifics, issued a written statement saying, "The Laboratory is treating this matter with utmost seriousness."

National-security officials will likely spend months investigating and putting new procedures in place. They are fairly certain that everything Quintana took has been recovered. Meantime, lab employees are getting a taste of what it's like to work in a secure environment. The lab has barred workers from bringing in all manner of devices—no cell phones, no coffeemakers and certainly no thumb drives. Not that they would be of much use. The computers' USB ports have now been sealed up with glue.

Breached Lab Data Mostly Low-level (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 4, 2006

Los Alamos National Laboratory said that the classified documents discovered at a trailer park during a drug investigation last month did not include the most highly sensitive nuclear weapons information.

The lab, which designs nuclear weapons, said a "careful and comprehensive analysis" of three electronic memory devices and paper copies of classified documents found in a residential trailer showed that they were mostly low-level secrets that are 20 to 30 years old. It said none of the materials involved the most sensitive weapons information.

The FBI is continuing a criminal investigation into a lab employee who owned the trailer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE

Did Bank Stop A Fraud Or Terrorist? (PHI)

By Mari A. Schaefer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 6, 2006

Upper Darby police don't know what kind of crime they have on their hands.

It could be identity theft.

It could be money laundering.

Or, it could be terrorism.

On Wednesday morning, two men withdrew $8,700 from an account under the name of Shahid Batti at the Commerce Bank on Garrett Road. When they returned later in the day to withdraw an additional $9,700, bank officials became suspicious, denied the transaction and contacted police.

The two men were stopped by Upper Darby officers after leaving the bank. One man produced a passport from Pakistan, a New Jersey license and a Social Security card, all under the name of Batti - and all fraudulent, according to police.

"We have a lot of red flags," Police Superintendent Michael J. Chitwood said yesterday.

He said the man was arrested and charged with theft, receiving stolen property, forgery and other crimes.

The second man, who was acting as a driver, was released and not charged.

During questioning, the man who carried the identification and credit and bank cards identified himself as Raza Hussain from Brooklyn, N.Y. Chitwood said he is no longer cooperating with his officers.

During their investigation, Chitwood said police discovered a "possible" connection between Hussain and a terrorist with the same birthday when they ran the names through the FBI Terrorism Screening Center. He said the FBI and the New York Police Department have been contacted.

"We don't know who he is, where he is and if such a person exists," Chitwood said of Batti. He said the address on the bank account was for Batti Trading in the 6400 block of Market Street, which was a vacant building.

An address for Batti in the 100 block of 54th Street was "locked up tight," Chitwood said.

Bank Customer Stirs Terror Probe (PHDN)

By Simone Weichselbaum

Philadelphia Daily News, November 6, 2006

Something about the chubby middle-aged man didn't sit right with eagle-eyed employees at the Commerce Bank in Drexel Hill on Wednesday.

The customer called himself Shahid Batti and pulled out a New Jersey driver's license, a Social Security card and a Pakistani passport, all printed with his given name.

But bank employees thought the identifications looked fake - and it was the second time in just a few hours that the man wanted to withdraw thousands of dollars from the Batti account.

So the bank called the cops, and officers whisked the man off for questioning.

Last night, Upper Darby police were trying to come to grips with a strange case - one that quickly became twisted with post-9/11 suspicions.

As of yesterday, Upper Darby Superintendent Michael Chitwood said his investigators believe that the man with the Shahid Batti ID cards is Raza Hussain, 44, from Brooklyn.

While local and FBI officials sort out the man's real identity and his motives for living as Shahid Batti, the Commerce Bank customer is sitting in a Delaware County jail cell and has not posted the $100,000 bail, Chitwood said.

Hussain - if that indeed is his real name - is charged with theft, forgery, identity theft and related crimes. Police aren't even sure if Hussain and Batti are different people or the same man.

"There are a lot of red flags here," Chitwood said. "We don't know if we have an identity-theft issue; we don't know if we have a money-laundering issue, or a terrorist connection."

DOJ_NMG_0091006

The man known as Shahid Batti owns Batti Trading LLC, which is connected to two addresses, records show. Chitwood said the defunct business was housed in a now-vacant shop on Market Street near Sellers Avenue in Upper Darby.

Batti's New Jersey driver'slicense photo shows a clean-shaven man with a receding hairline. It does not resemble Hussain's mugshot, which features a burly man with a thick black moustache and a full head of hair.

A woman named Stacey, who declined to give her last name, lives next door to Batti's 54th Street address. She said the moustached man has owned the rowhouse for about six years, was rarely there, and has always been known as Shahid Batti to her.

His home looks like a mosque, with Islamic characters lining the walls, she said.

On Wednesday at about 2:40 p.m. the case broke.

A Commerce Bank employee called police to report a "Pakistani male attempting to withdraw $9,700... from an account under the same of Shahid Batti," court records said.

Earlier that day, "the defendant withdrew $8,700" from the Batti account, records stated.

The man's request of $9,700 was denied because "of the differing photographs on the defendant's photographic IDs," records said.

Also, the Pakistani passport's insert covers "had been glued down with a different cover. The binding and stiching had been disassembled and appeared to have a new insert glued on," according to case records.

The Social Security card "was observed to have the seal of the 'Dept. Health and Human Services,' and not the legitimate seal of the Social Security Administration," records said. And the N.J. license did not appear to have the "normal hologram."

Cops found the man calling himself Batti and his driver, Zafar Mian, in a car and took them back to the police station. Batti told investigators that his real name was Raza Hussain, born Jan. 1, 1962, and that he lived in Brooklyn.

After that admission, Hussain stopped talking with police, Chitwood said. His driver was let go.

Police then alerted the FBI and checked whether Hussain's was on the nationwide terrorism list. Upper Darby police also contacted the New York Police Department's counter-terrorism bureau to learn more about Hussain's Brooklyn address, Chitwood said.

But FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Hussain "is not on the FBI terrorist-watch list, and has no known ties to terrorists. The Philadelphia FBI will continute their investigation to determine his true identity."

Heinz Field Arrests Spur Terror Response (PPG)

By Gary Rotstein And Nate Guidry, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 6, 2006

CMU students tried to enter stadium in middle of night; bond set at $1 million

Two Carnegie Mellon University students caught trying to sneak into Heinz Field in the middle of the night -- purportedly to film a music video -- prompted an anti-terrorist response that included pumped-up security at yesterday's Steelers game against the Broncos.

The two young men were being held last night in the Allegheny County Jail on $1 million straight bond each.

Although explosives-sniffing canines found nothing of interest around the football stadium, an affidavit said the dogs registered two separate "positive hits for explosives" in the Lexus sport utility vehicle the men were driving.

What might have fallen under the prank category in pre-9/11 days was treated as anything but that by authorities, who conducted full searches of the students' apartments and heightened security throughout the afternoon around the stadium on the North Shore.

"We take everything seriously, especially in today's light," Pittsburgh Police Chief Nate Harper said at a morning news conference, while the suspects were still being questioned by agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Force.

Arrested outside Heinz Field around 2 a.m. yesterday were Sudeep Paul, 21, of Woodbury, N.Y., and Anand Shankar Durvasula, 20, of Morgan Hill, Calif. Chief Harper said they are U.S.-born. Both were charged with criminal conspiracy, and Mr. Durvasula with criminal trespass. The $1 million straight bond has to be paid in full for release.

DOJ_NMG_0091007

Heinz Field security officers spotted the men on a security camera trying to enter the stadium, a Steelers spokesman said. They first opened an exterior door at Gate B without going inside, police said. They then took a folding chair to the fence at Gate 5 on Art Rooney Drive, and Mr. Durvasula allegedly stepped up on the chair to scale the fence.

Heinz Field security officers then approached the pair, and as they tried to walk away, they were apprehended by Pittsburgh police officers who had been summoned. They told police initially they were trying to check out the stadium because they had tickets to yesterday's 4:15 p.m. game against the Denver Broncos, Chief Harper said.

He said they told investigators later that Mr. Paul was trying to complete a music video featuring Mr. Durvasula, and they intended to do the last scene inside Heinz Field. A video camera and tripod were found inside the vehicle, parked nearby, which police towed away.

The affidavit said the vehicle was registered to Paul Swapan Kumar, 41, of Woodbury, N.Y., but it could have meant Kumar Paul, as police initially referred to Sudeep Paul as Paul Sudeep.

"We don't know exactly what their intentions were," Chief Harper said. But, he said, it was unwise for them to attempt to break into the stadium at about 2 a.m. There was no evidence the men had been drinking, he said.

Kumar Paul, who was unaware of the son's troubles, said he gave his son the Lexus.

"He's such a good kid," said Mr. Paul. "He's a bright student and an honor student."

Last month, a Wisconsin man was charged with making a terrorist threat over the Internet for threatening that radioactive "dirty bombs" would be detonated at seven football stadiums.

The nature of yesterday's incident led to extra precautions surrounding the Steelers-Broncos game, which was played without incident. Chief Harper said the quick response that resulted in the men being detained showed that security arrangements "are very well up to speed," and not something to worry the public.

"We have taken steps to make sure Heinz Field is secure," Chief Harper said. "We have brought in extra canine dogs from Lawrence, Mercer and Beaver counties to conduct a sweep of the facility. ... We have brought in additional officers as well as state police, county police and the FBI."

Steelers spokesman Dave Lockett said fans attending the game were to receive the same kind of pat-downs from security staff as is customary for all games. He said it was the first such incident he was aware of at Heinz Field, and fans should still feel safe in attending.

"The only thing that needs to be said was that the security system worked in getting things done quickly," Mr. Lockett said.

Police described the two men as cooperative throughout, agreeing to a police search of their off-campus residences in Squirrel Hill.

A Carnegie Mellon spokeswoman declined comment on the incident, other than to confirm both men are seniors at the school, with Mr. Paul a business student and Mr. Durvasula in the humanities and social sciences program.

University-related Web sites suggest that both men have been active, involved students. Mr. Paul is listed as activities director of the Undergraduate Finance Association, and Mr. Durvasula as a committee chairman of the Undergraduate Entrepreneurship Association. Both also were involved in Carnegie Mellon's Mock Trial competition, a program in which students take on judicial roles to practice their speaking and analytical skills.

Mr. Paul, on his own Web home page, lists his grade point average as 3.7 out of 4.0. He made the dean's list last spring.

A Former Top Justice Department Lawyer Defends The Post-9/11 Decisions He Helped Make. (WP)

By Geoffrey R. Stone

The Washington Post, November 5, 2006

WAR BY OTHER MEANS

An Insider's Account of the War on Terror

By John Yoo

Atlantic Monthly. 292 pp. $24

DOJ_NMG_0091008

You should read this book, though not for the reasons the author intends. John Yoo is a law professor who served in the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice from 2001 to 2003. In that capacity, he participated -- often quite centrally -- in the key post-9/11 legal decisions that framed the Bush administration's war on terror, including the Patriot Act, the National Security Agency surveillance program and administration positions on torture, military tribunals and the treatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

In War by Other Means , Yoo delivers on his subtitle. This is indeed "an insider's account of the war on terror." He sets an ambitious goal for himself: "to explain the choices that the Bush administration made after 9/11," choices made "under one of the most dire challenges our nation has ever faced." Yoo is mild-mannered, but he is angry, and his anger pervades this work. He attacks the media, human rights advocates, legal academics, civil libertarians, former attorney general John Ashcroft, the Supreme Court, conservative pundit George F. Will, librarians and even the Bush administration (among others) for cowardice, self-aggrandizement, overreaching, ignorance, dishonesty and cupidity.

At its core, War by Other Means offers spirited, detailed and often enlightening accounts of the decision-making process behind the key 2001-03 legal decisions. Yoo feels compelled to justify them because the Bush administration itself has "often failed to explain clearly to the public the difficult decisions al Qaeda has forced upon us." In some instances, Yoo mounts a persuasive defense of the administration's policies. His account of the Patriot Act, for example, convincingly demonstrates that it was not nearly as draconian as its critics charged and that perhaps "the worst thing about it is its Orwellian name."

Most illuminating about War by Other Means , however, are the arguments that unnerve rather than persuade. Yoo's defense of the administration's decisions about torture, surveillance, detention and due process will send a chill down the spine of anyone committed to the preservation of civil liberties and the separation of powers. Yoo asserts that Bush administration officials acted in good faith, but his reasoning reveals that they frequently acted with bad judgment.

Did you know, for example, that Congress cannot constitutionally restrict the president's authority as commander-in-chief to spy on the American people -- but that it can constitutionally eliminate such surveillance "by cutting off all funds for it"? Or that the commander-in-chief has the unqualified authority to decide "who to detain and how to detain them"? Or that the federal law prohibiting torture forbids the infliction of pain only if it is "equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying . . . death, organ failure, or serious impairment of bodily functions"? Or that the Justice Department's withdrawal of that definition after the revelation of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib changed nothing? Or that the president in any event has the unqualified authority to use torture? Talk about Orwellian.

Yoo's characterization of many policies is little short of bizarre. He maintains, for example, that Abu Ghraib, the Aug. 2002 "torture memo" (which gave CIA interrogators sweeping legal blessings) and the NSA surveillance program are not really objectionable because the people can always vote the president out of office if they disapprove of his decisions -- without noting that the president attempted to keep these matters secret from the American people. He characterizes the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which expressly prohibits the president from engaging in foreign intelligence surveillance without a warrant, as offering "the executive branch a deal": If the president obtains a warrant, the surveillance will be deemed reasonable; if he orders surveillance without a warrant, "he takes his chances." I don't think so. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act flatly declared it unlawful for the president to engage in electronic surveillance without satisfying the act's requirements. It no more offered the president a "deal" than our drug laws offer pushers a deal: Don't sell drugs, and you won't go to jail; sell drugs, and you "take your chances."

The fundamental precept that drives Yoo's conclusions is his unyielding belief that in wartime, the president -- as commander-in-chief -- is exclusively in charge. Detention, surveillance and torture must all be within the president's unilateral control. Congress and the Supreme Court must defer to the president's judgment.

This is an extreme, reckless and dangerous view. That it has shaped the policies of our government is nothing short of irresponsible. Even U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner, no slouch when it comes to advocating the aggressive use of government power to combat terrorism, has charged that Yoo's "extravagant interpretation of presidential authority . . . confuses commanding the armed forces with exercising dictatorial control" of the sort exercised by "a Hitler or a Stalin."

DOJ_NMG_0091009

In his own way, Yoo has done Americans a great service. Not only has he offered useful insights into the reasoning of the Bush administration, but he has exposed that reasoning to the harsh light of day. His conception of our Constitution -- and that of the Bush administration -- must be resoundingly repudiated by Congress, the courts and the American people. Â·

Geoffrey R. Stone is a professor of law at the University of Chicago and the author of "Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime," now out in paperback.

WAR NEWS

Soldiers In Iraq Say Pullout Would Have Devastating Results (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

FORWARD OPERATING BASE SYKES, Iraq, Nov. 5 -- For the U.S. troops fighting in Iraq, the war is alternately violent and hopeful, sometimes very hot and sometimes very cold. It is dusty and muddy, calm and chaotic, deafeningly loud and eerily quiet.

The one thing the war is not, however, is finished, dozens of soldiers across the country said in interviews. And leaving Iraq now would have devastating consequences, they said.

With a potentially historic U.S. midterm election on Tuesday and the war in Iraq a major issue at the polls, many soldiers said the United States should not abandon its effort here. Such a move, enlisted soldiers and officers said, would set Iraq on a path to civil war, give new life to the insurgency and create the possibility of a failed state after nearly four years of fighting to implant democracy.

"Take us out of that vacuum -- and it's on the edge now -- and boom, it would become a free-for-all," said Lt. Col. Mark Suich, who commands the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment just south of Baghdad. "It would be a raw contention for power. That would be the bloodiest piece of this war."

The soldiers declined to discuss the political jousting back home, but they expressed support for the Bush administration's approach to the war, which they described as sticking with a tumultuous situation to give Iraq a chance to stand on its own.

Leading Democrats have argued for a timeline to bring U.S. troops home, because obvious progress has been elusive, especially in Baghdad, and even some Republican lawmakers have recently called for a change in strategy. But soldiers criticized the idea of a precipitate withdrawal, largely because they believe their hard work would go for naught.

Capt. Jim Modlin, 26, of Oceanport, N.J., said he thought the situation in Iraq had improved between his deployment in 2003 and his return this year as a liaison officer to Iraqi security forces with the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based here on FOB Sykes outside Tall Afar. Modlin described himself as more liberal than conservative and said he had already cast his absentee ballot in Texas. He said he believed that U.S. elected officials would lead the military in the right direction, regardless of what happens Tuesday.

"Pulling out now would be as bad or worse than going forward with no changes," Modlin said. "Sectarian violence would be rampant, democracy would cease to exist, and the rule of law would be decimated. It's not 'stay the course,' and it's not 'cut and run' or other political catchphrases. There are people's lives here. There are so many different dynamics that go on here that a simple solution just isn't possible."

Soldiers and officers had difficulty conveying what victory in Iraq would look like or exactly how to achieve it. In some ways, victory is a moving target, they said, one that relies heavily on the Iraqi people gaining trust in the Iraqi security forces and the ability of the Iraqi government to support essential services. In northern Iraq, officials said they expect to hand over major parts of the country to Iraqi forces within the next five months, but most agree that Baghdad will be far behind.

Even if top commanders meet their goal of transferring authority to the Iraqi army within the next 18 months, a U.S. presence long after that is likely, several officers said.

"This is a worthwhile endeavor," said Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, commander of Multinational Division North and the 25th Infantry Division. "Nothing that is worthwhile is usually easy, and we need to give this more time for it to all come together. We all want to come home, but we have a significant investment here, and we need to give the Iraqi army and the Iraqi people a chance to succeed."

DOJ_NMG_0091010

Numerous soldiers expressed frustration with the nature of the fight, which many said amounted to driving around and waiting for the enemy to engage them, often with roadside bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs.

"It's frustrating, because it's hard to get into the fight," said Staff Sgt. Robert Wyper, 26, of Riverside, Calif., a squad leader with Bravo Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Infantry Regiment. Wyper rides around the Mosul area in a Stryker armored vehicle. He has fired a total of four rounds from his weapon since he arrived in August, while several other soldiers said they had never pulled their trigger during their deployments. "The combat we have is on the enemy's terms," Wyper said. "You can shoot at the enemy, but how do you shoot at an IED?"

First Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., is on his eighth deployment to a foreign battlefield since a tour in Somalia, and his third tour in Iraq.

"The insurgents are more strategic this time, they're smarter," he said. "We're trying to anticipate their next move, and they're trying to anticipate ours. There's still a lot to do."

In Rushdi Mullah, a small farming village near Baghdad, Capt. Chris Vitale, 29, of Washington, Pa., said his unit's recent moves to the edge of this insurgent safe haven have made a major difference for residents. "If my unit left town, the insurgents would come back in and use it to stage attacks on Baghdad," he said. "I'm sure of it."

In the north, where Iraqi army and police units have made strides toward controlling their own territory, U.S. soldiers said they were at a critical point in helping the Iraqi forces develop.

Capt. Mike Lingenfelter, 32, of Panhandle, Tex., said that U.S. troops have earned the trust of residents in Tall Afar over the past couple of years and that leaving now would send the wrong message. His Comanche Troop of the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment is working with Iraqi forces to give them control of the city.

"We'll pull their feet out from under them if we leave," Lingenfelter said.

"It's still fragile enough now that if the coalition were to leave, it would embolden the insurgents. A lot of people have put their trust and faith in us to see it to the end. It would be an extreme betrayal for us to leave."

Sgt. Jonathan Kirkendall, 23, of Falls City, Neb., said he fears that many Americans think that building the country to viability will be "quick and easy," when he believes it could take many years. Kirkendall, of the 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division in Baghdad, is on his third deployment to Iraq and celebrated his 21st and 23rd birthdays here.

"If they say leave in six months, we'll leave in six months. If they say six years, it's six years," said Kirkendall, who is awaiting the birth of his first daughter, due next week.

"I'm just an average soldier, and I'll do what they tell me to do. I'm proud to be a part of it, either way it goes, but I'd like to see it through."

And Now, Back To The War (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq. The nation will face an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out. It should begin by considering the leading authorities on civil wars -- Oxford's Paul Collier, Stanford's James Fearon and Barbara Walter of the University of California at San Diego -- even if their thoughts are dispiriting.

The academics' first point is that civil wars last longer than interstate wars. The average civil war since 1945 has lasted 10 years, and the median (or typical) one has lasted seven years. If we date the start of Iraq's civil war in 2004 or 2005, we probably have at least another five years of fighting.

If you believe that the United States can stick it out that long, you must consider what it would achieve by doing so. In three out of four cases since 1945, civil wars have ended when one side has crushed the other. If the United States were prepared to use its troops to force the victory of Shiites or Sunnis, perhaps it could hasten the war's end. But neither side makes for a palatable ally.

DOJ_NMG_0091011

The United States could stay in Iraq in the hope that it may be one of the unusual civil wars that ends with a political compromise. This is possible, but the academics do not believe it to be likely. In his analysis of 50-plus civil wars, Collier finds that sectarian conflicts such as Iraq's are harder to end than ideological conflicts such as El Salvador's. Meanwhile Fearon emphasizes that wars in which each side is splintered are less susceptible to negotiated conclusions, because you can't trust the other side to stick to a deal if the other side consists of multiple uncoordinated death squads. Both Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq are divided among competing militias.

Moreover, wars that end in negotiation tend to do so only after the combatants have fought to a standstill. Iraq seems a long way from that: Leaders on both sides appear to believe that, once the Americans are out of the way, they can get what they want by fighting. It may be that neither side will give up this belief until it has been tested. This leads Fearon to the view that U.S. withdrawal is a precondition for the military test that in turn is a precondition for peace.

If Fearon is right, remaining in Iraq actually prolongs the carnage. But even if he is wrong, it's not clear that remaining in Iraq is justified. In the past three months, 241 U.S. troops have died; another five years implies the death of 4,820 Americans, more than were killed in the terrorist attacks of 2001. Meanwhile the U.S. involvement in Iraq distracts from other pressing foreign policy problems. The price of staying in Iraq is high, while the gains are uncertain.

But it is also true that leaving Iraq could prove extremely costly. Fearon expects that withdrawal is likely to accelerate the conflict, unleashing an even more intense campaign of ethnic cleansing of civilians. So if the United States did decide to leave Iraq, it should signal its intentions clearly and give civilians time to sort themselves into ethnically homogenous groups, protected by their respective militias. Leaving Iraq could also embolden U.S. enemies, though the spectacle of the United States bogged down in Iraq might arguably embolden them more. Withdrawal might also allow Iran to establish control over its neighbor, though Iran might find Iraq almost as difficult to control as the United States has.

But the strongest argument against withdrawal is that it might not be permanent. As civil wars progress, they undergo a change: In the first stage people fight because they believe they can win, but in the second stage they fight because there is no mechanism to make a peace deal credible. In a conventional interstate war, each side can retreat to the safety of its own territory and keep its army as a guarantee. But in a civil war combatants are expected to surrender their weapons, even though these are the only things that stop the other guys from massacring civilians. This prisoner's dilemma explains why civil wars tend to be prolonged. It also explains why, when they do approach their end, outsiders are often necessary to put a final stop to them.

So when Iraq's combatants fight themselves to stalemate, some coalition of external powers may have to enforce a peace, and the United States would probably be part of such an effort. Whether it's worth staying in Iraq in the meantime -- and if so, with what level of troop strength -- is going to be the unavoidable debate of the post-election season.

The Case For Dividing Iraq (TIME)

By Peter W. Galbraith

Time, November 6, 2006

Iraq is broken.

Iraq's national-unity government is not united and does not govern. Iraqi security forces, the centerpiece of the U.S.'s efforts for stability, are ineffective or, even worse, combatants in the country's escalating civil war. President George W. Bush says the U.S.'s goal is a unified and democratic Iraq, but we have no way to get there. As Americans search for answers, there is one obvious alternative: split Iraq into separate Kurdish, Sunni and Shi'ite states.

The case for the partition of Iraq is straightforward: It has already happened. The Kurds, a non-Arab people who live in the country's north, enjoy the independence they long dreamed about. The Iraqi flag does not fly in Kurdistan, which has a democratically elected government and its own army. In southern Iraq, Shi'ite religious parties have carved out theocratic fiefdoms, using militias that now number in the tens of thousands to enforce an Iranian-style Islamic rule. To the west, Iraq's Sunni provinces have become chaotic no-go zones, with Islamic insurgents controlling Anbar province while Baathists and Islamic radicals operate barely below the surface in Salahaddin and Nineveh. And Baghdad, the heart of Iraq, is now partitioned between the Shi'ite east and the Sunni west. The Mahdi Army, the most radical of the Shi'ite militias, controls almost all the Shi'ite neighborhoods, and al-Qaeda has a large role in Sunni areas. Once a melting pot, Baghdad has become the front line of Iraq's Sunni-Shi'ite war, which is claiming at least 100 lives every day.

DOJ_NMG_0091012

Most Iraqis do not want civil war. But they have rejected the idea of a unified Iraq. In the December 2005 national elections, Shi'ites voted overwhelmingly for Shi'ite religious parties, Sunni Arabs for Sunni religious or nationalist parties, and the Kurds for Kurdish nationalist parties. Fewer than 10% of Iraq's Arabs crossed sectarian lines. The Kurds voted 98.7% for independence in a nonbinding referendum.

Iraq's new constitution, approved by 80% of Iraq's voters, is a road map to partition. The constitution allows Iraq's three main groups to establish powerful regions, each with its own government, substantial control over the oil resources in its territory and even its own regional army. Regional law supersedes federal law on almost all matters. The central government is so powerless that, under the constitution, it cannot even impose a tax.

American leaders seem to be in denial about these facts. President Bush continually asserts that the Iraqi people have voted for unity, while Condoleezza Rice once told me how impressed she was by the commitment of the Iraqi Kurds to building a new Iraq. James A. Baker III, co-chairman of a congressionally mandated commission tasked with formulating new policy options, has ruled out the idea of dividing Iraq. The most prominent American politician to endorse anything resembling partition is Senator Joseph Biden, who, along with former Council on Foreign Relations president Leslie Gelb, proposes dividing Iraq into three regions while maintaining a "central government in charge of common interests."

U.S. officials are now asking that Iraqis agree to a program of national reconciliation, changes in the constitution to protect Sunni interests, and an oil law that would share revenues equitably. It's instructive that this initiative aimed at unifying Iraq comes from Americans and not the country's elected leaders. A U.S. effort to put Iraq back together would involve endless micromanagement of Iraqi affairs and an open-ended presence of large numbers of U.S. troops. Breaking up Iraq, on the other hand, could provide an exit strategy for U.S. troops, mitigate the worst effects of civil war and give all Iraqis a greater stake in shaping their future. Few Americans imagined that 3 1/2 years after "liberating" Iraq, the U.S. would be presiding over the country's demise. But in a war in which there have never been good options, partition is the best we have left.

Iraq has never been a voluntary union of its peoples. Winston Churchill, as Britain's Colonial Secretary, created Iraq from the wreckage of the Ottoman Empire in 1921, installing a Sunni Arab King to rule over the Shi'ite majority and a rebellious Kurdish minority. Churchill later described Iraq's forced unity as one of his biggest mistakes. In 2003 the U.S. not only unseated the last and most brutal of Iraq's tyrants but also destroyed the institutions--notably the army and the Baath Party--that held Iraq together. The sectarian slaughter that followed the Feb. 22 bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque in Samarra accelerated Iraq's disintegration.

Nonetheless, the U.S. continues to cling to the illusion of Iraqi unity. President Bush's hopes for success in Iraq depend on two pillars: Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national-unity government and the establishment of security forces that are trusted and respected by all Iraqis. But both are shams. Al-Maliki leads a religious Shi'ite coalition that includes parties that operate the death squads that kill scores of Sunnis each day. While he says illegal militias should be disbanded, he has vigorously resisted every U.S. operation against them. The Sunnis in Iraq's government are, if anything, even more extreme. Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the Speaker of the Council of Representatives and Iraq's highest-ranking Sunni, has been closely associated with Ansar al-Islam, an al-Qaeda-linked terrorist group that has targeted Shi'ites and secular Iraqis. He has blamed Iraq's problems on the Jews and has said statues should be erected to those who kill American troops. President Bush has lavishly praised both al-Mashhadani and al-Maliki, but flattery has not produced statesmanship. The real problem is that they reflect the views of their respective communities, which voted overwhelmingly for them.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials speak of Iraq's army and police as if they were neutral guarantors of public safety. Iraqis see them for what they are: Shi'ites or Sunnis who are active combatants in Iraq's civil war. Shi'ite police units have kidnapped, tortured and executed thousands of Sunnis since the Samarra bombing. Sunni policemen are often insurgents or sympathizers. The army, while marginally better than the police, is divided along sectarian lines and is largely ineffective. Whole battalions do not show up for combat duties they don't like. It is not possible to build a national army or police force when there is no nation to begin with.

So what can be done? The most realistic option is for the U.S. to abandon the idea of creating a new, united Iraq and instead allow the country to break apart, enabling each of the country's three groups to choose its own government and provide for its own security. It is possible that Sunni and Shi'ite regions would remain together in a loose confederation, but Kurdistan's full independence is almost certainly a matter of time.

DOJ_NMG_0091013

Partition is an Iraqi solution. The U.S. could help make it go more smoothly, but it mostly needs to get out of the way. The Kurds already have their region. Last month Iraq's parliament approved a law to allow the Shi'ites to merge Iraq's nine southern provinces into a single state. The one group that resists dividing Iraq is the Sunnis, some out of nostalgia for the days when they ran the country and others because they reject all that has happened since Saddam's overthrow. But with the Kurds and Shi'ites having their regions, partition becomes an accomplished fact. It is hard to see any alternative for the Sunnis except to do the same.

In fact, the Sunnis may have the most to gain from partition. The Sunni insurgency feeds on popular hostility not just to the Americans but to a Shi'ite-dominated Iraqi government. Most Sunnis don't support al-Qaeda and its imitators, but they often prefer them to Iraqi security forces, which are seen as complicit in the killings of Sunnis. If the Sunnis were to establish their own region, they could have an army and provide for their own security. Since Iraq's known oil fields are in the Shi'ite south and the Kurdish north, the Sunnis do have reason to fear being stuck in the middle with no resources of their own. So, for partition to work, the Kurds and Shi'ites would have to guarantee the Sunnis a proportionate share of Iraq's oil revenues for a period of time, as they have already agreed to do. Over the long term, exploration for oil in the largely unexplored Sunni areas provides the region its best prospect for revenues.

We should have no illusions: partitioning Iraq would not be easy. Some groups would resist bloodily. But the adverse consequences of partition have already occurred. There's no reason to believe that formalizing Iraq's breakup would make anything worse--in fact, it might even help contain the violence. It's useful to outline the three main arguments raised against partition and explain why none are as convincing as their proponents portray them to be:

The sectarian bloodbath will get worse. Iraq's Sunni-Shi'ite civil war has already claimed tens of thousands of lives and forced Sunnis and Shi'ites to abandon coexistence. This is tragic and certainly not what most Iraqi Shi'ites or Sunnis want. But once under way, civil wars tend to empower the most extreme elements. Civil wars do not end because the parties get tired of fighting. Rather, they end because of outside intervention or, more often, because one side wins. Partition will not stop the sectarian cleansing in mixed areas, but by giving Shi'ites and Sunnis their own regions, it can avoid an outcome in which Iraq's more numerous Shi'ites completely crush the Sunnis.

Iran will dominate the Shi'ite south. Iran's Iraqi allies already dominate Shi'ite southern Iraq. If the U.S. were serious about countering Iran's influence, U.S. troops would have to forcefully disarm the Shi'ite militias and dismantle the southern theocracies. But this would mean taking on a whole new enemy in Iraq and also require committing more troops. The Bush Administration has no intention of doing either. Right now, Iran's allies control both the central government in Baghdad and the south. Partition would limit Iran's influence to the southern half of Iraq.

A divided Iraq will be destabilizing to Iraq's neighbors. Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbors all fear the destabilizing consequences of partition. But they fear an Iran-dominated Iraq even more. Turkey, Iraq's other powerful neighbor, has a population that includes at least 14 million Turkish Kurds. The Turkish nightmare has been the emergence of an independent Kurdistan in Iraq. But now that it is actually happening, Turkey has responded pragmatically: it is by far the largest source of investment in Iraqi Kurdistan and has cultivated close relations with its leaders. As Turkey's more sophisticated strategic thinkers understand, Turkey and an independent Kurdistan have a lot in common. Both are secular, pro-Western, democratic and non-Arab. Not only will Kurdistan depend on Turkey economically, but it can serve as a useful buffer to an Iran-dominated Islamic Iraq.

For many Americans, the biggest appeal of partition is that it makes possible a relatively rapid U.S. exit from much of Iraq. If U.S. goals no longer include preserving national unity or establishing Western-style democracy, there is no need for U.S. troops in the Shi'ite south or Baghdad. We would leave behind a civil war and an Iran-dominated south, but that outcome would be no different if we were to stay with the current force levels and mission. One overriding interest in Iraq, however, is still achievable: that Iraq's Sunni areas not become a base from which al-Qaeda and its allies might attack the West. With the security that comes from having their own region, the Sunnis might deal more effectively with the terrorist threat, since continuing violence would prevent economic progress in the Sunni areas. While local leaders are now unwilling to fight the most radical elements of the insurgency when the beneficiary is Iraq's Shi'ites, they may be more willing to do so when it benefits them.

DOJ_NMG_0091014

The U.S. will still need an insurance policy against the threat of al-Qaeda in western Iraq. This could be accomplished by deploying a small force to Kurdistan, from which the U.S. could readily move back into the adjacent Sunni areas if necessary to disrupt al-Qaeda operations. This force would discharge a moral debt to the Kurds who fought on our side and could help consolidate democracy in the one part of Iraq that turned out as we hoped.

American administrations are instinctively committed to existing lines on the map. But not all breakups are a disaster. Although President Bush's father tried to hold the Soviet Union together, few mourned its ultimate demise. Trying to put back together Iraq, a state that has brought nonstop misery to most of its people for its entire 80-year history and is not desired by a substantial part of its citizens, will only bring about more pain and blood for Americans and Iraqis. If the country's people are to be saved, the only choice is to end Iraq. [This article contains maps and diagrams. Please see hardcopy of magazine.] THE GREAT DIVIDE

Iraq is checkered by different religions and ethnicities, its history marked by forced relocations and bloody conflict. The current Sunni-Shi'ite war has once again changed the demographic map of Iraq, leading some to call for the country to be split into three states. But carving up Iraq could displace millions, provoke struggles for the control of territory and make the bloodshed even worse. Shi'ite Arabs 60% Sunni Arabs 20% Kurds 17% Others 3%

Area by ethnic and religious groups

Kurd Sh'ite Arab Sunni Arab Shi'ite/Sunni-Arab mix Sunni Arab/Kurd mix Sunni Turkoman Christian Mixed area Sparsely populated Population density

0 10 1,000 100,000 Per sq. mi. (2.6 sq km) 5 miles 5 km BAGHDAD AIRPORT RASHEED AIR BASE SADR CITY ADHAMIYA WASHASH MANSUR Green Zone Tigris River IRAQ Turkey â€¢ Neighboring Turkey worries that an Iraqi Kurdistan would incite its Kurdish population and that access to the area's oil would be lost. Along with Iran and Syria, Turkey might be tempted to exploit internal Kurdish divisions Baghdad With Sunni and Shi'ite living cheek by jowl, partition could lead to widespread sectarian cleansing and more violence for its 6 million residents

Kurdistan â€¢ The Kurdish-dominated north already enjoys wide autonomy and relative peace, but Kurds want oil-rich Kirkuk to be part of an independent Kurdistan--something the country's Arabs fiercely oppose

Central Iraq â€¢ Iraq's Sunni Arabs have resisted partition. With no significant oil fields and thus no real oil revenues, Sunnis might try to fight for oil-rich areas like Baghdad, Kirkuk and Mosul

Southern Iraq â€¢ The Shi'ite-dominated south would probably form a government based on Islamic law and modeled on Iran's. It has the lion's share of the country's oil resources Oil Supergiant oil field (5 billion bbl. in reserve) Other oil field Pipeline

60 miles 60 km

DAHUK NINEVEH ARBIL SULAYMANIYAH TA'MIM NAJAF WASIT DIYALA MUTHANNA SALAHADDIN ANBAR QADISYAH KARBALA BABIL MAYSAN DHIQAR BASRA Kirkuk Mosul Arbil Nasiriyah Baqubah Najaf Sulaymaniyah Karbala Hillah Samarra Diwaniyah Fallujah Ramadi Tikrit Tall 'Afar Kut Samawah Faisaliya Basra Amarah

Tigris River Euphrates River

SAUDI ARABIA IRAN SYRIA TURKEY JORDAN KUWAIT

BEFORE IT WAS IRAQ

â€¢ Under Ottoman rule Until WW I, Iraq was a region divided into three provinces (vilayets), with Shi'ite Basra in the south, Baghdad in the center and a largely Kurdish Mosul in the north OTTOMAN EMPIRE Persia Syrian Desert Vilayet of Mosul Vilayet of Baghdad Vilayet of Basra British controlled

â€¢ Under British rule In the postwar division of Ottoman territory, the provinces came under British control, forming the borders for Iraq. It was granted independence in 1932

Persia Turkey Protectorate of Kuwait British mandate of Iraq French mandate of Syria

OIL RICHES Total known oil reserves by province Oil reserves in millions of bbl. 65,810 10,000 1,000 100

Sources: Brookings Institution Iraq Index; GlobalSecurity.org HealingIraq.blogspot.com Iraq Revenue Watch; NASA; DigitalGlobe; LandScan/UT-Battelle TIME Map by Kathleen Adams and Joe Lertola

Peter W. Galbraith, a former U.S. ambassador to Croatia who has advised the Kurds on constitutional issues, is the author of The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End

DOJ_NMG_0091015

Looking For Light In Iraq (USNEWS)

By Linda Robinson

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

Samir Sumaidaie, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, is under no illusions about the difficulty of achieving peace in his country. His deputy chief of mission has lost three nephews to the violence engulfing the country-two of them killed by Shiite militia members when they went to a Baghdad hospital to retrieve wounded neighbors, the third by Sunni insurgents while visiting a cemetery to mourn one of the dead. "Extremists have a way of finding reasons to continue fighting," says the gray-haired engineer, who was ambassador to the United Nations before coming to Washington last April. But he has not lost hope.

Obscured by the reports of spiraling violence and the latest contretemps between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. officials is the surprising fact that the Iraqi government itself has laid out a timeline for dealing with the most contentious issues tearing the country apart. Achieving a timeline is not the same thing as reaching substantive agreement on solutions, but it may provide the kickstart for a last-ditch attempt to avoid fullblown civil war-and if deadlines matter, it is a measuring stick of the Iraqis' own making.

"Outlaws." Two months ago, the Political Council for National Security-which includes the prime minister, the president and vice presidents, the head of parliament, and their deputies-agreed on 15 items to be accomplished between September 2006 and March 2007, ending with a referendum on constitutional amendments. The timetable has already slipped by a month, but they have made progress on two key items: The parliament passed a foreign investment law last month and is debating legislation on how the oil industry will be run and profits divided among the Shiite, Sunni, and Kurdish populations. Sumaidaie expects the measure to pass this month. The next item is revising the de-Baathification process that drove many former regime bureaucrats and soldiers into the insurgency rather than offering them incentives to support the new government.

By all accounts, the toughest items on the agenda are those slated for December, when a law offering amnesty to Sunni and Baathist insurgents and demobilizing militias is supposed to be passed. A U.S. defense intelligence official with long experience in Iraq seriously doubts whether Iraq's Shiite-majority government will offer a genuine olive branch to Sunni insurgents, whom it deeply mistrusts, or defang the Shiite militias that, to many senior Iraqi officials, are the clearest means for ensuring Shiite dominance over Iraq. He points to the fate of Iraq's 8th Division general who dared to confront the powerful Shiite militia of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in the city of Diwaniya: A Sadr official was appointed to investigate him. And, the U.S. official warns, "Without really reaching out to the former regime members who are in Damascus supplying guidance to the insurgency groups and having a real amnesty ... this is not going anywhere."

Maliki, says Sumaidaie, wants to pursue a "holistic" approach against the militias, which are made up of criminals, political figures, and unemployed youths, a strategy "based on peeling all these layers off one at a time." He cites Sadr's recent public denunciation of specific "outlaw" militia leaders as "an important step toward breaking the problem up into manageable chunks." Ultimately, Sumaidaie says, "the question must be put to Moqtada [al-]Sadr, 'What kind of Iraq do you want ... a divided country ruled by warlords [or] a thriving country?'"

Whose Idea Was This? (TIME)

By Adam Zagaorin

Time, November 6, 2006

In a war effort marred by poor planning and misjudgments of the local scene, this move just about took the cake. Someone in the U.S. military thought it was a good idea to send Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler convicted of abusing detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, back to serve again in Iraq. What's more, his unit's job was to help train Iraqi police, a curious assignment for a military policeman caught in photographs distributed worldwide doing just the sort of thing peace officers should never do.

Cardona knew it was a terrible idea. Shortly before he left Fort Bragg, N.C., for the Middle East, he told a close friend and family members that he was returning against his wishes but felt dutybound to accept the deployment. The friend said Cardona described trying to attach another soldier's name tags to his uniform in hopes of concealing his identity from Iraqis but was told by a superior to desist. According to this friend, Cardona said he had told at least one of his superiors that he feared for his safety in Iraq. Cardona's name can be referenced almost instantly on the Internet, and his photo appears in at least one al-Qaeda propaganda video.

DOJ_NMG_0091016

Still, it was not until TIME.com reported last week that Cardona was on his way to Iraq that the military reconsidered his posting. The morning after the story broke, the Pentagon said in a statement that Cardona's movement into Iraq from a staging area in Kuwait had been "stopped." Hours later, it said he would return to Fort Bragg immediately.

By reversing course, the Army stanched the p.r. damage, but some harm had already been done. On hearing the news that Cardona was in Kuwait awaiting transfer to Iraq, Maryam al-Rais, a member of the Iraqi parliament, lamented, "This is just the latest in a long list of insults to Iraqi dignity by the Americans." A Western official in Baghdad said he had received several angry calls from Iraqi political figures expressing "cold fury" at what they interpreted as American arrogance and insensitivity. The timing of Cardona's return could not have been worse. Anti-American sentiment is at an all-time high; opinion polls show that most Iraqis, regardless of sect or ethnicity, want the U.S. forces out. The Abu Ghraib scandal still resonates strongly among Iraqis. Those who resent the U.S. presence never tire of using it as a flogging horse. Even today, statements and videos issued by insurgent groups and jihadi organizations routinely cite Abu Ghraib as proof of the U.S.'s malign intentions in Iraq. Even America's allies in Iraq often bring up the scandal as proof of how little the U.S. understands the country. Many Iraqis will admit that their own security forces treat prisoners at least as badly, but they point out that their government doesn't lecture the world about human rights. The punishment meted out to Americans found guilty of atrocities at Abu Ghraib, Iraqis complain, was too lenient.

Cardona, who served as a dog handler at Abu Ghraib in 2003 and '04, was convicted this past May of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault, the equivalent of a felony in the U.S. civilian justice system. The prosecution demanded prison time, but a military judge instead imposed a fine and reduction in rank. Though Cardona was not put behind bars, he was required to serve 90 days of hard labor at Fort Bragg. He has since regained his rank of sergeant. Speaking to TIME while Cardona was in Kuwait, Army public affairs specialist Major James Crabtree, who is assigned to the 18th Airborne Corps at Fort Bragg, which has responsibility for Cardona's unit, said his company "happens to be deployed to Iraq, so he went with them." Crabtree quoted the Army commander overseeing the transfer as saying, "There were no issues associated with [Cardona's new] deployment." Assigning Cardona to Iraq again, commented retired General Barry McCaffrey, who commanded a division in the first Gulf War, "represents appallingly bad judgment."

According to a close friend with whom Cardona spoke just before his departure, the soldier was worried that not only he but also comrades serving with him could become targets for insurgents. The Iraqi police, whom the company was assigned to train, have been the target of frequent assassination attempts and, according to U.S. intelligence, are heavily infiltrated by insurgents. The Pentagon's last statement about the sergeant's return to Fort Bragg said he would be assigned duties that would allow him "to be a productive member" of the Army. With reporting by Aparisim Ghosh/Baghdad

Iraq: A New Enemy Emerges—'The Shiite Zarqawi' (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - Ever since the radical Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr joined the Iraqi government, his power on the streets has been slipping. Now U.S. and Iraqi officials worry that even more violent men might be taking up his mantle. One name has come up again and again: Abu Deraa, sometimes called "the Shiite Zarqawi." Abu Deraa and the death squad he runs have been waging a campaign of Shia terror across the city. He is suspected of torturing and killing scores of Sunnis in a bloody wave of ethnic cleansing in neighborhoods across Baghdad. U.S. officials believe Abu Deraa is responsible for the capture of a U.S. Army translator who disappeared two weeks ago while leaving the fortified Green Zone and remains missing. Abu Deraa "is a brutal, loathsome character," says a senior U.S. official who asked not to be identified by name because of the sensitive nature of the topic. "He is definitely a guy we'd like to see not around anymore."

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki hasn't made the job of hunting him any easier. Last week U.S. forces launched a massive raid in Sadr City, targeting Abu Deraa. The attack reportedly killed two of his sons, but he escaped. Concerned about the political implications, Maliki ordered U.S. troops to end the assault and then dismantle the checkpoints they had set up to net Abu Deraa if he tried to slip away. Maliki insists he would like to see Abu Deraa and other insurgents like him brought to justice—but he wants the United States to let him handle it his own way, by relying on Moqtada al-Sadr to clear out the death squads. "What the prime minister is doing—if it works it would be quite good," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad tells NEWSWEEK.

DOJ_NMG_0091017

But it's a gamble. The son of a fishmonger from one of the poorest slums of Sadr City, Abu Deraa (real name: Ismael Hafidh) has capitalized on Iraq's sectarian hatreds and won support among some Shiites as a defender of the faith. "What Abu Deraa does is just a reaction for what is being done by the mobs that kill innocents," says Abu Ali, 46, a Shiite policeman who has met and worked with Abu Deraa. For now, U.S. officials are reluctantly going along with Maliki's plan to let Sadr deal with Abu Deraa. Privately, however, the officials fear that Maliki can't really rely on militia groups like the Mahdi Army, which has ties to the most brutal death squads, like the one Abu Deraa runs. "[Al-Sadr] has been a violent militia leader for more than three years," says the U.S. official. "It's going to take more than statements to convince me that he's not still got one foot in the violence." Or that he could stop the bloodshed, even if he wanted to.

Two Texans In Trouble (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

At the White House, they call it the "V" word. Vietnam. It is the historical parallel that the Bush administration dreads most, because of fears that comparisons with the bitter, bloody Southeast Asian conflict will cast even more doubt on the conduct of the war in Iraq today. "Entirely different situations," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told U.S. News.

But the idea that Iraq increasingly resembles Vietnam in some important ways appears to be gaining credibility among historians, pundits, and, most important, the public. While 50 percent of Americans think the United States will avoid another Vietnam-which was far more costly in terms of human life and military spending-40 percent think the United States is "heading for the same kind of involvement in Iraq as it had in the Vietnam War," according to a Washington Post/ABC News poll taken in mid-October. President Bush fueled the debate last month when he agreed that the current spike in Iraqi violence reminded him of the Tet offensive in 1968. That's when attacks across Vietnam seemed to under-mine President Lyndon Johnson's claims that there was light at the end of the tunnel. Bush conceded that, in a similar manner, Iraqi insurgents may be trying to break America's will today.

The comparisons will only intensify as Bush prepares to visit Vietnam for a high-profile economics conference next week and as frustrations with the course of the war in Iraq grow. "People see Iraq as an echo of the experience of Vietnam," says historian Robert Dallek, biographer of President Johnson, who escalated the Vietnam War in the mid- and late 1960s. "We got trapped there in a quagmire. And today, there is a sense once again that, like Vietnam, we are caught in a trap of our own making, and there is no way out."

Such assessments are vigorously challenged by President Bush and his senior aides. The war in Iraq, they say, is being won, contrary to media reports, and the administration has an effective strategy to eventually turn security over to the democratically elected Iraqi government. White House counselor Dan Bartlett conceded that Americans are frustrated, but he said that's mostly because "they want to know we can win." And Bush is confident of victory, Bartlett told U.S. News.

But those arguments are being aggressively challenged by the critics, some of whom cite eerie parallels with Vietnam. Johnson and, later, President Richard Nixon said they would turn over security to the South Vietnamese, and the plan failed.

It is also true that in each case, America's commander in chief immersed the nation in a faraway conflict for reasons that turned out to be misleading or just plain wrong. In each case, the cost in lives and treasure-and the strength and tenacity of the opposition-exceeded the government's initial estimates. In each case, as opposition mounted at home and abroad, the exit strategy seemed unclear. And in each case, a president who initially sought to focus on domestic issues found his other priorities shunted aside.

Stuck In The '60s (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

"You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Those two sentences, spoken by John Kerry last week, tell a lot about the mind-set of many-not all, but many-Democrats who supported him for president in 2004 and who, as this is written, are looking forward to Democratic victories this week. One thing they tell us is that Kerry's mind-set is still back in the Vietnam era. Today the statement is literally untrue: No one is "stuck in Iraq" unless he or she volunteers, and the educational and economic levels of our military personnel are higher than those of civilians in the same age cohort. Kerry was evidently thinking back to the late 1960s, when there was a military draft and a college dropout could find himself drafted and "stuck" in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0091018

Kerry's explanation for his bizarre refusal to apologize for two days and then his grudging off-camera apology was that he was trying to make a joke about the stupidity of George W. Bush (even though Kerry's grades at Yale were slightly lower than Bush's). But his words were not wholly out of line with previous statements by him and other Democrats characterizing American troops as perpetrators rather than heroes. There was Kerry's 1971 "Genghis Khan" testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as his December 2005 statement that troops were "terrorizing" women and children. Sen. Dick Durbin likened American service members to Nazi storm troopers and the Khmer Rouge, and Sen. Edward Kennedy suggested that Abu Ghraib under our "new management" was comparable to Saddam Hussein's regime of torture and murder. Behind all these statements is an unspoken assumption that American service members are incompetent and vicious.

It's unusual in American history for a conflict to be seen by a substantial part of the political class through the lens of an earlier war. Yet many Democrats view Iraq through the lens of Vietnam-or their version of it. Now, as then, they want to see American withdrawal even if that means defeat. Yet Iraq is plainly not Vietnam. There were more than 20 times as many American deaths in Vietnam as there have been in Iraq. And withdrawal from Iraq would be vastly more dangerous than withdrawal from Vietnam turned out to be.

To be sure, our withdrawal from Vietnam was bad for the Vietnamese. There was, contrary to Kerry's prediction at the time, a bloodbath, and the Vietnamese lived under a cruel communist dictatorship. But the dominoes did not fall beyond Indochina because, unnoticed by war backers and opponents, other East Asian states-South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia-were launching a free-market economic boom. The Vietnam War gave them time to get started. These countries had rule of law and in time developed democracies.

Purple fingers. Iraq is not in such a good neighborhood. Nearby are Iran, the leading supporter of international terrorism, busy developing nuclear weapons; Syria, headquarters of many terrorist groups; and Saudi Arabia, where petrodollars are used to disseminate totalitarian Wahhabism around the world. Premature withdrawal from Iraq would give terrorists more space and time to plan and prepare attacks on us beyond Iraq, and a visible defeat for the United States would exhilarate the followers of Osama bin Laden and other Islamofascist terrorists. It would leave unprotected the brave Iraqis who risked death to vote in three elections and held up their purple fingers in triumph.

About all this John Kerry, to judge from his changing positions on Iraq, doesn't seem to much care. Rather, he and his ilk seem bent, as they did in the 1970s, on establishing who our heroes should and should not be. They should not be members of the American military, who are portrayed as depraved or incompetent. They should be the antiwar protesters, the professors and intellectuals, the sophisticated elites who know better than ordinary Americans and the servicemen and women what's in the world's best interest. They should be people who believe that fighting those who want to destroy us only makes them madder and that withdrawal will assuage their grievances so they will leave us alone. It turned out that withdrawing from Vietnam did not cause us irretrievable damage. But will we be so lucky if we leave Iraq too soon?

U.S.-Style Campaigning At The U.N. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

The election news these days focuses on various races for House and Senate seats. But there's another hotly contested race of great, even worldwide, interest: the selection of a new head of the U.N. World Food Program for the next five years.

In this race, there's really only one final voter, outgoing U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan -- though he has consulted with other top officials, especially Jacques Diouf , the head of the Food and Agriculture Organization, and the incoming secretary general, Ban Ki Moon .

DOJ_NMG_0091019

The front-runner is the official Bush administration candidate, Josette Sheeran, undersecretary of state for economic, business and agricultural affairs. The post most always goes to an American, but this time there are two in the running. The other is Tony Banbury , head of the World Food Program in Asia.

Banbury, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said last week, "is a very capable person" who worked at the National Security Council in the Clinton administration and stayed on in the first year of the Bush administration. Banbury has supporters within the administration who wanted him to be the official candidate, we're told.

The race has taken on some of the trappings of a real campaign.

Sheeran, formerly a managing editor and 16-year employee of the Washington Times, doesn't have experience running a food aid program, but she's campaigning hard. She's touting her work at State and before that as deputy U.S. trade representative. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been working the phones for her.

She's even put out an attractive four-page campaign brochure -- paid for by the State Department -- with a fine cover photo of her standing in front of a field of grain. "Fighting Hunger -- Management Leadership, Development Expertise," is the campaign motto. "Specifically my platform includes the following five points," she says in the brochure, laying out broad themes to feed the world's hungry.

And much as in a campaign, detractors in the blogosphere have gone negative, hammering Sheeran about her lack of experience and her lengthy membership in the controversial Rev. Sun Myung Moon 's Unification Church, where she got married at one of those mass weddings. She left the church eight or nine years ago, we're told.

Then there was a 1992 article she wrote in the Times about her interview with the late Kim Il Sung , a founding father of the axis of evil. She described the North Korean leader as "presenting the image of a self-confident, reflective elder statesman rather than the reclusive, dogmatic dictator he is usually portrayed as in the West."

"We don't need nuclear weapons," she quoted him as saying. "What is the use of producing one or two nuclear weapons while the big countries have several thousand, several tens of thousands of nuclear weapons? And we don't have a delivery system either." Not then, they didn't.

The oddsmakers say Sheeran gets the nod.At Least He Has Massoud

It's been a somewhat turbulent year for Kenneth Y. Tomlinson , former editor in chief of Reader's Digest and now chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, Radio and TV Marti in Cuba, and Radio Free Asia.

Back in August, the State Department's inspector general dinged him for hiring a friend as a consultant for $244,000 and overbilling the government for his time. The report also found that Tomlinson had used his office to run his thoroughbred horse operation. The broadcasting board split 3-3 on partisan lines on whether to fire him, so he remains in the job until a replacement is found, which could easily be another two years.

Tomlinson said the allegations were part of a "political vendetta."

And a close look at one of his e-mails dealing with the ponies during work time makes it quite clear that the racing operation was not completely unrelated to his work for the Board of Governors. Sure, the message to "Colleagues" starts out: "Now put a gun to my head and I gotta say that Clement's Scabbard will win the forth race at Delaware."

But he also is clearly focused on international matters, especially when talking about his horse, Massoud. "Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah once told me [the late leader Ahmed Shah] Massoud loved fast horses and that his followers often made gifts of horses to him."

You can read the lengthy, entertaining e-mail at http://www.washingtonpost.com/fedpage .From the West Wing to the Marines

On the move from the White House to Afghanistan . . . Kenneth Rapuano , formerly deputy undersecretary at the Energy Department for counterterrorism and since July 2004 a deputy assistant to the president for homeland security, has volunteered for active duty as a lieutenant colonel in the Marines to serve with the Joint Special Operations Command in Afghanistan.

The Long, Cost-Free War (NYT)

By Ted Koppel

DOJ_NMG_0091020

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

IN the operations center at United States Central Command in Tampa, Fla., there is a wall of television screens, one end of the wall quartered so that four live feeds can be seen simultaneously. The signals originate somewhere over Iraq or Afghanistan. The cameras are aboard pilotless drones.

"Predators," some are called, and predators they are. They can be equipped with Hellfire missiles that are remotely fired by operators in Nevada who receive their orders from Centcom in Florida. The enemy, meanwhile, does much of its killing with improvised explosive devices, the most sophisticated of which are designed in Iran.

Such is at least one face of modern warfare, in which combatants exchange mortal blows by remote control, once or even twice removed from the battlefield. The victims are just as dead or mutilated as those in previous wars, but the notion of violence activated from hundreds or even thousands of miles away is telling.

The Bush administration is trying to deal with a particularly nettlesome problem: preparing Americans for a struggle that may last decades without simultaneously demoralizing them. Centcom's commander, Gen. John Abizaid, likes to refer to it as the "long war," where "long," means generational, with no end in sight.

To the degree that such a war can be fought at arm's length, with a minimum of friendly casualties, it will be. To the extent that victory can be achieved with a minimum of personal sacrifice, the Bush administration will try to do so.

Senior members of the administration frame that struggle in existential terms. They invoke the nightmarish possibility of a 9/11 on steroids — a terrorist attack using weapons of mass destruction, rattling the very foundations of our society. The Bush administration uses that frightening image to justify a new worldview, within which even associating with someone who belongs to an organization on the United States terrorist list justifies prosecution here at home.

This practice falls into the category of what Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty calls "preventative prosecution." It's an interesting concept: a form of anticipatory justice. Faced with the possible convergence between terrorism and a weapon of mass destruction, the argument goes, the technicality of waiting for a crime to be committed before it can be punished must give way to pre-emption.

Set aside for a moment the somewhat jarring notion of recalibrating our constitutional protections here at home while our soldiers and diplomats are given the thankless mission of spreading democracy in some of the most inhospitable regions of the Middle East.

There is a whiff of hypocrisy about conjuring up visions of a nuclear or biological holocaust while urging the American public to go about its business and recreation as usual.

We are advised to adjust to the notion of warrantless wiretaps at home, unaccountable C.I.A. prisons overseas and the rendition of suspects to nations that feature prominently on the State Department's list of human rights abusers, because the threats we face are "existential."

But apparently they are not existential enough to warrant any kind of widely shared commitment or sacrifice, like increased taxes or a military draft to meet the Pentagon's growing need for manpower.

One can share the Bush administration's perception that the United States confronts real threats that will not be eliminated easily or soon, but still find it impractical and immoral to get on with life as usual while placing the burden solely on the shoulders of the young men and women serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, their families and friends.

We are left with the impression that the grown-ups in Washington would prefer to make the difficult decisions for us without involving the courts, Congress or the press. That is precisely the wrong way to go about winning this war. Back when the United States was widely admired, it was for all that was most cumbersome about our democratic process.

America's efforts to transplant democracy elicit none of that admiration. How can they, when we appear to have lost confidence in fundamental aspects of democracy here at home? What has historically impressed our allies and adversaries has been our often flawed, but ultimately sincere, determination to operate within the law — if not always abroad, then at least within the United States.

Does our system require calibration in the context of the Long War? Perhaps. We cannot, for example, expect to know everything our government does when transparency informs our enemies of what they must not know. That, however, has always been the case. Indeed, there are courts and Congressional committees set up for the express purpose of reconciling the needs for secrecy and for transparency.

Furthermore, when officials deem certain crimes (torture, for example) unavoidable in the defense of liberty, those who commit those crimes must still know that they will be held to account before an uncompromised legal system. Congress recently passed a law that ensures exactly the opposite.

It is going to be a long struggle, and we may have to live with whatever adjustments we make to our liberties until the struggle is won, or at least over. Even liberties voluntarily forfeited are not easily retrieved. All the more so for those that are removed surreptitiously.

One might have expected that these issues would feature prominently in the debate leading up to the Congressional elections. They are scarcely mentioned.

Apparently unnerved by the unceasing White House harangue that they are ill suited to waging the war on terrorism, Democrats have largely forfeited the argument that "war," particularly a "long war," may be the wrong prism through which to view the dangers facing the United States.

Those who once argued that the task was one for police and intelligence agencies have been mocked into silence. Democrats have given a wide berth to the invasion of privacy, selective suspension of habeas corpus and the mistreatment of detainees, preferring instead to echo the drumbeat of Republican warnings about terrorism in general.

There is a war to be waged. We should be building protective ramparts around our legal system, safeguarding our own freedoms, focusing on our own carefully constructed democracy and leading by example.

It's too bad that we have so little confidence in the most powerful weapon in America's arsenal.

Is Pakistan An Ally? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

PREVENTING AFGHANISTAN from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. .

Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state.

Islamabad is clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests.

Musharraf told Washington that under the deal, tribal leaders promised to call a halt to the cross-border attacks into Afghanistan in return for the Pakistani army withdrawing from the tribal areas to its bases. Perhaps he didn't expect his Western friends to read the agreement in the original Urdu. According to those who have, Islamabad's official representative signed an agreement not just with Waziristan tribal leaders but with the "local mujahedin" — a vague term — and with the Taliban. The agreement spells the plural of the word "Taliban," which means students, in the Arabic way, as "Talaba" — a ruse that the Pakistanis are using to claim that they didn't actually inhale.

In fact, if President Bush has any red lines left, he should be furious that Pakistan is legitimizing the very Taliban it has pledged to eradicate. It should come as no surprise, we should add, that the Taliban has not kept its part of the bargain. Attacks have multiplied since the deal was signed.

Musharraf tried to make amends by ordering airstrikes on one Taliban-run madrasa last week, triggering a bloodbath and angry protests against the United States. But it will take far more to persuade the American public and Congress of the wisdom of providing Pakistan with $3 billion in military and other aid each year while Pakistani territory, tribal or not, gives sanctuary to Taliban fighters who kill U.S. and NATO soldiers and destabilize the Afghan government.

DOJ_NMG_0091022

DOJ

Enron Prosecutor Lands At Latham (LAW)

By Dan Slater

Law.com, November 6, 2006

Sean Berkowitz, the director of the Department of Justice's Enron Task Force in the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and the late Kenneth Lay, will join the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins, the law firm announced Thursday, Nov. 2.

The announcement came on the heels of Enron Corp. co-prosecutor John Hueston joining Irell & Manella.

"I did a careful look around Chicago firms and felt that Latham provided the best opportunities to capitalize on my experience in the Justice Department, and to transfer that into a national and international practice," said Berkowitz, 39, a Chicago native and honors graduate of Tulane University and Harvard Law School.

Berkowitz, pursued by Kirkland & Ellis and DLA Piper, among others, has several ties to Latham lawyers. He worked with John Lynch, a founding partner of Latham's Chicago office, when they represented different parties in General Instrument Corp.'s securities litigation, and with Latham associate Deborah Steiner in the U.S. Attorney's office.

Between his Enron experience and his associate years at Katten Muchin Rosenman before joining the U.S. Attorney's office in Chicago, Berkowitz expects to make a pretty seamless public-to-private transition. "Enron was one of the most complex matters out there, so I don't imagine I'll find anything in private practice that'll be insurmountable from a technical standpoint," said Berkowitz, whose provocative cross-examination of Skilling ignited an unflattering outburst from the fallen executive.

"From the perspective of the skill-sets that I learned in Enron," he added, "anytime you've got a high-profile case where there's a lot of pressure, you come out of it with the feeling that you've been battle-tested and can take any case or assignment."

At Latham, Berkowitz will handle white-collar cases and litigation outside the criminal realm, and also assist transactional lawyers in corporate governance matters. Said Mark Gerstein, a Latham M&A lawyer who worked with Berkowitz when they were both associates at Katten in the mid-1990s: "When directors ask to be counseled on a course of action, they want to know how their actions will be viewed through the prism of a litigator who's going to be representing them, or a prosecutor who's going to be reviewing them. I expect Sean will be sitting side-by-side with me in board meetings, when directors and managers ask what they ought to be doing and how they ought to be doing it."

A Latham team led by Gerstein is representing the Chicago Board of Trade's special transaction committee in the merger of its parent, Cbot Holdings Inc., with Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.

Added Gerstein: "As someone who's watching this office take its rightful place in Chicago, it's nice to see our presence on the CME-CBOT deal followed by Sean joining the firm 10 days later."

CRIMINAL LAW

Inside Bomber Row (TIME)

By Maryanne Vollers

Time, November 13, 2006

Highway 50 runs straight as a pool cue from Pueblo, Colo., through 23 miles of rangeland and piÃ±on flats before offering an exit to the scruffy little city of Florence (pop. 3,795). Like Flint, Mich., or Orlando, Fla., Florence is a company town. The industry here is prisoners, and the company is the Federal Bureau of Prisons. Twenty years ago, the people of surrounding Fremont County ponied up $160,000 to buy some open land outside Florence, hoping to entice the bureau to build a prison complex as a way to boost the town's economy. Corrections had long been a mainstay in Fremont County; the high desert valley was already home to more than half a dozen prisons. But in the end, Florence got a little more than it bargained for.

The 600-acre Federal Correctional Complex, which was completed in 1994 on the outskirts of town, is a virtual theme park of penal experiences, ranging from a minimum-security camp for inside-traders and small-time pot dealers to the concrete fortress that was built to be the most secure prison in the country: the Administrative Maximum U.S. Penitentiary, or ADX for short. The inmates in ADX Florence include drug kingpins, gang leaders, hit men, snipers and, lately, more and more, international terrorists, including al-Qaeda shoe bomber Richard Reid; mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing Ramzi Yousef and at least seven of his accomplices; and four men convicted of involvement in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa. There are American terrorists too. Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber, spent time there before being transferred to Indiana, where he was executed in 2001. His accomplice, Terry Nichols, is still at ADX, as is Theodore Kaczynski, the Unabomber. The common thread running through the crimes committed by these men accounts for the nickname given to the highest-security section of the prison: Bombers Row.

Until now, almost nothing has been written about the inner workings of the ADX. Since 9/11, journalists have been routinely denied access to the facility, its staff and inmates. But Eric Robert Rudolph, who is serving life without parole at the prison for the fatal bombings at the Atlanta Olympics and an abortion clinic in Alabama, has written letters to me, the author of a book about his case, and to his mother Patricia Rudolph, who has shared them with me. These missives offer a unique first-hand account of life on Bombers Row.

"It is Ramadan now and the Muslims are fasting," Rudolph wrote in the fall of 2005, three months after he arrived at ADX. "The call to prayer echoes through the halls five times a day giving this place a decidedly otherworldly feel." Although the inmates are isolated in gloomy one-man cells the size of a small bathroom at least 23 hours a day, their chambers aren't soundproof. In fact, the prison is noisy. Rudolph's housing unit resonates with the constant mechanical whir and clank of electronic gates, punctuated by the sound of inmates praying, wailing and shouting conversations in English and Arabic through the walls and vents between their cells.

There are eight cells in Rudolph's "range," and another eight on the level above him. For security reasons, he is not allowed to name his fellow prisoners, but he says there is one American who never comes out of his cell; according to sources outside the ADX, the silent American is Kaczynski. Rudolph says the rest of his neighbors are such nationalities as Egyptian, Sudanese and Palestinian. He writes that his area of the prison is "where they house the political offenders, what they call 'terrorists.'" There are many such men at ADX. The list of Arab inmates reads like a Who's Who of the international jihad. Apart from the bombers already mentioned, there are, among others, Zacarias Moussaoui, the sole individual convicted of involvement in the 9/11 attacks; Ahmed Ressam, arrested at the Canadian border with explosives he had planned to use to bomb the Los Angeles International Airport; and Abdul Hakim Murad, convicted in Operation Bojinka, a 1995 al-Qaeda scheme to blow 12 planes, 11 of them U.S.-bound, out of the sky during a 48-hour period.

A correctional officer at ADX told me that inmates are placed on the same range based on their compatibility. Another clue as to why jihadists are housed together comes from Bureau of Prisons director Harley Lappin's 2003 testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee. He said that his department's strategy was to ensure that "inmates with terrorist ties do not have the opportunity to radicalize or recruit other inmates." They are kept at ADX because, he noted, it's "our most secure facility."

But is it secure enough? For the first decade after the ADX was built, the citizens of Florence weren't worried much about the secretive compound, which is only conspicuous when the sun goes down and its banks of light towers glow against the dark horizon. But when Moussaoui, the crazed 9/11 wannabe hijacker, arrived to considerable media fanfare in May 2006, some locals started to feel as if they were living beside a tempting terrorist target. People weren't so much concerned that someone would break out of the fortified ADX, but rather they wondered what would prevent an al-Qaeda squad, perhaps a suicide attacker, from breaking in. At the same time, they were hearing rumors about internal security problems at the Supermax, as the prison is sometimes called. "There's a lot we should be scared about in this little town, with those individuals up there," said Cindy Cox, the mayor of Florence. "Some think that since they're in prison, they're not terrorizing anyone anymore. But what about their friends?"

The federal complex is located only a couple of chip shots away from a combined golf course and housing development. While the two higher-security prisons there have walled yards, the entire campus is separated from the community by only a single barbed-wire cow fence. State representative Buffie McFadyen, a two-term Democrat whose district includes the prisons in

DOJ_NMG_0091024

Fremont County, has pressed members of Congress, to no avail, to appropriate funds to build a solid wall around the complex, along with a central guard tower to better protect the center from outside attack. The Bureau of Prisons has already failed four times to squeeze money into its budget to upgrade security. McFadyen has also campaigned to remedy what a federal arbitrator has called dangerous understaffing at the ADX. "The threat comes from both inside and outside the prison," McFadyen says.

Like an anthropologist dropped into an exotic village, Rudolph seems fascinated by the Arab inmates. "They're an extremely fatalistic people," he wrote. "This time must be very rough on them for they have little interest in anything other than the Middle East, President Bush and Islam. But at least they have each other and rattle on endlessly in Arabic."

Rudolph is getting his neighbors to teach him their language. He picks it up one phrase at a time. He wrote his mother, who lives in Sarasota, Fla., that "Kyfa ta Kool," which he spelled out phonetically, means "How do you say ...?" Sometimes the other inmates are eager to communicate with Rudolph, other times they are "sulking or buried in some Arabic hell of depression."

In ADX, the spartan cells are designed to keep inmates from hurting themselves--and their guards. Each 7- or 8-ft. by 12-ft. space contains a molded concrete bunk, stool and desk; a steel shower, sink and toilet, and a small black-and-white TV encased in Plexiglas to prevent tampering. At one end of the cell is a solid steel door, and a small vestibule--for the use of guards when they enter--separated from the living quarters by steel bars. There is one 4-in. by 4-ft. window. Rudolph's is over his bed, looking out on the prison yard. "Through the slit window one can see the sky, but other than this and the few small birds that roost on the prison roof, there are no signs of the natural world."

The inmates have almost no physical contact with other people. Food, mail and laundry are delivered through a slot in the steel bars. Prisoners have a choice of two kinds of meals: the regular plan consists of typical American food: casseroles, hamburgers, blue-plate specials. The alternative is a diet conforming to almost all religious restrictions. It contains no pork and incorporates lots of beans and vegetables. Muslims get special mealtimes during the month of Ramadan, when the observant do not eat during daylight hours.

Prison staff sit in control booths from which they operate the doors and surveil the corridors using sound monitors and cameras. To keep the inmates occupied, they offer crossword puzzles, bingo and Jeopardy competitions through flyers or through a closed-circuit TV channel. "The Muslims are obsessed with the games, they chatter endlessly about the possible answers," Rudolph wrote. The winners are rewarded with a candy bar or a picture of themselves. Being a Westerner puts Rudolph at an advantage in the trivia games, and his foreign neighbors depend on his help. "Moments after they post the questions on Monday morning, the yelling begins. 'Areek, what the answers? Who is President in the War of 1812?'"

Television is another distraction. ADX sources say inmates get basic cable service, although nothing as fancy as HBO, and can choose what to watch, though these privileges can be taken away as punishment for rules violations. Rudolph says he gets 60 channels, including music-radio stations and local news. A special prison channel offers educational shows, courses in anger management and a smorgasbord of religious programs dealing with faiths ranging from Catholicism to the Nation of Islam and even Asatru, the ancient Norse religion favored by Aryan supremacists.

According to Bureau of Prisons policy, the high-risk inmates in Rudolph's unit are allowed visits and phone calls only from their lawyers and from a list of approved contacts often restricted to immediate family members. All communications by such prisoners are supposed to be monitored by correctional staff. But a report by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General released last month faulted the bureau for not properly screening inmate mail and phone conversations at ADX Florence and other facilities. It confirmed reports that after 9/11, Mohammed Salameh, one of the 1993 World Trade Center bombers, wrote a letter praising Osama bin Laden that was published in Arabic newspapers. Salameh and two of his accomplices, also at ADX, mailed out at least 90 unmonitored letters between 2002 and 2004. The recipients included Islamic extremists with links to suspects in the Madrid train bombings; one letter was sent to Mohamed Achraf, alleged leader of a plot to blow up the National Justice Building in Madrid.

Investigators discovered that at the time the letters went out, there was only one part-time Arabic translator on staff at ADX to handle mail checks, which were done at random. The bureau has since hired three full-time Arabic translators for ADX but claims that more funds are needed to fully monitor the communications of all high-risk inmates, particularly non-English speakers.

DOJ_NMG_0091025

To cut costs, the Bureau of Prisons in 2005 instituted a policy of shifting staff around within prisons and filling only the most critical positions. The union that represents correctional workers at the ADX charged that this resulted in the facility's being staffed far below the bureau's minimum safety standards. In spring a federal arbitrator heard testimony from ADX staff that some housing units had been left unattended for entire eight-hour shifts. Union officials also charged that posts in what they call the "terrorist unit" were routinely left vacant. According to the union, staff shortages meant that inmates weren't getting meals on time, scheduled phone calls were delayed or canceled, and exercise hours were cut because there was nobody to supervise them.

The inmates, correctional officers say, often turn hostile and dangerous when their basic needs are unmet or their routines are disrupted. "When you start tinkering with staffing levels, you start setting that system off balance, so you start seeing a lot of things popping up in terms of increased inmate assaults and increased threats," says Mike Schnobrich, a union representative who works at ADX. The union documented that since the new staffing policy began in 2005, two ADX inmates have been murdered by fellow prisoners, after 10 years without a killing at the facility; threats to staff increased, from 55 in 2005 to 110 in 2006; and assaults on correctional officers increased nearly a third over the same period, from 30 to 38 incidents.

The federal arbitrator sided with the union and in October ordered the Bureau of Prisons to reduce the hazards to correctional officers. Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the bureau, disputes the arbitrator's findings and denies there has been any problem with staffing at the ADX, saying in a written response to questions from TIME that the facility "continues to operate safely and efficiently." She said that 60 new correctional workers have recently been added to the staff of the Federal Correctional Complex. Union representative Schnobrich maintains that despite those hires, staffing at ADX is still dangerously low.

Rudolph's letters over the past year have reflected increasing frustration with prison conditions caused by staff shortages. He has complained about cold food, delayed mail and calls missed because there was no one available to bring a phone to his cell. When he first arrived at ADX in 2005, the inmates in his range were let out of their cells four or five times a week for indoor exercise and once a week for a break in the yard. More recently they have been lucky to get outside once a month. Rudolph has joined other inmates in filing a complaint with the Bureau of Prisons over deteriorating conditions, but he doesn't hold out much hope that they will be corrected.

It's not easy to unnerve the citizens of Fremont County. Prisons have been part of the landscape since before Colorado was a state--the Colorado Territorial prison dates back to the 19th century, and people are accustomed to the occasional disturbance or inmate escape. In Florence, most folks still don't lock their doors at night. Many have grown up listening for three short blasts from the fire whistle--a signal that a prisoner is loose in the valley. When that happens, some residents simply fill up their car with gas and leave the keys in the vehicle. "It's better than having a fugitive break into your house and take you hostage," says Bob Wood, publisher of the Florence Citizen, with a shrug. "All they want to do is get out of town." Even though he doesn't live in fear, Wood says he's increasingly concerned about problems at the federal prison complex. And he's not alone.

On the weekend before Halloween, 50 people crowded into a community forum in Florence with Colorado's Democratic Senator Ken Salazar, who had just toured ADX to investigate the security situation. A few days later, Republican Senator Wayne Allard made the same trip. Fremont County sheriff Jim Beicker, who is still waiting for a Homeland Security grant to upgrade his department's radio system, expressed his concerns about the flimsy fence surrounding the prison complex and staffing shortages at ADX. "I want to see these issues fixed," he said. "I don't want to have to lay awake at night and worry about problems at the prison spilling over into my jurisdiction."

State representative McFadyen was encouraged that both Allard and Salazar promised to bring up the issue of security in the area in the next Congress. "The correctional officers at ADX work on the front line in the nation's war on terror, and they deserve our support, just like the troops overseas," she said. "Fremont County helps keep the country safe. Now the country should keep Fremont County safe."

From Eric Rudolph's point of view, the ADX is locked down very tight. The procedure to leave one's cell for a rare opportunity to exercise outside, for instance, is an ordeal. Two guards enter the vestibule and order the inmate to strip. After a cavity search, he dresses again and his hands are cuffed through an opening in the bars that separate the vestibule from the rest of the cell. The guards then march him down the corridor, a steel-tipped baton at the ready. When all the prisoners are lined up, they are led to an outdoor recreation area enclosed by 25-ft. walls. If they look straight up through the chain mesh that encloses the top of the yard, they can see a patch of the blue Colorado sky.

DOJ_NMG_0091026

The prisoners are placed in chain-link enclosures called "dog runs," one per cage. Their cuffs are removed through a door slot. This is the only time the inmates actually see and interact with one another. "It is awkward adjusting my voice from the necessary yell of the cell block to the face-to-face conversation in the yard," Rudolph writes. "Unlike me the Arabs don't adjust the volume." Rudolph describes how his neighbors pair up in their separate runs and then "walk the length of the cage in unison, back and forth, yelling as they go. If you've ever seen big cats at a zoo, this is what they do as well. They pace back and forth, rhythmically, like a pendulum. Across the yard, this is what one sees: seven pairs of inmates pacing together, all the while yelling in loud Arabic." The words Aiwa, aiwa echo across the yard. Yes, yes.

"When the hour is up, the slow process of moving us back to the cells begins in reverse," Rudolph writes. "And then we sit in our darkened cells for the rest of the week, staring out at the empty sun-drenched yard."

Menino Looks To Replicate Gang Truce (BOS)

By Suzanne Smalley

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

Mayor Thomas M. Menino said yesterday that he is optimistic about the possibility of brokering more gang truces across Boston similar to the one that police, clergy, and youth outreach workers established between two of the city's most violent gangs.

Menino, who credited police and the Rev. Jeffrey Brown with cementing the pact between the Heath Street gang in Jamaica Plain and the H-Block gang in Roxbury, also praised the young gang members who came to the bargaining table.

"You have to give the . . . gang members a lot of credit for wanting to work together," Menino said in an interview.

Jack McDevitt, associate dean of Northeastern University's College of Criminal Justice and a consultant for the Boston police, said the truce could become a national model, in part because Heath Street and H-Block's long, bloody feud gives the treaty more street credibility. He said he plans to recommend the idea to six cities he is working with to fight gang violence under a US Department of Justice initiative.

"It gives some cover to other groups that might feel, 'OK, these are pretty serious folks and they did it so we can do it, too,' " McDevitt said.

The Globe reported yesterday that police and clergy are talking to eight other gangs after quiet talks, culminating in a peace summit at the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum on July 24, led to a handshake truce that has significantly reduced gun violence in the neighborhoods where Heath Street and H-Block are active.

Organizers trying to preserve the truce have offered incentives to gang members, including tutoring, improvements to a teen center, and corporate box seats for a New England Patriots game. Truce coordinators had been seeking donations of Boston Celtics tickets as well; yesterday, Shawn Sullivan, the team's senior vice president for ticket sales, said in an e-mail that he is interested in helping.

Jamiel Brome, 25, whose brother Shavale, 24, was slain in H-Block territory in April 2005, said he doesn't mind gang members being treated to Patriots games, if such incentives save lives. "If it works, it works," he said. "A lot of young kids are dying."

Organizers emphasize that the truce does not give amnesty for any past or future crimes committed by gang members. In October, for instance, Amos Carrasquillo, who was participating in the truce as a Heath Street gang member, was shot by police and arrested after allegedly pointing a gun at police officers. Days later, Carrasquillo and Luis Garcia, another Heath Street member and truce participant, were charged by US authorities for allegedly dealing cocaine.

Organizers describe those arrests as minor setbacks in the truce effort. Since a temporary cease-fire in July, there has not been a single shooting police have connected to either gang, law enforcement officials have told the Globe. The peace treaty has involved assistance from government and nonprofit agencies.

Menino said that City Hall provided summer jobs to several gang members. The mayor also said he personally raised money to pay truce organizer Shakeem Allah -- who had been volunteering.

DOJ_NMG_0091027

Menino said he has talked with Brown and with Acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin about the effort, adding that he is cautiously optimistic it could reduce gun violence in the city, which is on pace to surpass last year's 10-year high in homicides.

"This is community policing -- this is where it's at, the basic roots of community policing," he said.

Emmett Folgert, the executive director of the Dorchester Youth Collaborative, said the truce between Heath Street and H-Block could be a step toward getting youths to leave the gang life. He said much of Boston's gang violence is driven by youths who may want to stop shooting, but believe they have to protect themselves.

"This works when kids want a chance to back down," said Folgert, who has been using truces to limit violence between Asian gangs for several years. "We eliminate one of the main reasons for being in the gang -- you're worried about the other gang attacking you.

"Most of the shootings have been gang-related and that's why it's so hard to get prosecutions -- because the person who's your witness today is your suspect in yesterday's shooting," Folgert said.

FBI Numbers Suggest Manchester Safer Than Most Cities Its Size (NHUL)

By Scott Brooks

New Hampshire Union Leader, November 6, 2006

MANCHESTER – Manchester has consistently ranked among the least violent cities of its size in New England, an analysis of federal crime data reveals.

FBI records show the Queen City saw fewer robberies and aggravated assaults than almost any other similarly sized city in the region between 2001 and 2005, the last year for which data was available. Homicides also were rare.

Altogether, Manchester reported fewer violent crimes in recent years than all but one other New England city of more than 100,000 residents. Only Stamford, Conn., could claim fewer.

"The perception is that violent crime is way up," Police Chief John Jaskolka said. "Actually, our numbers are fairly low."

Officials and residents alike have lately called the security of several Manchester neighborhoods into question, particularly since city police patrolman Michael Briggs was killed by gunfire in the center city last month. Police have since ordered high-intensity patrols in a smattering of hot spots. Many residents, meanwhile, have banded together via neighborhood watch groups.

"Everyone knows in the city that things got real bad this summer," said Chris Leone, who recently formed a watch group on the West Side.

In fact, violent crimes have appeared to spike in recent months. Preliminary figures supplied by the city police department show robberies, aggravated assaults and burglaries are all up over the first eight months of this year.

And yet, data analyzed by the New Hampshire Union Leader suggest Manchester has been safer than most other cities its size. The paper looked at five years' worth of FBI crime reports for eight New England cities whose populations most closely approach Manchester's.

That list ranges from New Bedford, with roughly 93,000 residents, to Hartford, Conn., with 124,000 residents. Manchester's population is estimated at just under 110,000.

The results show Manchester reported an exceptionally low number of aggravated assaults, an average of 90 per year. That's fewer than the number in Portland, a city of just 65,000 residents, and a quarter of the number in Lawrence, Mass.

Manchester also had low incidents of homicides and robberies. However, the city did report a comparatively high number of forcible rapes, averaging 59 per year.

Peter Cordella, chairman of St. Anselm College's criminal justice department, unequivocally calls Manchester a safe city.

"The real big question now is, is it becoming, at the moment, significantly less safe? And I think the jury is out on that," he said.

Manchester recently ranked 124th on Morgan Quitno Press' list of the country's safest cities. Its ranking fell short of 10 other cities in New England, including Nashua at number 27.

DOJ_NMG_0091028

Cordella said Manchester holds several advantages over other New England cities. Household incomes are comparatively high ($50,404 as a median, according to the U.S. census), housing stock is generally in better condition and residents tend to move less often, he said. Those factors generally make neighborhoods more stable.

The recent uptick in crime may seem worse than it is, Cordella said, because the city has not had much crime to begin with. Perceptions, however, are not irrelevant, he said.

"If this is people's perception and they start altering their behavior, then it will become a problem," he said. "That's the critical issue."

Electronic Monitoring Now Includes Sweat Sniffers, Screeching Black Boxes (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, November 6, 2006

Electronic monitors that can pinpoint criminals on a map can now also tell whether they've been driving too fast, drinking or violating other laws.

Courts nationwide increasingly are embracing such tracking of people's behavior as a way to stop them from repeating the actions that got them in trouble with the law, though it remains less common than satellite surveillance of sex offenders.

“This is targeting behaviors that are risky, and I see it being used more and more for behavior modification in public safety,” says Peggy Conway, editor of the Journal of Offender Monitoring. “It's a phenomenally valuable option for judges.”

Among those options:

•Black boxes. A Michigan court has ordered 39 people convicted of repeated traffic violations to have systems installed in their cars that screech when they brake too hard or turn too fast, and keep a tally of the alerts for probation officers. One judge in Tennessee also has ordered a black box installed, says Larry Selditz, CEO of the company that makes the devices.

“It makes me watch how I drive,” says Mark Floria of Walled Lake, Mich., who got one of the boxes after his latest conviction for driving with a suspended license. “It beeped a lot when I started. It's scary because you don't know how many beeps it takes before probation will do something.”

•Alcohol-sniffing bracelets. Courts and prosecutors in 40 states have ordered drunken drivers to wear an ankle bracelet that sniffs their sweat for alcohol once an hour and reports the results to authorities daily on the Internet.

About 4,000 people nationwide are being monitored, says Kathleen Brown, a spokeswoman for maker Alcohol Monitoring Systems.

Authorities embrace monitoring because it's convenient and aimed at the problems that got people in trouble, says South Dakota Attorney General Larry Long. “We're not doing this to everybody. We're doing it to people who have demonstrated pretty convincingly that they are a safety risk to the rest of us,” Long says.

Because of that, few people have raised privacy concerns, says Marc Mauer, executive director of The Sentencing Project, which supports alternatives to prison. But it will work only if it's paired with other steps such as counseling, Mauer says, because “the reason people get in trouble is not because they lack an ankle bracelet.” Otherwise, he says, the problems might resume when the monitoring ends.

Location-tracking is expanding most rapidly, especially for sex offenders. Ten states this year passed laws requiring some or all offenders to be monitored by satellite; at least 10 others had already done so.

Alexander Lockup Fails Children, Report Asserts (ARDEM)

By Amy Upshaw

Arkansas Democrat Gazette, November 5, 2006

An advocacy group that has been monitoring Alexander Youth Services Center for months said Saturday that Arkansas isn’t meeting the mental health, education and special education needs of the children at the troubled facility as required by the U. S. Department of Justice and state law.

Problems at the center are systemic, said Dana McClain, a senior attorney with the Disability Rights Center, a federally funded Little Rock nonprofit that assists disabled Arkansans.

DOJ_NMG_0091029

"We don't think this is rehabilitation, and state law says it is supposed to be [for youthful offenders]. I think it's punishment," she said. "I feel like these children are being set up to go to adult prison."

At some point, she said, the youthful offenders at the lockup will get out, "and you hope when they do they've got a better shot at being productive members of society."

A draft copy of the group's lengthy report detailing "failures" at the center in Saline County was given to the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette on Saturday — a day after the state unexpectedly ended its contract with Cornell Cos. Inc., a Houston company that ran the center for the past five years. An internal investigation found that employees were "inappropriately" drugging youthful offenders with psychotropic drugs to control bad behavior.

The state was paying Cornell about $ 10 million annually.

News about the forced medications, sometimes given without a doctor's order, prompted some legislators and others to renew calls Friday to shut down the state's largest lockup for youthful offenders.

The Disability Rights Center report, which outlines about 50 problems, is expected to be released publicly later this week.

McClain said her group will meet with the Department of Health and Human Services on Monday to discuss the findings. Monitors for Disability Rights have been making unannounced visits, as allowed by federal statute, to the center at least three times a month since March.

"Under the contract these are things Cornell was responsible for providing," McClain said. "I hope [Health and Human Services] doesn't just address that one issue [about the medication]. This is a good time to do more because they are starting anew."

The agency has been responsive so far, McClain noted. Cornell, however, didn't address some of the major concerns that Mc-Clain said she repeatedly talked to company employees about.

Julie Munsell, Health and Human Services spokesman, said her agency has received a copy of the report but she declined to comment about the details until it is published and officials meet with the group's representatives. Health and Human Services is the umbrella agency over the Youth Services Division, which now operates the youth lockup.

In general, Munsell said, the state has made many strides since entering into a settlement agreement with the Department of Justice in March 2003 after a federal investigation found civil rights violations in the delivery of mental-health care, education, fire safety and freedom of religious expression at the center.

Still, more work is needed, particularly with the center's education system, she acknowledged.

"We do still struggle with education issues at Alexander, and we've been working with the Department of Education to improve those issues," she said. "We will always strive to get to an ideal setting, but it will take us time to get there."

The Justice Department hasn't visited the center since January.

Over the years, the youths at the Alexander center have complained that employees kicked, slapped and even threatened them with death. Others killed themselves.

One boy, known for days to be suicidal, was able to hang himself a few years ago with a bedsheet. An investigation later found that his guard didn't check on him.

Another boy hanged himself in the same cell just a few months later — just as the state hired Cornell to take over the facility and fix its problems.

And last year, a 17-year-old girl at the center died of blood clots in her lungs. She complained to nurses and supervisors that she was ill, but they didn't believe her, even as she lay dying, according to a subsequent investigation.

Munsell said her agency plans to work with the Disability Rights Center to address the group's concerns. The Department of Justice couldn't be reached for comment Saturday. During visits to the lockup, McClain said monitors found: Youths watching Harry Potter movies during science class on more than one occasion.

A student sleeping on his keyboard, even though a teacher was sitting at a desk in the same classroom.

No teacher-led reading program, even though at least 50 percent of the youthful offenders at the center have difficulties reading, and in some cases, can't read at all. (An ombudsman who regularly visits the center said the youths are supposed to use a computer-based reading program at their own pace, but he has seen no evidence that such a system has

Secret Jury To Hear Gang Case Summary (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Closing arguments are expected today in a gang-related racketeering and drug-trafficking case in the District in which the judge took the unusual step of appointing an anonymous jury.

Prosecutors say they want the names of the jurors to remain secret because the gang has tried to tamper with the judicial system, including impersonating a law-enforcement officer to kill a cooperating witness.

Gerald Eiland and Frederick Miller are among several men accused of running a drug organization and car-theft ring based in the District. They have pleaded not guilty.

Before the trial, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth sided with prosecutors seeking the anonymous jury, citing "strong reason to believe that the jury needs protection." The trial began in October.

Defense attorneys have opposed the idea of an anonymous jury, calling the move unnecessary and prejudicial.

Keeping jurors' identities secret "erodes the presumption of innocence," defense attorney John Carney wrote in a court memo to Judge Lamberth.

Anonymous juries were used in the District in the trials of drug kingpins Kevin Gray and Tommy Edelin.

David McCord, executive director of the National Jury Center at the American Judicature Society, said such juries in federal courts are a "relatively new phenomenon," dating to 1977.

Supporters say it's an acceptable practice in high-profile cases or when there are concerns about jurors being threatened or bribed.

"One of the things defendants worry about is since it's so out of the ordinary, jurors will think the defendants are particularly dangerous and they'll have a prejudice against them," Mr. McCord said.

The trial is taking place amid tightened security. Those in attendance must undergo the usual security screening at the door of the courthouse, and must repeat the process when they enter the courtroom.

The case has been separated into two groups of defendants. In an earlier trial, Corey Moore, the so-called "Teflon defendant," was acquitted.

Mr. Moore has been tried multiple times on murder charges, but in each case the charges were either dismissed or he was found not guilty by a jury.

Case Could Change Rules About Officers' Searches Of Laptops (SDUT)

By Matt Krasnowski, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 5, 2006

Computer data private, some say

LOS ANGELES – Michael Arnold appeared disheveled and nervous after he landed at Los Angeles International Airport last year on a flight from the Philippines, so a U.S. Customs and Border Protection officer pulled him aside for screening.

Officer Laura Peng also noted Arnold was traveling alone, court records state. She found a laptop computer in his luggage and asked him to start it. Stored inside, she said, she found images of him having sex with women, photographs of minors in sexually explicit poses and messages indicating he was trying to procure minors in the Philippines.

The 45-year-old former Anaheim schoolteacher was indicted on one count of transportation of child pornography and one count of child pornography possession. His arrest was heralded as a success for the federal government's Operation Predator campaign against criminals who prey on children.

But last month, a judge threw out the computer evidence against him, setting up a court battle in which a man accused of vile behavior could help determine how far border agents can go in searching people's computers and the future of some privacy rights.

It's an issue – spurred by advances in technology, and increased concerns about terrorism and border security – that some legal experts expect will end up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

U.S. District Judge Dean Pregerson ruled the border officer needed reasonable suspicion to search Arnold's computer because the machines can contain vast amounts of private information.

That same suspicion standard is required before border agents can conduct a body cavity search, X-rays or other invasive examinations.

"While not physically intrusive as in the case of a strip or body cavity search, the search of one's private and valuable personal information stored on a hard drive or other electronic storage device can be just as much, if not more, of an intrusion into the dignity and privacy interests of a person," Pregerson wrote.

Prosecutors contend border officers can search such items routinely, saying the computer search wasn't invasive or destructive but rather a standard inspection of a person at the border that courts have long supported.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, said prosecutors have filed a notice of appeal and will challenge Pregerson's ruling with the 9th U.S. District Court of Appeals.

Pregerson's decision conflicts with a 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision last year that deemed a border search of a laptop computer was reasonable and routine. But that case differs from the Arnold case because agents found that man possessed a photo album containing child pornography before they accessed his computer.

With the appeal, the prosecution of Arnold is on hold and border officers are free to continue searching computers as part of routine inspections.

Border computer searches have raised the concerns of international business travelers, who often fly with private business and personal information in their laptops. A recent survey by the Association of Corporate Travel Executives, which has 2,500 members worldwide, found that 87 percent of its members said they would be less likely to carry confidential business information on international trips after they learned how easily laptop contents could be searched.

Business travelers need to be "cognizant of the fact that U.S. customs takes the position that it has the right to review and download the contents of your laptop and all electronic media," said Susan Gurley, the association's executive director.

But if Pregerson's decision stands and is upheld by appellate courts, it could slap limits on how far agents can go when searching people at the border.

If officers are unable to come up with a significant reason to support the search, "the number of people they would be able to examine would go down appreciably," said Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor.

Kmiec and other experts say the issue eventually will need to be settled by the highest court in the land. And Kmiec said he expects Pregerson will be overturned.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the Supreme Court will review one of these cases," said Shaun Martin, a professor at the University of San Diego School of Law. "The issue is too important and it happens too often to let the results vary depending on what border you happen to cross or what circuit you're in."

Laptop Seizure Raises Concerns Over Firms' Data (LAT)

By James Gilden, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, November 5, 2006

Travel managers worry about what can happen to proprietary information at customs.

It may surprise many air travelers, but your laptop and its contents are far from secret at the nation's international airports. Increasingly, this is prompting new privacy concerns for business travelers.

Customs and Border Protection agents have the authority to search and seize laptop computers belonging to travelers entering the United States, those of U.S. citizens and foreigners alike. And they use it.

But just how far these officers can go in inspecting the contents of an overseas traveler's laptop is being tested in federal court.

In July 2005, Michael Timothy Arnold, then 43, of San Juan Capistrano arrived at Los Angeles International Airport after a nearly 20-hour flight from the Philippines, according to court documents.

After retrieving his luggage from baggage claim, he proceeded to the customs checkpoint. An agent selected him for additional screening because she was targeting single males between 20 and 59 who were returning from Asia.

After some secondary questioning, the agent inspected Arnold's luggage, including his laptop computer. She instructed Arnold to turn on the computer.

When the computer booted up, its desktop displayed the usual assortment of icons and folders, including two folders titled "Kodak Pictures" and "Kodak Memories." The agent and a colleague clicked on the folders and looked at photographs on the computer, including one of two nude women.

Special agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement were called in to question Arnold about the contents of his computer.

He was detained for several hours while they examined the computer, and they found numerous images depicting what they believed to be child pornography.

The agents confiscated the computer as well as a hard drive, some CDs and a flash drive and released Arnold. He was later arrested, jailed, held without bail until this week, and charged with transporting and possessing child pornography and attempting to engage in illicit conduct in a foreign place.

It is cases like Arnold's that have corporate travel managers up in arms — but not because of the pornography connection. Their concern is with what happens to the proprietary data that business travelers often carry on their laptops.

"That U.S. government officials have the right to examine, download or even seize business travelers' laptops came as a surprise to the majority of our members," said Susan Gurley, executive director of the Assn. of Corporate Travel Executives, an Alexandria, Va.-based trade group.

Eighty-six percent of members surveyed said that court decisions allowing government agents to seize computers at the borders were cause to limit the kind of proprietary information typically carried on executives' laptops. Two out of 155 members surveyed said they had an employee who had had a laptop seized.

The politics and the law behind the seizures are complicated, according to attorneys and court documents. The 4th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution protects citizens against unreasonable search and seizure. But the courts have given government agents more leeway to conduct searches at the border than inside the country.

For example, the courts have found that it is acceptable for border agents to search through the belongings of someone entering the country for no reason other than that he or she is entering the country. But if the search becomes more invasive, such as a pat-down or a body cavity search, then agents have to have probable cause.

It is at this nexus that the courts are trying to decide what constitutes reasonable when it comes to a laptop computer. After all, it could contain personal information, confidential business information, blueprints for terrorist attacks or child pornography.

A ruling last month by U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson of Los Angeles in the Arnold case may be the beginning of a shift in the courts.

In his opinion, the judge noted that "the information contained in a laptop and in electronic storage devices renders a search of their contents substantially more intrusive than a search of the contents of a lunchbox or other tangible object."

The court found that "a search of this type without reasonable suspicion goes well beyond the goals of the customs statutes and the reasonableness standard articulated in the 4th Amendment."

"While not physically intrusive as in the case of a strip or body cavity search, the search of one's private and valuable personal information stored on a hard drive or other electronic storage device can be just as much, if not more so, of an intrusion into the dignity and privacy interests of a person.

"This is because electronic storage devices function as an extension of our own memory. They are capable of storing our thoughts, ranging from the most whimsical to the most profound. Therefore government intrusion[s] into the mind … are no less deserving of 4th Amendment scrutiny than intrusions that are physical in nature."

As a result, the judge threw out laptop-related evidence against Arnold retrieved during the search, which may hurt the government's case. The government is appealing the judge's ruling, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

Arnold still faces federal child pornography charges, but he was released from federal custody this week on $50,000 bail.

The association of travel executives is not concerned as much with the constitutional questions as it is with the practical implications for business travelers.

It has tried to get answers from Customs and Border Protection about its policies regarding the search and seizure of laptops and measures taken to protect sensitive business information on them but has not received an answer to its queries, Executive Director Gurley said.

The Times e-mailed the agency questions including what its policies are regarding the protection of sensitive corporate data.

The agency responded with a statement saying, in part, that "officers adhere to all requirements to protect privileged, personal and business confidential information."

Said Gurley, "Our issue is whether the proprietary business information on the hard drive can be taken. Is it returned? Is it destroyed? We have not received any word from [the agency], not even 'Thank you very much, we have your request.'

"What's so difficult about giving the public this information?"

*

james.gilden@latimes.com

Lab Delays Hinder Crime-solving (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds

Monterey (CA) Herald, November 5, 2006

Crimes in Monterey County are going unsolved and prosecutions delayed as piles of unprocessed evidence grow higher in the county's primary crime lab, law enforcement officials say.

In some cases, The Herald has found, more than a year passed before fingerprints were processed, leaving detectives frustrated and criminals walking free.

"The delay in processing evidence is a year and a half," Undersheriff Nancy Cuffney said.

"There have been delays," said Seaside police Capt. Steve Cercone, who sends fingerprints to the lab. "But we do understand that staffing shortages are the reason for it."

The lab is so badly understaffed -- down from five employees to two -- that arrests have had to wait as crimes go unsolved for more than a year.

In one example, a fingerprint was lifted in an April 2005 larceny case, but the print was not processed until June 2006. In the interim, investigators say, the same man had moved on from nonviolent fraud to carjacking.

"It does affect public safety," said Cmdr. Malcolm Gray, head of investigations at the Monterey County Sheriff's Office. "If we can't get evidence to help ID suspects, to tie suspects to cases, people are out on the street longer than they should be."

Detectives around the county complain that backlogs in the forensic services crime lab mean arrests aren't being made when they should.

Law enforcement personnel described cases such as a 12-month delay in running fingerprints for an attempted murder case.

The Herald asked the Sheriff's Office whether specific cases have been affected by the delays. After initial assurances of cooperation, sheriff's officials, including Sheriff Mike Kanalakis, opted not to provide case details or allow interviews with lab staff.

Staffing levels|

Hidden in a small, crowded room in the sheriff building's basement on Natividad Road, the lab is mostly invisible to the general public. Several desks take up space but sit empty.

Staffing levels at the lab have fallen from five full-time staff members to two in little more than a year. One position was eliminated, and two vacancies have remained unfilled.

But the work done in that small room is critical to the county's criminal justice system.

The lab processes serious crime evidence from across the county for the Sheriff's Office, and handles the latent fingerprint work for Seaside, Pacific Grove, Monterey and Marina police departments. The city of Salinas has its own forensic evidence department.

Latent print work is a skilled specialty. Unlike the inked prints taken at the Department of Motor Vehicles, latent fingerprints can usually be seen only after certain chemicals are applied. As such, they are fragile things.

A latent print examiner must not only be an expert at processing, preserving and identifying prints, but be skilled at presenting "expert witness" testimony in court.

On top of that, for an identification to be considered valid, a print must be verified by more than one examiner.

With only two full-time print examiners on staff, that often means long hours for lab supervisor Victor Lurz and evidence technician Georgine Scott, both of whom are on call 24 hours a day, according to police agencies that work with the lab.

Officials warn that public safety has been compromised by the backlogs, and not only because arrests have been delayed.

Gray said prosecutors are reluctant to file charges if the forensic evidence isn't ready.

"Even the cases that we file (with the District Attorney) -- if we can't get the evidence fast enough, they kick the cases back to us," Gray said.

"This happens all the time," said Chief Assistant District Attorney Terry Spitz. "When we get into the more serious felonies, we're going to be sending back memos -- 'Please run that out to the lab.'"

Assistant District Attorney Berkley Brannon said he wasn't aware of any complaints from prosecutors about the delays, but said his office often waits to file charges when forensic evidence is lacking.

Spitz said that in misdemeanor cases, a suspect might even be released, at least until the evidence comes in.

"If he's not a danger to the public, we'll say 'Let him go,'" Spitz said.

The delays mean that lesser crimes tend to fall off the radar, which can frustrate detectives.

"We have to set our threshold higher," Gray said. "It slows the whole process down. Our guys are screaming for evidence results, but we have other priorities," he said.

Detectives end up not even trying to take some cases to court, he said.

"We can't work all the cases."

Monterey police Lt. Leslie Sonné said the delays have had an effect on her department.

"It impacts every level of the investigation," Sonné said. "If a print is matched to someone, it would be nice to go after someone before they commit another crime. There's nothing we can do about it but hope they can generate some staff."

The city of Monterey, she said, is the lab's biggest customer.

Outside of police circles, the problem hasn't gotten much attention, in part because authorities have been reluctant to talk about it.

It took a few years to get this bad.

Forensic services everywhere have diminished during the past five to 10 years, said Pacific Grove police Lt. Tom Uretsky.

"It's a slow creep, not an acute problem," he said. "You gradually stop doing the things you used to do."

Officers say crime victims today expect evidence to be processed faster than ever, thanks to programs such as "CSI," where the latest high-tech equipment abounds and budget cuts seem nonexistent.

"Forensics are huge in law enforcement these days," Sonné said. "Unfortunately because of TV shows, the public expects results in an hour."

Spitz agreed that people don't realize that fingerprint experts cost money.

"They don't talk about that on CSI," he said.

The high cost of living in Monterey County and pay rates for the lab's skilled positions don't help.

Though the county's fingerprint experts aren't the worst paid in the nation or California, their salaries are far from the highest.

"It's what the county is willing to cough up," said Gray. "We cannot get people to come here to work."

In the current job posting for a latent fingerprint/crime scene examiner, Monterey County offers from $51,732 to $70,644 annually.

For a similar position, Santa Clara County offers from $62,531.04 to $75,653.76 annually. San Mateo County pays up to $75,300.

A few states, with lower costs of living than California, offer even more. Police in Las Vegas will pay up to $79,306 for a latent fingerprint examiner, while in August, the state of Colorado offered up to $89,568.

Private industry pays the most, with some companies offering upward of six figures.

DOJ_NMG_0091035

Shortages in police agencies|

Some local police agencies have been too busy coping with staff shortages to raise their voices about the county's vacancies.

Monterey, for instance, is down by 13 officers, Sonné said.

Pacific Grove is also suffering an officer shortage.

"We're not submitting enough fingerprints to say 'Gee, hurry up.'" Uretsky said. "We'll soon be four officers down... Our priority is to keep staffing levels where they are."

When serious crimes such as murder or attempted murder take place in Pacific Grove, Uretsky said his department calls in the state's Department of Justice.

"We call the Sheriff's Office to photograph the scene but the DOJ to process the crime scene," he said. "They lift the prints, drive them to Sacramento and immediately run them. That's what they do for a living."

But that solution, he said, only works with the most serious crimes.

"At the DOJ, if it's not a homicide, they'll get to it when they get to it," Uretsky said. "They're also very short-handed."

It took two years, he said, for the state to return a DNA "hit" on a Pacific Grove rape and assault case.

Other agencies, such as Seaside, are trying to improve their ability to pick up some of Monterey County's case load. Capt. Steve Cercone said his department recently hired a police services assistant who will be qualified in six months to a year to process evidence.

"It will take some of the workload off the Sheriff's Office," he said. "We can only do so much."

The sheriff's forensic lab does all it can, Cercone said, to accommodate Seaside's most urgent requests.

Uretsky's admiration for the lab's remaining staff members borders on reverence.

"I've got nothing but praise for those two," he said.

Sonné said the lab's workers are often roused on days off to process crime scenes.

Gray described a recent Saturday when every Sheriff's Office detective was dispatched to the scene of a stabbing murder in Castroville. Staff shortages meant that detectives and lab staff could work on nothing else.

"With that evidence, everything else gets dropped," Gray said. "You have physical evidence that has to be processed. You can't just leave it."

For many crimes, the county will likely struggle with evidence backlogs for the foreseeable future, as the downsized lab tackles a case load handled by five people only a few years ago.

"We'll sure keep our fingers crossed for the county crime lab," Sonné said. "They sure can use some relief."

CIVIL LAW

A Powerful Voice In Patent Disputes (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

When it comes to patent law, who is the ultimate authority? Is it the Supreme Court? Or the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialty court for patent and trademark law established by Congress in 1982?

Actually, it's none of the above. But before I reveal the correct answer, let me congratulate you for having read this far beyond the words "patent law." This eye-glazing technical topic has been known to send even people who like tax law screaming from the room. That you may still be interested shows a commendable understanding of patent law's significance, notwithstanding its arcane nature.

After all, the Founding Fathers didn't think patents were boring. They recognized that secure intellectual property would be a pillar of the national economy they hoped to create. Thus, the Constitution, "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts," specified the legal recognition of patents and copyrights as an exclusive function of the federal government.

Making sure that patent rights are strong enough so that inventors have incentives to innovate, but not so strong that they create inappropriate monopolies on widely applicable technology, is a legal balancing act that determines the flow of billions of dollars each year. Just ask corporate giants such as Microsoft, AT&T or eBay, whose names appear on the list of litigants in recent Supreme Court patent cases.

Abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty grab headlines. But when it comes to impact on the jobs and consumer choices available to everyday Americans, patent law probably matters more.

End of lecture. Now back to the mini-quiz. Arguably, the real power in patent law these days is not a court at all, but the Office of the Solicitor General, the Justice Department lawyer who represents the federal government before the Supreme Court. In the 10 Supreme Court patent cases in which the solicitor general has participated since 1995, the SG is undefeated, according to a recent study by Jonathan Franklin, a Supreme Court specialist at the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski.

What's behind the court's deference to the executive branch? In part, say patent law specialists, it appears that the justices are increasingly second-guessing the rulings of the Federal Circuit, which was designed to help clean up patent law by concentrating all federal appeals in a single expert body. From the Federal Circuit's inception until the mid-'90s, the justices seemed content to let it call the shots. But as the information technology revolution has spread, the high court has shown a willingness to review decisions of the Federal Circuit, whose critics say it is too favorable to patent holders.

None of the justices are experts on patent law. Thus, they lean heavily on the expertise of the solicitor general, who receives plenty of input from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Federal Trade Commission and others within the executive branch.

"In many areas of law that are highly technical, the court looks to the government to help find its way," said John F. Duffy, professor of patent law at George Washington University. "The Supreme Court is not leading. It is choosing between two specialists: the PTO and the Federal Circuit."

Duffy notes that patent cases account for about a fifth of the 10 to 20 appeals per year in which the court asks for the views of the solicitor general before it decides whether or not to hear the case.

The justices have agreed to hear three patent cases this year. The most significant may be KSR International v. Teleflex, No. 04-1350, scheduled for argument on Nov. 28. At issue is the proper meaning of "obvious" in patent law. You can only patent something if it's really an original invention. It can't be something so obvious that anyone could have slapped it together. The question, though, is how obvious that is.

KSR makes gas pedals for General Motors and other car manufacturers. Its accelerators are adjustable, so they can be made higher or lower depending on how long the driver's legs are, and are linked to an electronic sensor that modern cars use to control the throttle, instead of a cable as in the old days. Teleflex, represented by Supreme Court specialist Thomas C. Goldstein, says KSR is infringing its patent on this combination; KSR says, in essence, that it is simply building something anyone familiar with the technologies could have made. A federal district judge sided with KSR, but the Federal Circuit reversed that decision and said Teleflex's device was non-obvious, and thus patentable.

To Duffy, who represents KSR in the Supreme Court, the Federal Circuit's ruling has no basis in the text of the relevant patent statute and is typical, he says, of how "junky patents are clogging up the system." Teleflex's brief responds that its device is "new and previously unforeseen" and that the Federal Circuit applied a "flexible" standard of obviousness in concluding that the company was entitled to a trial on its claim of infringement.

The court's decision will not only determine this critical point of patent law doctrine, it could also affect how much car and truck buyers have to pay for vehicles with adjustable accelerator gizmos, which, among other uses, help short people drive big rigs. If you think that's not a big deal, many folks disagree with you: Some 37 different friend-of-the-court briefs have been filed on behalf of one side or the other -- three more than have been filed in the blockbuster case on the federal partial birth abortion ban, which will be heard on Wednesday.

Of course, if Franklin's analysis holds, the brief that matters most is the solicitor general's, filed on KSR's side. Obviously, there's a lot more to patent law than you thought.

Judge To Rule On Hughes Estate Claims (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091037

Nearly 30 years after jurors declared that a will left by Howard Hughes that gave a fortune to a Utah gas station owner was fake, Melvin Dummar is back in court claiming he was cheated out of a share in the billionaire's estate.

Hughes was the reclusive industrialist whose eccentricities were recorded in the 2004 movie The Aviator. He was world-famous as a dashing flier, aircraft builder, Hollywood producer and Nevada casino owner with an eye for women. Phobic about germs late in life, he had a habit of walking around naked in the penthouse at Las Vegas' Desert Inn, where he lived from 1966 to 1970.

Several weeks after Hughes died at age 70 in 1976, a will purportedly in his handwriting was discovered on a desk in the Salt Lake City headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. News media went wild over the surprising bequest of $156 million to the obscure Dummar.

Dummar explained to reporters who descended on his gas station in Willard, Utah, that Hughes must have acted to repay him for rescuing a beaten and bleeding Hughes from a roadside ditch in the Nevada desert in December 1967. Dummar says he drove Hughes to a Las Vegas hotel.

The so-called Mormon will gave one-sixteenth of Hughes' $2.5 billion holdings to Dummar. The will was one of dozens that surfaced after Hughes died. None was declared valid by courts.

Nevada and Texas juries decided in 1978 that the will was a forgery. Now, Dummar, 62, says a new witness came forward in 2004 who can confirm his story. He revived the half-forgotten case in June by filing a complaint of fraud and racketeering in federal court against Hughes heir William Lummis, 85, and Frank Gay, 77, former chief operating officer of Hughes' companies.

U.S. District Judge Bruce Jenkins suggested in a hearing Thursday in Salt Lake City that he'll rule this week on motions to dismiss Dummar's suit because he waited too long to return to court.

In 1976, Dummar at first said the news of his windfall surprised him. Then his fingerprint was found on the envelope containing the will. During a seven-month trial over the will's validity, Dummar said he had delivered the document to the church on instructions of a “confidential agent” of Hughes who brought the will to his gas station.

Under Texas law for those who die without a will, all of Hughes' empire went to Lummis, a first cousin from Houston.

Dummar alleges that Lummis and Gay pressured Hughes employees to testify falsely at the 1977-78 Nevada trial that Hughes never left the Desert Inn in December 1967, so he could not have been rescued.

Knut Rife, a lawyer for Dummar, says the defendants owe Dummar $156 million plus interest since 1978 — a total of $500 million.

Though Dummar still says the will was valid, he says he's not trying again to win a piece of Hughes' estate. That was divided long ago between Lummis and the IRS. He's suing for damages, alleging that Lummis and Gay solicited perjury and obstructed justice.

“For almost 30 years, Melvin Dummar has been thought of as a fraud or a con artist or a forger,” says Stuart Stein, another lawyer for Dummar. “He had his life ruined by this.”

Dummar says: “I just want to clear my name. I guess in a case like this you have to put some kind of monetary value on it, but it has more to do with your pride and reputation.”

Hollywood turned Dummar's thwarted dream of sudden riches into the 1980 film Melvin and Howard.

Dummar was in court Thursday as lawyers for Lummis and Gay denied wrongdoing and argued that Dummar had sued decades too late.

“You only get one bite of the apple,” says Peggy Tomsic, a lawyer for Gay. Besides, she says, “almost every potential material witness is dead. All of the documents, including the alleged original handwritten will of Mr. Hughes, are gone.”

Dummar's lawyers say there should be a new trial because evidence of alleged fraud didn't turn up until 2004. That's when retired Hughes aviation executive Guido Roberto Deiro read an article about Dummar and volunteered to be a witness for him.

In that article, Dummar detailed the location of his encounter with Hughes as 6 miles from the Cottontail Ranch, a legal brothel in Lida Junction, Nev. Deiro says in court documents that as manager of the Hughes-owned North Las Vegas Airport, he piloted the billionaire to the Cottontail Ranch one night between Christmas and New Year's Eve of 1967 but lost track of him.

The holiday-season trip was the last of four flights to brothels he made with Hughes, Deiro says. He says he never saw or spoke to Hughes again.

DOJ_NMG_0091038

Dummar now lives in Brigham City, Utah, with his second wife. He's self-employed, delivering meat and seafood to Nevada and Utah ranches.

Stein, Dummar's lawyer, says he's encouraged after last week's hearing. “The first thing is to rehabilitate Mr. Dummar's reputation,” he says. “I think I've accomplished that, no matter what the judge does.”

CIVIL RIGHTS

State GOP: Missing Voting Machine Cards In Memphis Could Be Used Fraudulently (AP)

AP, November 5, 2006

MEMPHIS — Tennessee's Republican Party chairman complained to Shelby County election officials that electronic voting machine cards were missing in Memphis, the hometown of Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Harold Ford Jr.

"It has come to our attention that several smart cards used in early voting are missing from at least one early voting site in Memphis, Tenn.," Bob Davis Jr. said in a letter dated Thursday. "The lack of oversight and control over these smart cards has created a situation which could allow for voter fraud."

The letter called on the commission to "locate these missing smart cards as soon as possible."

Tennessee Election Coordinator Brook Thompson said Friday that even if the cards aren't recovered, there is no danger of fraud.

"The cards are programmed such that once you use them, they cannot be reused until they are reactivated by the Election Commission," he said.

Shelby County Election Commission administrator James Johnson didn't immediately return calls seeking comment and wasn't in the office when a reporter stopped by to ask him about the complaint.

Chris Devaney, the state GOP's executive director, disagreed with Thompson's assertion that a smart card couldn't be reactivated and used fraudulently.

He said GOP poll watchers at the Bishop-Byrne precinct reported 12 cards missing.

"We want the Shelby (election) commission to investigate it," Devaney said.

Ford, a five-term congressman who faces Republican Bob Corker of Chattanooga in the Tuesday election, said he would ask the Shelby County district attorney and sheriff to step aside from the investigation because they are co-chairing Corker's campaign.

"They are good people, both, but they should recuse themselves," Ford said. "If we have to ask the Justice Department to come in and oversee this, we may have to. It's unfortunate that these things happen, but we have authorities — and hopefully independent authorities — that will come in and correct the record." •

IPod Friendly Program Will Monitor Election Complaints (LAWJW)

Lawrence Journal-World, November 6, 2006

A federal prosecutor will be available during Tuesday’s election to respond to reports of possible election fraud and voting rights violations in Kansas.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Leon Patton will be available as part of the Justice Department’s nationwide Election Day program, which is an effort to increase the department’s ability to deter election fraud and discrimination at the polls.

Patton can be reached at (913) 551-6730 while the polls are open.

Complaints also can be made to the Civil Rights Division’s Voting Section in Washington, D.C., at (800) 253-3931 or (202) 307-2767.

A New Breed Of Watchdog For Election Day By JUNE KRONHOLZ (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

When Americans go to vote tomorrow, a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus.

DOJ_NMG_0091039

Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it.

"This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," predicts Marybeth Kuznik, who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania. Ms. Kuznik, a former arts educator, calls herself a "progressive," but says VotePA includes members of both major parties, two minor parties and independents.

Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count.

"I don't care who wins; I just want to know it's democracy," says Warren Stewart, policy director of VoteTrustUSA, an umbrella for 70 grass-roots groups, like VotePA, that lobby legislators and warn voters about election issues.

Two of the bigger groups -- the Election Protection Coalition and Voter Action -- will staff call centers where they will field voter complaints to their 866-OUR-VOTE and 888-SAV-VOTE numbers and dispatch lawyers to any trouble spots. Video the Vote is enlisting "citizen journalists" to film polling-place problems. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way are among Election Protection's members. Voter Action is a legal-rights group started by California lawyer Lowell Finley, who sued voting-machine maker Diebold Inc. over software security; Diebold recently paid $2.6 million to California as part of a settlement of the suit.

Pollworkers for Democracy -- a joint project of VoteTrustUSA, and two groups who often support progressive causes, Mainstreet Moms and Working Assets -- is asking election workers to report voting problems to the group after finishing their precinct shifts to provide evidence for potential lawsuits and recounts. And dozens of small, grass-roots groups will be watching polling stations, elections offices and tabulation centers.

"This is so important," says Bo Lipari, who retired at age 53 from his job as an Ithaca, N.Y., software engineer to start a watchdog group called New Yorkers for Verified Voting. Mr. Lipari describes his group as "strictly nonpartisan" and won't discuss his party affiliation. On Election Day, Mr. Lipari says he will be a poll watcher in Saratoga County, one of the few in New York using electronic voting equipment.

The goal of these groups is both to untangle snarls -- Election Protection's lawyers will ask state courts to keep polls open if there are glitches, for example -- and to document problems, alert the media and gather plaintiffs for possible recount demands and lawsuits.

These groups are on heightened alert because of the new voting equipment and registration databases put in place this year to satisfy the Help America Vote Act or Hava. That 2002 legislation offered voting jurisdictions $3.8 billion to replace their punch-card and lever voting machines. It also required states to put together voter databases in an effort to clear up questions about who is eligible to cast a ballot.

As a result, about 55 million voters will be casting ballots on new voting systems this election, and 22 million of them will be using touch-screen machines in a federal election for the first time. New voter databases also are heightening activists' worries. States compiled the lists by consolidating their county voter-registration lists, then cross-checking them with Social Security and driver-license databases to weed out voters who have died, moved or lost their voting rights.

Democrats fear the untested databases have mistakenly purged the poor and minorities -- generally Democratic constituencies -- while Republicans fear they will contain names of ineligible voters, particularly illegal immigrants, whose votes also could benefit Democrats. The watchdog groups, meanwhile, worry that database mix-ups will create long lines that cause voters to leave before casting a ballot.

For many activists, Election Day is only one more step in a long election-integrity campaign that started when counties began buying touch screens with their new federal money. The machines -- which about 38% of all voters will use tomorrow -- operate much like a bank ATM, leading voters through several prompts and tabulating votes on an internal memory card.

The voting-machine companies, led by Ohio's Diebold, insist the touch screens are tamper-proof and that they prevent voters from making the kinds of errors -- like voting twice for the same office -- that typically disqualify thousands of ballots. The problem, the companies say, is with poorly trained poll workers, not the machines.

DOJ_NMG_0091040

Some computer experts quickly began warning that the touch screens are vulnerable to fraud and software glitches, but the issue simmered largely online, and largely unnoticed, until the 2004 elections.

VoteTrustUSA's Mr. Stewart, a San Francisco cellist, says he hadn't been politically active since he stuffed envelopes for George McGovern in 1972, but became alarmed after reading about problems in the 2004 count in Ohio. "I could accept it if my candidate lost," he says, but not that polling-place errors might have changed the outcome. Mr. Stewart won't disclose his voter registration.

He joined an ad hoc group seeking recounts in several states and was assigned to analyze the results in New Mexico where there were 21,000 "under votes" -- that is, 21,000 more ballots distributed than votes cast. After comparing the under votes by precinct, voter demographics and how they were cast, Mr. Stewart says he concluded that almost all were from two early-model electronic voting machines that still are in use in nine states. He quit the California Bach Society, where he was the conductor, and helped start VoteTrustUSA, which he describes as "three people and a Web site, making a lot of noise."

The 2004 Ohio vote also energized Mark Halvorson, who says he was mystified why there were groups focused on voter registration, but none whose mission was the integrity of the poll. "I felt compelled to do something," says Mr. Halvorson, who quit his job as a social worker to launch Citizens for Election Integrity Minnesota, which is affiliated with VoteTrustUSA.

Many election-activist groups have registered as lobbyists or nonprofit charities, which allow them to raise money. But most say they operate on a shoestring with donations from their members. Susan Pynchon, who abandoned her real-estate career to start the Florida Fair Elections Coalition, says she finances her group's work out of rental income from several properties she owns. Ms. Pynchon says she doesn't "allow political statements" from the group's members, and that she claims no party affiliation on her voter registration.

Partly because of activists' pressure, 17 states now require that touch-screen machines record votes on paper documents that may be used in recounts. A House bill that would require a similar paper trail in federal elections has 219 sponsors. "The energy, the motivation is not top down, it's bottom up," says Rep. Rush Holt, a New Jersey Democrat who introduced the bill.

Mr. Halvorson's Minnesota group helped press the state Legislature to increase the number of precincts where election officials routinely hand-count the ballots and compare them with vote totals on scanners -- electronic voting machines that read hand-marked ballots. Currently, 13 states require random audits.

Also on the activists' agenda: voting-machine certification. As it is, voting-machine makers choose the labs that test their touch screens and the software that runs them. Activists want the government involved, and want outside experts to be able to scrutinize the software for security holes. A new federal Election Assistance Commission mandated by Hava is scheduled to issue new guidelines by the 2008 vote.

Eastern Kentucky School District Facing Civil Rights Inquiry (AP)

AP, November 5, 2006

LLOYD, Ky. - An eastern Kentucky school district faces a federal civil rights inquiry, attorneys for the school system said.

The Greenup County School District and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Civil Rights have exchanged preliminary materials, but the agency has not scheduled a visit to the area, said Michael J. Schmitt, an attorney for the school district.

School officials wouldn't say what the nature of the inquiry is. Greenup Superintendent John Younce would neither confirm nor deny that an inquiry is under way or that federal officials are planning a visit to the district.

The investigation is the second of the school district in the last two years. In 2005, the school district faced of racial discrimination against Greenup County High School principal Randall Peffer.

Peffer was accused of using racially derogatory comments, discriminating against students, limiting the time of black players on the basketball team and grading black students more strictly than white students.

A report issued at the conclusion of that inquiry cleared Peffer of the allegations, but said that he had been disciplined for using a racially offensive remark.

ANTITRUST

DOJ_NMG_0091041

Morgan Stanley And Visa Settle Dispute (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

Morgan Stanley and Visa Europe have agreed to settle a long-running antitrust dispute, in a move that could bring to an end a six-year competition probe by the European Commission into the credit card group.

The dispute broke out after Visa refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network. The US investment bank had wanted to offer card services to shops and merchants in the European Union. However, Visa denied it access to its network, pointing to the fact that Morgan Stanley runs the Discover card in the US in competition with Visa.

Morgan Stanley in 2000 filed a complaint to the Commission, which opened an investigation and in August 2004 issued formal charges against Visa accusing it of abusing a dominant market position. The credit card group has been waiting for a final decision, and a possible antitrust fine, ever since.

According to executives from both groups, Visa and Morgan Stanley have now agreed to bury the hatchet. Morgan Stanley has become a member of the Visa card network, and in return has withdrawn its formal antitrust complaint to the Commission.

The move follows last month's decision by Visa Europe to split from the Visa group's international operations.

While Visa International decided to turn itself into a publicly-listed company, Visa Europe plans to retain its structure as an association owned and run by its member banks.

Charlotte Hogg, managing director of Morgan Stanley's consumer banking group international, said: "I can confirm that Morgan Stanley Bank has become a member of Visa Europe and that we have withdrawn our complaint to the European Commission about exclusion from membership of Visa Europe."

Visa Europe said: "We are very pleased that we have reached an amicable agreement with Morgan Stanley and have informed the European Commission about this new development."

The Commission declined to comment on the move. Formally speaking, the settlement between Visa and Morgan Stanley has no impact on the probe, although in practice it will be very difficult for the regulator to pursue an infringement already addressed by the parties.

Should the deal with Morgan Stanley force the Commission to abandon its probe, it would remove the threat to Visa Europe of a fine of up to 10 per cent of its global annual turnover.

However, Visa and its rival MasterCard still face pressure from the Commission to slash the fees they demand from retailers.

Although Visa agreed in 2002 to lower these "interchange fees", a recent Commission sector probe again hit out at what it describes as "excessive" charges.

CVS's Deal Maker Faces Toughest Test Integrating Caremark (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz, David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

CVS Corp.'s $21 billion pact to buy Caremark Rx Inc. marks the biggest gamble yet for Thomas Ryan, the CVS chief who will lead the new company.

A 54-year-old former pharmacist, Mr. Ryan has helped build CVS from a regional drugstore chain into a national giant by buying rivals such as Revco DS Inc., Eckerd and Albertsons Inc.'s Save-On and Osco stores. Since ascending to the CEO and president posts at CVS in 1998, he has more than doubled the number of CVS stores to about 6,200. Sales are now $37 billion, up from $15 billion when he took over.

Mr. Ryan is a savvy manager with a talent for overhauling and integrating sagging drugstore chains. But the Caremark deal, which would create a behemoth with $75 billion in annual revenue, represents a bigger deal than any he has tried before and CVS's first major acquisition of a company that isn't another drugstore chain.

Mr. Ryan will be walking a fine line: Caremark and other pharmacy-benefit managers, known as PBMs, get the best possible deal on prescription drugs for their customers, typically big companies or health insurers. Some skeptics of the CVS-

DOJ_NMG_0091042

Caremark combination wonder whether Caremark's customers will still get the lowest possible drug prices after a drugstore company takes control.

Mr. Ryan is quick to dismiss concerns about a conflict of interest between operating both a profit-driven pharmacy and a PBM. In an interview, he noted that CVS already owns a PBM, which will be rolled into Caremark's operations as part of the merger. He said potential conflicts of interest haven't prevented big clients, such as DaimlerChrysler AG, from signing up with CVS's PBM, PharmaCare.

"It's a natural concern," Mr. Ryan says, adding that the combined company has to offer low prices if it expects to get new business. "No one will beat us on cost when we go to market," he says. So far, Caremark customers have been supportive of the proposed deal, he adds.

Mr. Ryan says he is transforming the drugstore chain into a complete health-care provider. CVS's other recent acquisitions include MinuteClinic, of Minneapolis, which operates in-store health clinics, where nurses treat strep throat, ear and sinus infections and other minor illnesses. He has "figured out that it's good to be a consumer company, but more important to be a health care company," says John Ransom, an analyst at Raymond James Financial Inc., in St. Petersburg, Fla.

Along the way, Mr. Ryan has persuaded the CVS board to "follow him on tough decisions," says Terrence Murray, former chief at FleetBoston Financial Corp. and a CVS board member. He says Mr. Ryan has a "sense of not only where his company is going but where the industry is going."

Mr. Ryan still needs to sell investors on the Caremark deal: He is scheduled to hit the road and meet with big shareholders this week. Some Caremark shareholders are grumbling that the purchase price is too low; some wonder if the sale is driven by weakness in Caremark's business. And despite Mr. Ryan's past successes, some investors worry he may be overextending himself and CVS.

The son of a machinist and a homemaker from New Jersey, Mr. Ryan joined CVS in 1974 as an intern when he was a pharmacy major at the University of Rhode Island. A professor recommended he interview at a CVS store in Woonsocket, some 45 miles away from campus. "I didn't know what CVS was or where Woonsocket was," Mr. Ryan says. He borrowed a fraternity brother's tie and got the job. The man who hired him later told him why: He was the only candidate who wore a tie.

CVS's roots go back to Stanley and Sid Goldstein, two Woonsocket brothers who started out supplying health-and-beauty products to retailers. In 1963, in Lowell, Mass., they and a partner, Ralph Hoagland, opened the first "Consumer Value Store" selling these products to the public at a discount -- an operation the retail conglomerate Melville Corp. bought three years later.

By 1996, CVS was the best-performing company in the Melville portfolio, with hundreds of stores. In that year, Melville, led by Stanley Goldstein, then its CEO, sold or spun off everything but the drugstores and renamed the remaining company CVS Corp. Meanwhile, Mr. Ryan, handpicked by Mr. Goldstein to run CVS's pharmacy division when he was only 29, was catapulting up the CVS ranks.

Mr. Goldstein recalls being impressed with Mr. Ryan's "ability to frame issues and keep it simple. ...He had that ability to slough off the superfluous stuff that people throw up as roadblocks." Mr. Goldstein handed the CEO reins to Mr. Ryan in 1998 and retired from the CVS board in May.

CVS under Mr. Ryan has cultivated Rhode Island state officials. Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Almond says he and Mr. Ryan spent hours cajoling state legislators to cough up a total of $23 million in cash for an 8,000-seat, $54 million gym and convocation center at the University of Rhode Island.

"There are some guys who just have a knack," says Mr. Almond. "A lot of it has to do with Tom's personality. He is easygoing and doesn't come across as a guy who knows it all. He talks with you, not down to you." The new facility was christened the "Ryan Center" in 2002 after the CVS chief donated $2 million and CVS gave $3 million.

University of Rhode Island President Robert Carothers recalls how Mr. Ryan visited a hold-out legislator, entering the office and closing the door. "When they came out, [the legislator] was supporting the project," he recalls. "I don't know what he said." Asked about the conversation, Mr. Ryan says he told the legislator, "you are going to see some great basketball games."

CVS's relations with state legislators, however, have embroiled it in an influence-peddling scandal that began after some legislators turned up on CVS's corporate payrolls.

DOJ_NMG_0091043

The scandal, dug up by the Providence Journal, has so far resulted in the resignations of two senators. One senator pleaded guilty last year to federal criminal charges, acknowledging he was paid by CVS as a consultant at the same time he opposed or killed legislation designed to relax insurer limits on customers' choice of pharmacy chains.

At CVS, a senior vice president and a government-affairs official were placed on leave. The fallout hasn't affected CVS earnings, and there are no indications the probe reached Mr. Ryan.

Mr. Ryan's biggest accomplishment has been to change the appearance of CVS stores, highlighting cosmetics and beauty products to make the stores more "female-friendly," says Mr. Ransom, the analyst. Mr. Ryan also introduced "ExtraCare" cards, which CVS says is the first loyalty card -- essentially a frequent-flier program -- for drugstore shoppers.

Also, under Mr. Ryan, new CVS stores are almost all free-standing, with wide aisles and drive-through pharmacy windows. These stores generate higher sales than older stores in cities and malls.

"I've been with him [on golf trips] in Hilton Head where he pops into CVS stores to talk to people," says Paul J. Choquette Jr., a friend and the chairman of Gilbane Inc., a Rhode Island builder. "He's always thinking about how he can move CVS ahead."

Five years ago, Mr. Ryan oversaw an overhaul of computer technology at CVS. When CVS was working on a plan to reduce customer wait times for prescription drugs, Mr. Ryan says he was frustrated that the company couldn't figure out how long customers were actually waiting. With new technology, Mr. Ryan says he can instantly check wait times in any CVS store.

Because CVS was growing into a national chain, even small changes around the margins have a big effect on profits, he says. For instance, CVS now can track whether the location of an item within a store makes it more likely to be stolen. The company can direct store managers to move heavily stolen items to more protected areas.

Mr. Murray, the board member, says Mr. Ryan wisely recognized that technology "was not a natural strength of his," and so he hired a smart team to handle the conversions. "That of course, is the key to a great executive, to understand his own strengths and weaknesses and to shore up when necessary," he says.

Analysts say CVS stores under Mr. Ryan have become hipper than those of its Midwestern rival, Walgreen Co., of Deerfield, Ill. CVS recently held an analysts day at a swank New York hotel, inviting Chistophe, the Beverly Hills hairdresser, to demonstrate hair products.

Regulators Clear Google's YouTube Deal (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

U.S. antitrust regulators cleared Google Inc.'s $1.65 billion purchase of online video-sharing company YouTube Inc., based on a document published Friday.

No other details were available.

A transaction involving Google and YouTube was listed on the Federal Trade Commission's daily publication of transactions whose reviews have been terminated.

Google, Mountain View, Calif., agreed early last month to acquire YouTube, of San Mateo, Calif., from its founders for $1.65 billion in stock. On Tuesday, the FTC approved related transactions between Google and YouTube's co-founders Steve Chen and Chad Hurley, who started the venture in Mr. Hurley's garage last year. Also Tuesday, the Justice Department gave its approval to Google's bid for YouTube.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS

Report: Feds Refusing FBI Terror Cases (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, November 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department increasingly has refused to prosecute FBI cases targeting suspected terrorists over the past five years, according to private researchers who reviewed department records.

The government says the findings are inaccurate and "intellectually dishonest."

DOJ_NMG_0091044

The report being released Monday by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University raises questions about the quality of the FBI's investigations.

Prosecutors declined to bring charges in 131 of 150, or 87 percent, of international terrorist case referrals from the FBI between October 2005 and June 2006, according to the report. The study was based on the most recent data available from the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys.

That number marks the peak of generally steady increases from the 2001 budget year, when prosecutors rejected 33 percent of such cases from the FBI, according to the report.

The data "raise troubling questions about the bureau's investigation of criminal matters involving individuals the government has identified as international terrorists," the report said.

It noted that prosecutions in traditional FBI investigations since 2001 _ including drug cases, white collar crimes and organized crimes _ have decreased while the number of agents and other employees has risen.

"So with more special agents, many more intelligence analysts, and many fewer prosecutions the question must be asked: What is the FBI doing?" the report said.

A Justice Department spokesman disputed the data highlighted by the Syracuse researchers, noting that terrorist hoax cases that were quickly dismissed may have been included in the government data.

Additionally, some cases are referred to prosecutors to obtain subpoenas or other legal orders in investigations that ultimately never result in criminal charges, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. He said prosecutors rejected 67 percent of FBI international terrorist cases in the nine-month period _ not 87 percent.

The FBI's assistant director, John Miller, said the low number of cases prosecuted reflects changes in how investigations have been conducted since the Sept. 11 attacks. He said about half of the FBI's resources go to detection and information gathering of terrorist networks in cases that do not always result in arrests.

"It's not about the numbers and for TRAC to suggest as much is to be intellectually dishonest," Miller said.

He added: "The FBI has been very clear about how we have changed the way we do business since 9/11."

TRAC co-director Susan Long said researchers merely relied on the Justice Department's own numbers to come up with the conclusions.

Justice Dept. Disputes Report On Terror Cases (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal prosecutors rejected 87% of the international terrorism cases brought by the FBI during the first nine months of fiscal year 2006, a Syracuse University analysis concluded.

The review, conducted by the university's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse (TRAC), found that the number of rejections has been generally increasing since 2001. Prosecutions fell from 118 defendants in fiscal year 2002, to 19 defendants from Oct. 1, 2005, to June 30, the latest data available.

The Justice Department challenged the findings and said the analysis represented an "astonishing misunderstanding" of the inner workings of the federal criminal justice system.

"This report contains inaccurate figures, relies on a faulty assumption that every referral from an investigative agency should result in a criminal prosecution and ignores the reality of how the war on terrorism is being conducted," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

In the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Justice Department announced a dramatic transformation of its mission, from a prosecution-driven institution to an agency that emphasizes prevention and the development of a domestic intelligence system.

Because of the new mission, Roehrkasse said, cases rejected for prosecution don't necessarily close investigations.

"Often, matters are referred to prosecutors to assist in further investigation through the use of criminal investigative tools that require legal process such as a subpoena or surveillance order," he said. Hoax cases that were dismissed may have been included in the government data, too, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0091045

The TRAC report appears to reflect Justice's new mission, but Roehrkasse said the department's rejection rate stands at 67%, not 87%. He added the department has prosecuted 36 international terrorism defendants, nearly double the number reported in the analysis.

Susan Long, one of the report's authors, defended TRAC's analysis of the numbers. The data used in the review were obtained from the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys.

"The information comes from their files," Long said.

TRAC provides data on federal staffing, spending and enforcement activities to Congress, media and other groups to make the information more accessible to the public.

FBI Willing To Go Undercover In Congress If Necessary (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy, November 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress.

Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program "a sleeping giant that we've awoken," and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area "for many, many, many years to come."

So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office.

In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature.

If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs.

"We look for those opportunities a lot," Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau over the last quarter century. "I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second."

Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam.

"It shows courage at the FBI," said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that "there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable" and that a single FBI sting "might result in very large numbers of prosecutions."

But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans in Tuesday's elections.

Nationally over the last year, 600 agents worked 2,200 public corruption cases, resulting in 650 arrests, 1,000 indictments and 800 convictions, Burrus said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller, who listed public corruption as his top criminal investigative priority when he shifted the FBI's focus to terrorism in 2002, said last month that the surge in convictions "sends the message that public corruption will not be tolerated." Despite the realignment, the number of agents working on public corruption has remained constant.

Burrus argued that the FBI is "uniquely qualified" to handle such cases, pointing to the bureau's political independence, exemplified by Mueller's 10-year term. Burrus said that Alice Fisher, the politically appointed chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division with whom he confers weekly, also has "an aggressive attitude" about pursuing public officials.

"Operation Rainmaker," the FBI's broad investigation of a Washington lobbying ring, has already led to a handful of convictions, including Ney's guilty plea last month. The inquiry was one reason for the resignation last year of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also faces state campaign finance charges. Other investigations seem to be sprouting everywhere.

But Reid Weingarten, a former Abscam prosecutor who now is a high-profile Washington criminal defense lawyer, said he would bet that the flurry of congressional cases has resulted from evidence "falling in their (investigators') laps," rather than a programmed FBI hunt for corruption.

The FBI does appear to be stepping up its use of electronic surveillance and has conducted stings of state politicians. Bureau agents secretly taped Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., before finding $90,000 in his freezer during a raid last May. Cell phones were wiretapped for four months in an investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., government sources say.

In "Operation Tennessee Waltz," 10 Tennessee state officials, including five current and former legislators, have been prosecuted in a scheme in which hidden cameras whirred as FBI undercover agents offered payoffs in return for help for a dummy company. Burrus said some targeted Tennessee legislators were moving so quickly that "we were actually having to discuss how we were going to slow it down" so that bills aiding the phony firm didn't become law.

A separate undercover inquiry led to the indictment of three members of San Diego's city council.

In Alaska, the FBI has more than doubled its manpower in a sweeping investigation of allegations that an oil industry services company bribed state legislators, people familiar with the inquiry said. On Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, the FBI conducted two dozen raids and searched the office of state Sen. Ben Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Burrus declined to discuss any investigation, but said the FBI will focus on more state capitals over the next year, "because we have seen a trend in cases that leads us to believe there's more out there."

When he arrived as deputy chief of the criminal division in 2004, he said, field offices frequently told him they had "no idea" how to pursue public corruption leads. Since then, he said, agents in about 30 of the bureau's 56 field offices have been trained. FBI agents in Washington have studied congressional activities that might invite bribes, such as hard-to-trace "earmarks" in which members appropriate money for pet projects, often keeping their involvement off the public record.

"Public corruption cases have to be fished out," he said, noting that crooked politicians tend to do secret deals with one other person and often try to disguise their actions as "for the public's good."

Controversial new legal theories are also helping prosecutors bring cases in which they can't prove outright briberies. A vaguely written, 28-word 1988 law, for example, makes it a fraud for a politician to deprive taxpayers of his "honest services." It was among the charges lodged against Cunningham, Ney, former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the San Diego councilmen.

Burrus said the FBI has to prove "that this person engaged in the activities specifically to receive this stream of benefits and knew that stream of benefits would stop if he did not support these particular projects."

Probe Hits Jefferson In Wallet (NOTP)

By Bill Walsh, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 6, 2006

Campaign support appears to dwindle

The federal bribery probe targeting U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is issue No. 1 in the race to unseat him, but it has also played a powerful role behind the scenes as the eight-term Democrat has struggled mightily to raise enough money to keep his re-election campaign afloat.

Though he has not been charged, revelations that the FBI found $90,000 stashed in Jefferson's freezer in August 2005 have earned him the cold shoulder from many once-loyal donors, the majority of whom have migrated to the campaign of state Rep. Karen Carter, also a Democrat, who has become the favorite of the political establishment.

Jefferson paid perhaps an even larger price when his fellow House Democrats voted in June to eject him from the influential Ways & Means Committee, whose jurisdiction over taxes and trade makes it a financial magnet for corporations and trade unions seeking to influence legislation.

Records show that dozens of political action committees donated to his campaign after the FBI raid. After he was thrown off Ways & Means, however, they abandoned him.

DOJ_NMG_0091047

"Political action committees will continue to support an incumbent as long as he is in a position of authority," said Craig Holman of the nonprofit watchdog group Public Citizen. "As soon as he loses his authority, they funnel their money somewhere else."

Fundraising falters

Almost unheard of for an incumbent, Jefferson has trailed two of his challengers -- Carter and Derrick Shepherd -- in fundraising since they jumped into the race in the summer. Jefferson's $151,375 haul between July 23 and Sept. 30 was eclipsed by Carter's $327,162 and Shepherd's $199,900.

A fourth major Democratic candidate, Troy Carter, has raised just $79,900 for the entire campaign. Republican Joe Lavigne, who has been in the race the longest, raised money early on at an impressive clip, but the pace slowed as prominent Republican benefactors -- such as developer Joe Canizaro, shipbuilder Boysie Bollinger and funeral industry executive Frank Stewart -- lined up behind Karen Carter.

A review of Jefferson's campaign finance reports show that those who have stuck with him financially are members of his family, long-time friends and business associates, a few fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus and a smattering of sympathetic businesses and unions.

Among the loyal are: state Sen. Cleo Fields, a former U.S. representative and gubernatorial candidate; former Jefferson law partner Trevor Bryan; New Orleans attorney Robert Harvey; Liberty Bank President Alden McDonald; U.S. Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C.; janitorial company owner Burnell Moliere; Jefferson's pastor and influential African-American leader Bishop Paul Morton; former state Sen. Sammy Nunez; technology company owner Bobby Savoie; and engineering company President George Kleinpeter.

"He's been a good friend for a long time," said Kleinpeter, president of Burk-Kleinpeter Inc. Asked about the federal probe, Kleinpeter said, "I'm not judge and jury on those kinds of things," before abruptly ending the call.

Several other Jefferson donors declined to be interviewed or return phone calls for comment.

Long-time donors vanish

Jefferson campaign finance reports are littered with names of long-time donors who pulled up stakes in the face of the federal probe, which has focused on Jefferson's efforts to help U.S. businesses land contracts in West Africa. Even worse for the embattled congressman, those once-reliable donors have tended to ally themselves with his leading opponent, Karen Carter. Among those who switched were construction company President Robert Boh; restaurateur Ralph Brennan; import-export company owner John Georges; New Orleans lawyer Allan Kanner; and former Louisiana Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, a former Jefferson colleague in the Louisiana congressional delegation.

Johnston and former Sen. John Breaux, D-La., both longtime Jefferson backers, threw their support to Karen Carter late in the summer. Both have raised money for her and introduced her around Washington.

"We stayed with him as long as we reasonably could," said Hunter Johnston, the senator's son and a lobbyist. "Our relationship with Jeff goes way back. But he has not left any of his friends with any reasonable, plausible explanation of what's going on. New Orleans can't afford to be represented by someone whose reputation and effectiveness is so diminished."

PAC support dwindles

Dozens of corporate and labor union political action committees have evidently come to the same conclusion about Jefferson's clout on Capitol Hill. Businesses and labor groups such as Wal-Mart, Pfizer, Microsoft, Harrah's Entertainment, Entergy, BellSouth, Northrop Grumman, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America and associations of accountants and anesthesiologists gave generously to Jefferson after the Aug. 4, 2005, raid on his home by the FBI.

Despite the bad publicity, Jefferson raked in $53,750 in PAC contributions between Jan. 1 and June 15, the day the Democrats voted him off the Ways & Means Committee, records show. Since then, however, PAC giving to Jefferson has plummeted to $11,000, according to campaign finance reports.

Arguably the most loyal PAC has been the American Federation of Teachers, which donated $5,000 after the FBI raid and another $5,000 after his ejection from the committee.

"I'm not the one who could give you a comment on that," said union spokesman George Jackson. "I imagine it would be because he consistently votes in our favor on issues. I don't believe he has been formally indicted, has he?"

DOJ_NMG_0091048

Although records show Karen Carter has been the main beneficiary of one-time Jefferson donors, Shepherd has lifted himself into the upper tier of candidates in the 13-candidate field with some aggressive fundraising of his own. His political base is the West Bank, but he has received contributions from throughout the 2nd Congressional District, which stretches from Jefferson Parish nearly to the Mississippi state line.

Shepherd, who is African -- American, also has received financial support from some prominent white donors such as architectural company owner William Sizeler, lawyer Kenneth Pickering and Audubon Institute CEO Ron Forman. Lawyers and developers were among his top contributors, according to the campaign finance Web site PoliticalMoneyLine.

Troy Carter has struggled to raise money. He has banked some contributions from business owners in the French Quarter, whom he used to represent on the City Council. But he also appears to be carrying a $122,129 debt stemming from his failed mayoral bid in 2002.

Tuesday's election is all but certain to prompt a December runoff between the top two vote-getters. But with the field still unpredictable, some donors are hedging their bets. Campaign finance records show that Kleinpeter, the engineering company president, gave $1,000 to Jefferson's re-election campaign on Sept. 25. He contributed $1,000 to Karen Carter, records show, the next day.

. . . . . .

Bill Walsh may be reached at bill.walsh@newhouse.com and (202) 383-7817.

2 Prison Guards Found Guilty (ORS/AP)

By Bill Kaczor, The Associated Press

The Orlando Sentinel, November 4, 2006

Tallahassee officers were convicted in a sex-for-contraband scheme.

TALLAHASSEE -- A jury found a male prison guard guilty of bribery and another guilty of witness tampering Friday in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended with a deadly shootout at a federal prison for women.

A U.S. District Court jury convicted Gregory Dixon of three counts of bribery and Alan Moore of witness tampering. The jury also found both guilty of conspiracy to accept illegal gratuities after deliberating nearly eight hours. Moore also was convicted of accepting an illegal gratuity.

"Any prosecution is trying to send a message," Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls said after the verdict.

Defense lawyer Robert Harper said he didn't think it would be the right kind of message, though.

"This case to me sends a dangerous message to every male correctional officer at every female correctional institution," Harper said.

Three other guards previously had pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges. A sixth guard, Ralph Hill, was killed in the June 21 gunfight that he started at Tallahassee Correctional Institution when federal agents came to arrest them, officials said.

Justice Department special agent William "Buddy" Sentner also was killed, and a prison officer assisting in the arrests was wounded.

Judge Robert Hinkle set sentencing for Jan. 10. Dixon could face up to 47 years in prison, while Moore faces 14 years. Hinkle threw out the most serious charges of conspiracy to commit extortion and mail fraud, citing insufficient evidence, and the jury acquitted both men of conspiracy to commit bribery.

Neither defendant showed emotion when the verdicts were read as they sat at the defense table with their lawyers. Neither would comment.

Harper, who represents Moore, said post-conviction motions are pending or will be filed with Hinkle to seek reversal of the convictions. Dixon's lawyer, Thomas Findley, said his client would appeal at the appropriate time.

More than a dozen current and former inmates, some in prison uniforms and chains, testified against the two guards during the weeklong trial. Some said they traded sex for such commonplace items as cigarettes, cigars, gum and cosmetics. None claimed to receive drugs or alcohol.

Others said they acted as lookouts or paid guards for contraband.

DOJ_NMG_0091049

Davis argued there was an unwritten, sometimes unspoken, understanding among guards and inmates that sex and money could be swapped for contraband.

"They lived in an environment where rumor abounded," Davis said.

FBI May Use Billboards In Art Hunt (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

Agency seeks leads in Gardner theft

The FBI is considering a billboard campaign as part of its international hunt for $300 million worth of artwork that was stolen from the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston in 1990 by thieves who masqueraded as police officers to get inside, according to the agency

"We are evaluating investigative techniques designed to solicit information from the public regarding the investigation, including the use of billboards," said Thomas Larned, an assistant special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office.

The Financial Times of London reported on Oct. 21 that Eric Ives, head of the FBI's major theft unit in Washington, said the FBI planned to appeal for the public's help on billboards posted throughout the United States, and possibly overseas, sometime next year. Ives could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Larned said that using billboards as part of a publicity campaign was under consideration, "however we have no imminent plans."

The stolen artwork includes a Vermeer; three Rembrandts, including his only seascape; five Degas drawings; and a Manet.

Cathy Deely, a spokeswoman for the museum, declined to comment on the ongoing investigation or the possibility of a billboard campaign. But she said that "we are optimistic that they will be returned."

Julian Radcliffe -- chairman of the Art Loss Register in London, which is the world's largest database of stolen art and antiques dedicated to their recovery -- said he had never heard of billboards being used to help locate stolen pieces. But he added that law enforcement officials frequently advertise in art trade magazines.

"The people who might know about the paintings will tend to be criminals or near-criminals, and clearly the FBI has been working on those sorts of people in the past without a great deal of success," Radcliffe said. "So making a more general appeal may be necessary to widening the net, but I think the chances of it attracting somebody who knows where the pictures are is probably not very high."

FBI Leader In Boston Gets Post In D.C. (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

The agent who has run the FBI's Boston office for the past 3 1/2 years was promoted yesterday to a high-profile post at the agency's headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Kenneth W. Kaiser said it was an honor to be chosen to serve as assistant director of the Inspection Division, which evaluates and audits the work of the FBI's field offices, conducts internal investigations of alleged misconduct by bureau employees, and investigates shootings by FBI agents.

It will be a bittersweet departure for Kaiser, who said yesterday that he regrets being unable to capture fugitive gangster James "Whitey" Bulger while serving as special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office since March 2003.

But Kaiser, 50, said he believes that he has left the once-beleaguered office in better shape than he found it by repairing the FBI's relationship with other law enforcement agencies after it had been badly frayed by corrupt agents who protected Bulger from prosecution and helped him slip away just before his 1995 indictment.

"I really think that in the last 3 1/2 years we've changed the perception of what the FBI in Boston is all about," Kaiser said in a telephone interview from Washington. "I think the perception now is that the FBI is a team player . . . that we really are looking for Whitey Bulger, and that the Boston office isn't a corrupt office."

Kaiser said his advice to his successor will be to continue to devote a team of full-time agents and analysts to the hunt for Bulger, a longtime FBI informant wanted in the slayings of 19 people.

"I didn't even know who Whitey Bulger was really when I came here," he said. "Once you realize how important he is to the office and the community, it's important for the credibility of the FBI to continue to look for him very aggressively."

The FBI has launched a number of high-profile cases during Kaiser's tenure, including a probe into corruption on the Big Dig project, an operation that led to the indictment of three Boston police officers on drug-trafficking charges, and the indictment of Abdullah Khadr, a Canadian national and alleged Al Qaeda operative charged with conspiring to kill Americans overseas.

After Hurricane Katrina, Kaiser was deployed to Louisiana as commander of FBI Technical and Emergency Operations, coordinating the bureau's SWAT operations for high-risk arrests, rescues, and other federal operations.

He also oversaw security at the Super Bowl last year in Florida. .

Kaiser said he was on a temporary special assignment in Washington yesterday when he was notified by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III that his promotion had been approved by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. Kaiser is scheduled to return to Boston next month. It's unclear when he will start his new job.

Sharon Ormsby, an assistant special agent is in charge of the Boston office while Kaiser is away, but a permanent replacement has yet to be named.

An Illinois native and son of an FBI agent, Kaiser joined the FBI in May 1982 after four years as a diplomatic security agent for the US State Department.

He has held a number of positions with the agency, working in the Inspection Division in Washington, serving as second in command of the Indianapolis office and as a member of the counter-terrorism unit, where he helped plan security for the Olympic Games in Barcelona and Atlanta. Before coming to Boston, he was head of the New Orleans office.

He arrived in Boston a year after retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. was convicted of racketeering for protecting longtime FBI informants Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi from prosecution and warning Bulger to flee in advance of his federal indictment. Bulger was and still is one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted.

Congressional hearings into the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi were underway. And there were two separate manhunts for Bulger, with the FBI leading one task force and Massachusetts State Police and the Drug Enforcement Administration spearheading the other.

When Kaiser arrived "he had no idea how deep the rift was, but he absolutely reached out," said Thomas G. Robbins, who retired as superintendent of the Massachusetts State Police in June. "He did a lot of repair work."

While bitterness remains in some law enforcement quarters over the Bulger scandal, Robbins credited Kaiser with getting the FBI and State Police working together on the Bulger case.

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, who left Boston in August to serve as acting director of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said, "From the first day he arrived, he's really been a team builder, looking for opportunities to make sure everybody felt included." Sullivan credited him with forging partnerships with other agencies.

During Kaiser's tenure, the number of FBI joint task forces in Boston has grown from five to 21.

"I think what I do is play well in the sandbox with everybody," Kaiser said. "We continue to do what we need to do to move forward. . . . I tried to leave the place in a better position than when I got there and I think maybe I have."

Sullivan said yesterday that he has been assured by Washington officials that the commitment to finding Bulger will continue. "We all want the same thing, and that's for him to be captured," he said.

Shooting Victim Was Undercover (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

An Alexandria woman fatally shot last month in what police are calling a targeted hit worked undercover and cooperated with the FBI in violent-crime and drug cases up and down the East Coast, previously sealed records show.

Restaurant owner Bethlehem Ayele, 34, assisted in a homicide investigation in Connecticut, arranged an FBI sting in Florida and testified against drug dealers in the District.

Miss Ayele, 34, was fatally shot Oct. 25 in Alexandria while waiting at a stoplight at Mount Vernon and Commonwealth avenues in the city's Del Ray section.

The shooting prompted immediate speculation about whether Miss Ayele's death was tied to her testimony against members of the so-called Murder Inc. drug gang in the District.

But previously sealed court records show Miss Ayele also provided valuable help in several other felony cases over the years. Police say they are looking into whether her cooperation in other cases played a role in the shooting.

"Detectives still believe she was targeted, but they have not determined exactly why," Amy Bertsch, a spokeswoman for the Alexandria Police Department, said yesterday.

"The detectives are aware of all of those aspects," Miss Bertsch said. "They just don't know if they're connected to her murder. It's certainly something they're investigating."

According to unsealed records in federal court in the District, Miss Ayele debriefed detectives in a double homicide in Connecticut.

In Florida, she worked with the FBI to set up a cocaine buy between a drug dealer and an undercover FBI agent.

She cooperated in the investigation of a drug ring in the District. She testified publicly in the 2003 and 2004 Murder Inc. trial, linking two men to the conspiracy. Various members of the gang were convicted in 31 separate murders.

Miss Ayele's cooperation began after her arrest by U.S. Park Police in April 2000, when she was stopped for a traffic violation and officers found $20,000 in cash, drugs and a handgun in her van, according to court records.

She pleaded guilty to conspiracy in December 2000, agreeing to cooperate and forfeit more than $200,000 in seized cash, two cars and jewelry.

According to court records, there was concern about Miss Ayele's safety as a cooperating witness during her case.

In 2001, a federal magistrate judge ruled that her case should be kept off the public docket, writing that "her cooperation, due to the nature of the case, places the personal safety of the defendant and the officers and agents working with her at substantial risk."

A provision in her plea deal stated that the U.S. attorney's office in the District would back her entrance into the federal witness protection program.

It is not clear whether Miss Ayele ever opted to go into the program. Federal authorities and Miss Ayele's attorney declined to comment for this story.

When she was killed, Miss Ayele was working as a real estate agent in Alexandria. She also ran the Ohio Restaurant on H Street in Northeast. The restaurant remains closed, and family members could not be reached for comment.

According to court records, Miss Ayele was held without bond after her arrest. She was released into the custody of an FBI special agent to help in undercover investigations, including cases in Florida and Georgia.

California 'Pot Docs' Put Selves At Risk (USAT/AP)

By Lisa Leff, Associated Press

USA Today, November 6, 2006

COOL, Calif. — Mollie Fry, a doctor, never thought telling her patients where to get the medicine she recommended for pain, depression and nausea would be a problem.

Federal drug agents who raided her home and office thought otherwise, and she was indicted last year on felony charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana.

"I assumed the fact that I had 'M.D.' at the end of my name gave me the right to make judgments about people's health," said Fry, who estimates she has issued thousands of cannabis recommendations since setting up her thriving practice northeast of Sacramento in 1999.

Since California passed the nation's first medical marijuana law a decade ago, a provision requiring written doctor approval to grow and buy pot has created conflict between the state mandate and federal drug laws, and strained the doctor-patient relationship.

Until the stalemate is resolved, doctors recommending marijuana do it with trepidation and a good deal of risk.

Medical marijuana advocates estimate that 1,500 doctors, mostly oncologists and AIDS specialists, have authorized pot for at least one patient. But most recommendations have come from about 15 self-appointed specialists, the so-called "pot docs," who charge $150 and up to walk what the California Medical Association calls "a gray area between the clearly permissible and clearly impermissible categories of action."

Following complaints by local law enforcement, nearly all have been investigated by the state board that licenses and disciplines physicians. Four had devoted their practices to acting as medical marijuana consultants and ultimately were sanctioned, ranging from the public rebuke that Fry got to having their licenses suspended.

California's medical marijuana law, also known as Proposition 215, named a host of ailments for which marijuana might prove helpful in easing symptoms: cancer, anorexia, AIDS, glaucoma, arthritis, migraine.

Unlike medical marijuana laws enacted in 10 other states, California's also gave doctors discretion to certify patients with "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief," leaving open the possibility that recommendations could be made to people who did not need them.

David Thornton, executive director of the California Medical Board, said that until the board issued guidelines two years ago outlining what constituted "accepted medical standards," physicians pretty much had to figure it out on their own. Most concluded it was not worth the risk.

Although a federal appeals court ruled four years ago that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration cannot go after doctors merely because they recommend marijuana to patients, the state medical board's guidelines make it clear the ruling did not amount to immunity either from prosecution or disciplinary proceedings.

The board advises doctors that relying on a patient's word instead of prior medical records to determine whether a marijuana recommendation is appropriate could constitute medical negligence. Failing to conduct an independent exam or to consider whether another drug would be as effective could lead to charges of unprofessional conduct.

The California Medical Association is even more explicit, warning doctors never to tell patients where to get pot and urging them to remind patients of possible side effects. Discussing dosages with patients, opining on whether they should smoke or eat marijuana, and signing a form that enables patients to obtain a state-issued medical marijuana ID card also are steps the medical association cautions could lead to them being sanctioned.

Frank Lucido, a Berkeley physician who devotes about 30% of his practice to working with medical marijuana patients, said he abides by those recommendations, but thinks pot docs are being held to higher standards than doctors who prescribe lots of Viagra, prescription painkillers and other abused medications. Doctors who prescribe sleeping pills for patients who complain of insomnia, Lucido noted, are not at risk of being called quacks if they don't do a hands-on exam or develop a long-term treatment plan.

Fry, 50, who is awaiting trial, continues signing recommendation forms for patients who come to see her from throughout the state. She no longer sells her patients starter plants, but freely tells them about what she sees as the spiritual, emotional and economic benefits of growing their own pot.

"What did I take an oath to do? To do no harm and to alleviate pain and suffering," Fry said. "I'm going to be true to my oath, and I'm even willing to go to prison for it."

Carlyle-Clarke Pleads Guilty To Drug Conspiracy (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), November 6, 2006

Aristocrat admits responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana

A British aristocrat who fought extradition to the United States for the better part of a decade stood in handcuffs and leg shackles Friday before a federal judge in Mobile to admit his guilt in a massive drug conspiracy.

Giles Richard Carlyle-Clarke, who traces his family roots in England to 1066, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. He admitted responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana that came into the country by way of Baldwin County and St. Petersburg, Fla.

Prosecutors hailed the plea as the latest victory in an investigation that dates to the 1980s and has resulted in more than 70 indictments and 65 convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0091053

"It was a significant case to our office and I think to the DEA (Drug Enforcement Administration)," Assistant U.S. Attorney Gloria Bedwell said.

And the investigation still is not over, Bedwell said. The government continues to search for about five fugitives who investigators believe are hiding in foreign countries.

Carlyle-Clarke's plea agreement contains a standard provision allowing him the chance to cut his sentence if he provides information helpful to the investigation. Bedwell said she does not know if Carlyle-Clarke has kept in touch with any co-conspirators or has any other useful information.

If sentenced to the low end of advisory sentencing guidelines, Carlyle-Clarke would serve a prison term of 12 years and seven months. Prosecutors have agreed to support Carlye-Clarke if he seeks to serve that time in his home country.

Defense attorney Jeff Deen said after Friday's hearing that his client had no criminal record before or after his involvement with the Jamaican marijuana operation.

"This is all things that happened a long time ago when he was a much younger man," Deen said. "He's just trying to atone for his misdeeds."

Carlyle-Clarke, 49, admitted in his written plea agreement that he has was recruited by a friend, Robert Delisser, to participate in a Jamaica-based drug running operation. Delisser, who remains at large, suggested Michael Beauchemin hire Carlyle-Clarke, the plea agreement states.

Carlyle-Clarke transported about 200 pounds of marijuana on his sailboat, the Can-Can, from the Caribbean island nation to St. Petersburg in 1986.

The following year, Carlyle-Clarke captained Beauchemin's vessel, which contained a larger load, some 7,000 to 8,000 pounds of marijuana. He received $500,000, according to law enforcement investigators.

In early 1988, Beauchemin returned to Jamaica and arranged for another 8,000-pound load to be smuggled into the country, this time through Baldwin County. All of the marijuana was stored in a rented house in Baldwin County. The high-quality marijuana from that shipment eventually was sold, while the lower-quality marijuana was moved to a farmhouse on Baldwin County 97.

Carlyle-Clarke traveled to Baldwin County on Delisser's behalf and inspected the drugs stored at that farmhouse, according to the facts laid out in the plea agreement.

The Alabama Marine Police launched the investigation in May 1988 after receiving reports of people unloading a sailboat moored in the area of Roberts Bayou in south Baldwin County. The Marine Police turned the matter over to the DEA, which got a search warrant for a house in Elberta and the sailboat. Agents found thousands of pounds of marijuana and hundreds of pounds of hashish oil stored in a pier house on the property and uncovered evidence of the intricate distribution network.

Evidence seized included a videotape detailing the construction of the sailboat, which had a double hull with a large secret storage compartment in between. The four people arrested on the property led investigators to other conspirators, who in turn gave up others.

A federal grand jury in Mobile indicted Carlyle-Clarke in 1992. British authorities arrested him in January 1998 but allowed him to remain free at his family's 1,200-acre ancestral estate in England while he fought extradition to the United States. By July, he finally had exhausted his appeals and turned himself in to federal marshals at London's Heathrow Airport.

S. Texas Law Enforcement Seeks Drug Incinerator (HC/AP)

By Lynn Brezosky, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, November 6, 2006

McAllen chief says nearby facility would cut costly trips to Dallas to destroy contraband

MCALLEN — Asked recently what Texas could do to help a border police department like McAllen's, Chief Victor Rodriguez had a ready answer: Give us a nearby place to burn seized drugs.

He then outlined a situation that stunned members of the state Senate Criminal Justice Committee holding a field hearing in the Rio Grande Valley.

DOJ_NMG_0091054

In a region that is a gateway for drugs coming from Latin America and bound for cities throughout the United States, destroying drugs means sending a caravan of vehicles and officers on a two-day trip costing $8,000 to $10,000.

For McAllen, in particular, it means unloading tons of contraband from the 8-foot by 40-foot evidence bunker and into a rented moving van, which is then driven to a privately run incinerator near Dallas.

It's a journey nearly the length of Texas, and a task that requires seven or eight officers. There's got to be backup vehicles, officers to guard the drugs and, yes, each other. In recent years local police chiefs as well as U.S. Customs and Border Patrol agents have been prosecuted for bribery for helping drug traffickers get loads north.

Labor regulations require an overnight stop after such a long drive, adding lodging on top of overtime costs. Then there's the bill for the actual burn — calculated at about 40 cents to 50 cents per pound for several thousand pounds. It's a trip that's repeated several times a year.

"The border, it is an international front; it does yield for us down here large seizures of contraband," Rodriguez said. "Not only are we saddled with the border geographically, above and beyond that we have to pay to destroy this stuff, and it can get expensive."

Webb County Sheriff's Department Capt. Ted Garcia agreed. The county's evidence room has filled rapidly in recent months from a spree of cocaine seizures, he said, meaning another costly trip to Dallas is imminent.

"You would think they would have one closer," he said.

3 private operators in stateThere are three main facilities in Texas for incinerating drugs, state Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Tela Mange said, and all are privately operated.

For security reasons, she asked that they not be identified by name. Besides Dallas, one is in El Paso, and the other is in the northeastern corner of the state near Louisiana.

The El Paso facility is accessible to police along the state's far western border with Mexico. But for Laredo and cities in the lower Rio Grande Valley it's about as distant as Dallas or Louisiana.

"You have to go by whatever TCEQ regulations are, so that can get kind of complicated and expensive," Mange said. "When you've got about a million pounds, it can add up."

The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality requires incinerators for illegal drugs be dual chamber, burn at minimum temperatures of 1,400 degrees Fahrenheit and have stacks stretching at least six feet above any structure within 150 feet.

Cocaine, opiate and methamphetamine burns are limited to 10 pounds in an eight-hour period, marijuana to no more than 500 pounds an hour. Only specific fuels can be used — sweet natural gas, liquid petroleum gas, electric power or fuel oil with less than one-half percent sulfur by weight.

U.S. Customs and Protection routinely makes seizures of a ton or more along the border, with Border Patrol agents frequently coming upon bales of marijuana or cocaine unloaded on the banks of the Rio Grande or into dump trucks or other vehicles.

Exploring optionsThe federal Drug Enforcement Administration keeps tallies on federal seizures as well as larger ones by local police departments. During fiscal 2005, 1,077 tons of marijuana, 26 tons of cocaine, 715 pounds of heroin and 3.2 tons of methamphetamine were seized along the southwest border.

Evidence must be kept until a trafficker is convicted, and when it comes time to destroy the drugs the federal government also faces a challenge.

"For obvious reasons of security and safety, we can't reveal where we burn or destroy our evidence, but it is a concern for us in terms of the costliness of it," Houston-based DEA spokesman Ray D'Alessio said. "We're exploring different options right now."

It would cost at least $5 million to build a new drug incinerator, according to one estimate.

State Sen. John Whitmire, the Houston Democrat who chairs the Senate Criminal Justice Committee, said he was astonished by Rodriguez's testimony. "I promise you we'll fix this," he said at the Aug. 30 field hearing at McAllen City Hall.

Whitmire aide Larance Coleman said research into the logistics of a local facility is just beginning. "We haven't ever really looked into this before," he said.

Guilty Plea In Murder For Hire Case (HC)

By Brian Rogers

Houston Chronicle, November 6, 2006

DEA agent's ex-wife receives deferred sentence

A Houston U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent's ex-wife pleaded guilty Friday to trying to hire someone to kill him.

Pamela Bishop, 38, got deferred adjudication for solicitation of capital murder of Donald Noell Bishop. The conviction will be dropped from her criminal record if she stays out of trouble the next six years.

Bishop, who had been held in jail in lieu of $500,000 bail since her arrest in early October, will pay a $500 fine and do 300 hours of community service.

Except for saying the incident stemmed from an acrimonious divorce, her attorney, Jay Dedrick, declined to comment on the circumstances surrounding the charge because the couple are still in a custody fight for their children, a 13-year-old boy and a 6-year-old girl.

Prosecutor Kelly Siegler said the plea bargain was unusual, but it's what Bishop's ex-husband wanted.

"He's a stand-up guy," Siegler said. "And that's what he wanted, so that's what we decided to do."

Siegler said authorities were notified when one of the men Bishop asked to kill her ex-husband developed a conscience.

"She was talking to one of the would-be killers and he told the DEA," Siegler said. She said the agency contacted the Harris County Sheriff's Office to investigate and make the arrest.

She also said Bishop would not be allowed to contact her ex-husband or her children except through the supervised visits as a condition of the plea agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Texas Starts Internet Border Watch (AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 4, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas -- Texas launched its ambitious effort to use Internet users to watch the border for illegal immigrants. But the network of surveillance cameras was plagued by technical problems, the images were grainy and the cameras were placed so high that it was hard to distinguish a person from, say, a bush.

Republican Gov. Rick Perry, who announced plans over the summer to spend $5 million on the virtual posse, asked for "forgiveness on the front end of this," but dismissed the problems as routine computer glitches.

"I'm sure that as you start a big program like this that you will have some glitches," Mr. Perry, who is up for re-election, said Friday in Brownsville. "My wife's computer is not working this morning."

The cameras will operate at criminal hotspots. Members of the public who see something suspicious over the Web cameras can e-mail authorities.

However, the Web site doesn't work on some Internet browsers. The images were grainy and it was difficult to tell whether, say, a group of people on the screen was a family crossing a crowded parking lot or a band of smugglers with their human cargo. The view from one camera on the Rio Grande was largely obscured by a bush. In another, all that was visible was the license plates on passing cars.

When he announced the program in June, Mr. Perry said the images would be available online in a month. While the first cameras were installed within a month, and law enforcement officers have been watching them since then, the public Web site was not up and running until late Thursday.

Perry spokeswoman Kathy Walt said that it proved more difficult than expected to get the public site running and that the launch so close to the election was a coincidence. Law enforcement officials have access to footage from about 15 cameras, Ms. Walt said, but only eight appear on the Web site.

Ms. Walt said authorities have been trying to work out technical issues, such as the proper distance and how to achieve good picture quality. Since much of the border is undeveloped land, the designers of the system also had to figure out how to use batteries or solar power and how to transmit by wireless signal.

DOJ_NMG_0091056

Six companies have donated their time and camera equipment, Walt said. The state paid a seventh company $100,000 to create and run the Web site. Within a few days, the state plans to ask companies to submit proposals to install dozens of additional cameras.

Some civil rights groups have criticized the virtual border watch plan, saying it will instill fear in border communities and could lead to fraudulent crime reports and racial profiling.

Web Cameras Will Focus Eyes Of Texas On Border (FWST)

By Patrick Mcgee

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 4, 2006

Live images from cameras set up along the Mexican border became available for the first time Thursday, in the hope that alert residents can help fight crime and illegal crossings into Texas.

People can visit a Web site, www.texasborderwatch.com, where they can view selected areas and report suspicious activity by clicking an online button.

Gov. Rick Perry's office has installed 15 cameras since June, and seven of them are being tested on the Web site.

But many of the Internet links were not working Friday, and some that did work didn't include the promised online button to click to report suspicious activity.

Gov. Rick Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said Friday that cameras may have been down for temporary adjustments and that the Web site is still a "test site."

"The intent, particularly with the public Web site, is to model the successful neighborhood watch programs we have had for years," she said. "The idea is, the more eyes you have monitoring, the more success you will have in reducing crime."

Perry, who is running for re-election, has featured increased efforts to secure the border in some of his campaign ads for Tuesday's election.

The Border Patrol has cameras in every sector of Texas' border with Mexico, said Mike Friel, spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

He said the cameras work in daylight or at night and can be rotated 180 degrees by the Border Patrol agents or National Guardsmen who use them.

Several of the cameras' feeds appear in different formats.

The cameras were installed free by companies that hope to win contracts when the governor installs more, Walt said. Perry wants to have 70 to 100 cameras on the border eventually, she said.

Clicking the online button to report suspicious activity will alert officials in the operations center in Austin.

They will then notify local law enforcement officials, who can notify the Border Patrol if necessary, she said.

Rogelio Nuñez, director of Proyecto Libertad, an immigrant rights organization based in the border town of Harlingen, said the state cameras are a terrible idea.

"It's just a total misuse of money," he said.

"This is just another ploy of the Republican Party to again appeal to some sentiment out there in the community that there is this relationship with immigration and terrorism," Nuñez said.

He expressed skepticism about the cameras being used to reduce crime.

"There's high areas of crime in urban areas like Houston and Dallas. Why are we singling out the border?" he asked.

Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez said he thinks the cameras can only help.

"Anything that would help us in law enforcement would be appreciated," said Gonzalez, who is chairman of the Texas Border Sheriffs Association.

"If citizens can do it for us, great. We can always use volunteers," he said.

Del Rio Police Chief Waylon Bullard said the cameras could be helpful, especially if they are well-placed.

"We're hoping that some of them will be installed in the city or close to the city," he said. "We don't have anyone that's set up to monitor them full time, so the citizens [watching online] will be a great help," he said.

Steve Taylor, editor of the Rio Grande Guardian, an online newsletter about Texas' border with Mexico, said he doesn't think many border-area residents will log onto the Web site because many have no computers and no interest in reporting illegal immigrants.

"Because of the families' ties on both sides of the border, there's a lot of sympathy" for immigrants, he said.

"There's probably more tolerance here than in other parts of the state."

A closely watched immigration fight (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, November 5, 2006

A Closely Watched Immigration Fight

The country's immigration battle took another turn last week when a federal judge blocked two landmark immigration ordinances in Hazleton, Pa., from being enforced just hours before they were to go into effect. The measures, now on hold until November 14, would have allowed city officials to fine landlords housing illegal immigrants and deny business permits to companies that hire them. Judge James Munley said enforcement would cause "irreparable harm" to businesses catering to Hispanics. His decision was in response to a suit filed by Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union.

The case is being watched, because towns like Valley Park, Mo., and Riverside, N.J., have copycat measures in place; others have considered them. Hazleton was the first city to try a landlord-fine approach, which supporters hoped was more defensible than other attempts to limit immigrant benefits. Said Hazleton Mayor Lou Barletta, "We have only begun to fight."

Harsh Report on a Fatal Blast

Budget cuts and negligence helped ignite the worst industrial accident in 10 years, according to a federal report released last week. The March 2005 explosion at BP's Texas City, Texas, refinery killed 15 people, injured 180, and left the London-based oil company mired in lawsuits. The Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board has no legal power, but its conclusions that "aging infrastructure, overzealous cost-cutting, inadequate design, and risk blindness" contributed to the explosion will no doubt be cited in pending cases.

BP has acknowledged some safety problems at the refinery. But BP places blame on a few low-ranking employees, arguing that if proper "procedure had been followed ... this incident would not have happened."

The Texas City blast isn't the firm's only problem. BP is also under investigation for failing to fix a corroded pipeline that burst in Alaska's Prudhoe Bay earlier this year.

Tragic Score Card Underground

It has been a horrific year in the nation's mines. In January, 12 workers perished at West Virginia's Sago Mine, one of the worst disasters on record. Last week, one miner was killed and another seriously wounded in Pineville, W.Va., when a shuttle car they were trying to repair unexpectedly began to move, striking one miner and pinning the second against a wall. The accident raised this year's death toll to 43 nationwide, the highest level in more than a decade; the dangerous winter season still looms. Twenty-two of those deaths have occurred in West Virginia-the most there in 25 years. Tests by the state's mine safety office recently found that some of the air packs miners carry to provide an extra hour of oxygen have suffered heat damage; Randal McCloy Jr., the sole survivor of the Sago Mine tragedy, has sued the packs' maker. West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin is pushing for legislation next year that would improve safety.

It's a Sort-of South Florida Story

Sports agent Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez was thrown, well, a curveball last week. A federal grand jury in Miami indicted the California-based agent for allegedly smuggling professional baseball prospects to the United States from Cuba. The indictment alleges Dominguez traveled by boat to the island in July 2004, picking up 22 Cuban nationals-baseball players among them-before being intercepted by American law enforcement on the return trip; the nationals were returned to Cuba. The next month, Dominguez allegedly tried again, this time successfully bringing 19 Cubans stateside, including several ballplayers. Attorney Susan Dmitrovsky, who represents Dominguez, expressed confidence he will prevail. She called the United States a "vanguard for those seeking freedom" and said her client had merely "advance[d] that American heritage" lawfully. But Immigration and Customs Enforcement Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said the case boiled down to human smuggling: "The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

DOJ_NMG_0091058

Border Agents Seek New Trial (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Two U.S. Border Patrol agents sentenced to lengthy prison terms for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect as he fled across the Rio Grande want a new trial, saying three jurors claim they were pressured into returning guilty verdicts.

Jose Alonso Compean, 28, and Ignacio Ramos, 37, were sentenced Oct. 19 by U.S. District Court Judge Kathleen Cardone in El Paso, Texas, to 12 and 11 years in prison, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A federal jury convicted the two men in March after a two-week trial, and Judge Cardone ordered them to report to prison Jan. 17.

Ramos' El Paso-based attorney, Mary Stillinger, plans to appeal the case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans based, in part, on sworn affidavits of three jurors -- Robert Gourley, Claudia Torres and Edine Woods -- who said they were incorrectly instructed that their verdict had to be unanimous and that the judge would not accept a hung jury.

"I don't remember exactly what it was that made me change my vote to guilty on these charges, but I know I was very influenced by my belief, based on the other jurors statement, that we could not have a hung jury," Ms. Woods said in her affidavit. "I think I might not have changed my vote to guilty if I had known that was an option."

Mr. Gourley and Ms. Torres said they were told by the jury foreman that Judge Cardone would not accept a hung jury.

"I had no reason to doubt the foreman," Mr. Gourley wrote.

Ms. Stillinger has argued that the jurors "essentially conceded their votes" when they saw they could not convince the majority otherwise, thinking "they did not have the option to stick to their guns and prevent a unanimous verdict."

The defense attorney made the same argument to Judge Cardone before the sentencing, but she rejected it.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, was given immunity and agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for immunity after an investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General.

The immunity deal protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country as a drug smuggler. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the border.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

In a case brought by U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, the government said the agents "shot an unarmed, fleeing suspect in the back and lied about it." He said they "fired their weapons at a man who had attempted to surrender by holding his open hands in the air."

Drones to patrol mexican border (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

U.S. Customs and Border Protection has launched its newest weapon in securing the nation's borders with the debut of an unmanned aerial vehicle capable of providing an "eye in the sky" for Border Patrol agents on the ground.

"Our front-line agents deserve proven, effective technology that equips them to secure our borders and to prevent terrorism," CBP Commissioner W. Ralph Basham said. "This unmanned aircraft system provides us with the situational awareness we need to more effectively deny illegal entry at our nation's borders."

The agency's new unmanned aircraft, known as the MQ-9 Predator B, began limited operations last week from Libby Army Airfield in Fort Huachuca, Ariz., to support enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexico border. The aircraft was introduced during ceremonies Tuesday in Arizona hosted by Air and Marine Assistant Commissioner Michael Kostelnik.

The agency hopes to expand operations to the California and New Mexico state lines in the next month.

Unmanned aircraft give the agency improved and expanded mission capabilities to meet what Mr. Basham has described as "the continuing terrorist threat to our nation." He said the program supports efforts by CBP to expand specialized teams and rapid-response capabilities within the agency to enhance control of the nation's borders.

New unmanned aircraft systems within CBP are designed to augment crewed air and marine assets and ground interdiction agents already on the southwest border. In fiscal 2007, the aircraft will complement crewed air and marine assets and ground interdiction agents on the northern border and the Gulf Coast.

Mr. Basham said the aircraft have the potential to coordinate operations within other Department of Homeland Security agencies, including the U.S. Coast Guard and the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said his agency also will work closely with the Defense Department to "gain efficiencies in acquisition, testing, training and deployment."

In 2004, CBP conducted operational tests and evaluations using the Hunter and Hermes unmanned aircraft vehicles, and last year, the agency conducted operational tests using the MQ-9 Predator B. Since 2004, unmanned aircraft have flown 1,878 hours and directly contributed to 3,603 arrests and the seizure of 11,000 pounds of marijuana.

Mr. Basham has called border enforcement "a legal issue as well as a matter of national security," saying the United States "simply must keep people from crossing our borders undetected if we are going to protect our homeland."

To achieve that goal, he has been a vigorous proponent of efforts to better secure the border through a strategy aimed at increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and equipping them with the proper tools, including new roads, lights, fences, barriers, upgraded technology and unmanned aerial vehicles.

After The Amnesty: 20 Years Later (CSM)

By Luis Andres Henao

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

Twenty years ago Monday, Congress passed the largest effort to date to curb undocumented immigration to this country. Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), employers were sanctioned for the first time for hiring undocumented workers. The bill also called for tighter controls along the Mexican border. But the bill was a compromise: Enforcement was balanced by an amnesty provision.

Under IRCA, undocumented immigrants who had lived in the United States prior to 1982 and those who had worked as seasonal agricultural workers before May 1986 could seek legal status and eventually US citizenship.

Nearly 3 million undocumented immigrants were granted legal residence under the amnesty. Most of them were Mexican (more than 80 percent) and lived in the Los Angeles area. Salvadorans, Filipinos, Haitians, Poles, and Vietnamese also benefited from the program.

But two decades later, illegal immigration is still a hot-button issue and amnesty is a dirty word to some. Private-citizen minutemen and National Guardsmen have rushed to the Mexican border. This spring, millions of undocumented immigrants and others marched in the streets of US cities to protest federal legislation that would criminalize illegal immigrants.

It's an issue that may reignite if a new Congress picks up the debate this coming January.

Amid the shouts of today are decades-old echoes from the IRCA.

Critics say the bill set a damaging precedent for future amnesties. IRCA supporters say the word "amnesty" mischaracterizes the bill's intent.

"An amnesty cleans people who have broken the law," says former US Rep. Romano Mazzoli (D) of Kentucky. He and former US Sen. Alan Simpson (R) of Wyoming were the primary architects and cosponsors of IRCA. "But in our bill, you had to prove that you were a law-abiding person who honored the institutions of our country.... So you can take your pick of euphemisms, but if you use the word 'amnesty,' people will get angry, throw their hands up in the air, and scream: 'They're rewarding people for misbehaving!' "

Today Mr. Mazzoli defends the bill as the best way to combat illegal immigration at the time. The six administrations that followed, he says, are to blame for not enforcing tighter restrictions. And now, "It's déjà vu all over again," Mazzoli says. "These are the same issues that we had 20 years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0091060

William King Jr., was the Western regional director of the US Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and responsible for carrying out the amnesty program. He says that he had hope that the legislation would work at first. But IRCA was a three-legged stool, he says. One leg was employer sanctions, another was increased border security, and the third was the amnesty program. "In truth, only the amnesty program became a fact," he says, and the effort failed.

To John Keeley, a spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, a nonprofit group that wants tighter immigration controls, IRCA was well intentioned - but implementation was lacking. "There was a half-hearted attempt at immigration control by the late '80s and early '90s by the old INS," he says, but political pressure brought that to a "screeching halt" by the middle of the decade.

One of the big problems with the IRCA amnesty was all the counterfeit applications, especially from seasonal agricultural workers. Economists Pia Orrenius and Madeline Zavodny studied the effects of amnesty programs on undocumented immigration and presented their findings in the August 2003 issue of Demography magazine. They say that the number of seasonal workers qualifying for amnesty was about 300,000. But in the end, more than 1 million applications were granted. "Most people agree that there was substantial fraud because the document requirement and the residency requirement were quite low for that part of the program," Ms. Zavodny says.

"I don't think anyone says that it deterred illegal immigration," says Cecilia Muñoz, vice president of The National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Latino advocacy group. "But it succeeded in legalizing 3 million people. Their wages went up, and they're fully integrated into American society." Rohan Baichu / Houston

'At first, I thought it might be a trap'

Rohan Baichu says that he has "a lot of jewelry." Mr. Baichu came to the United States from Guyana in 1981, wanting to become a boxer. Instead, he earned three World Series rings as a massage therapist and assistant training coach for the New York Yankees as well as a league championship with the Houston Astros. He is a certified pilot and masseur.

But during his first undocumented years in America, "just the day to day was a battle," he recalls.

Constantly worried about getting picked up by immigration officers, he had to give up his boxing dreams to work night shifts as a security guard.

Baichu was even offered a job with the city of New York by a police chief, who never suspected he was undocumented.

Disappointed with his prospects, he gave up on New York, packed two suitcases, and left for Canada in February 1986. His mother, a Canadian citizen, had offered him a new start through a residency card. But a few days later, he received a call from his girlfriend in New York. She was pregnant. Baichu came back immediately and took up his old job.

By this time, he had lost hope of obtaining a better career. Then came the amnesty. "At first," Baichu says. "I thought it might be a trap." He was so hesitant that he waited a year and applied right before the deadline.

With legal documents in hand, Baichu applied for a supervisor position at the security company. He even did a short stint working for a Wall Street technology company.

But Baichu regretted that he had never gotten an education. So he took out several loans and and moved to Colorado where he went to a community college and where he also earned a pilot's license at the age of 33.

By the time he got his pilot's license, though, flying jobs were scarce, and Baichu was soon looking for another career. So he turned to what he knew best. After years of running track and reading books on nutrition, he aced a professional-trainer exam and got a license in massage therapy.

One day while working at a New York gym, a friend told him the Yankees were looking for a staff trainer. Some weeks later, the team flew him to training camp in Florida for an interview. "When they saw me, they said: 'You're the man.... Can you start tomorrow?' "

Baichu has been in professional baseball ever since. During his time with the Yankees, he crisscrossed the country, shook the hands of two presidents, and earned three World Series championship rings.

He became so well regarded as a trainer that when Roger Clemens was traded from the Yankees to the Houston Astros, the pitcher asked his new team to hire Baichu from New York. He is grateful to "his good friend" Clemens and is proud of his friend's work ethic, describing it as one of the best in the game because, at the age 44, Clemens "works like an immigrant."

DOJ_NMG_0091061

Baichu attributes his success to his determination and the possibilities that opened up to him after the amnesty. But he also points out that even those immigrants who haven't been as successful as he has still benefited a lot from the law. "They got their own success," he says. "Even if they ended up living in a rented apartment, they got peace, tranquillity, and values that carry them through."

This year, Baichu became a United States citizen and started a group that raises civic awareness through voter registration. Now that he's able to vote, he says he would support the passage of any legislation that benefits immigrants.

As an immigrant, Baichu says he's proud that one of his daughters - now a student at the University of Southern California - encouraged him to tell his story. "She understands the odds that we had to overcome and feels satisfied about where I'm at."

Baichu sees his future split between coaching and taking care of his two daughters and his adopted son, a 22-year-old Haitian athlete whom he met practicing track one day. Baichu is sponsoring him to attend college. Alfonso & Marta Castañeda / Los Angeles

The joy of security and work

When they crossed the US border with Mexico in the early 1970s, Alfonso Castañeda was a house painter; his wife, Marta, was a nurse. Almost three decades later, they still work in the same professions.

"I thought I could do something more," says Mrs. Castañeda who never managed to validate her degree and works as a nurse assistant at a private hospital. Mr. Castañeda, a stocky man with long sideburns, says he dreamed of saving enough to go back to Mexico, but never did.

The '86 amnesty did not give the Castañedas wealth or more education. But the passing of the bill brought them protection in the form of a disability check, workers' compensation, and the means to build toward a secure retirement. Their citizenship, and subsequent financial stability, helped them support their children Gerardo, a research assistant at a law firm, and Elsa, a computer science graduate from the University of Arizona who now works for her alma mater.

The couple also find small rewards in their own work routines.

"The youngest ones are 75," Marta says with a laugh, describing the elderly patients she helps. "It's beautiful when they recover and they get to go back to their families."

Alfonso started his own small painting business, but still climbs a ladder and takes out his brush every day. Despite the smell of paint, the rain and sun, he feels satisfied because at the end "you see the results." Mary Vega / Providence, R.I.

On that day, 'My soul came back to my body'

From breaking news to weather updates, Mary Vega listens closely and retells the story to thousands of Spanish-speakers in Rhode Island. She provides instantaneous English-Spanish dubbing for the nightly news at local ABC television affiliate WLNE.

But during her first years in the United States, only a few could hear her voice. Ms. Vega came to Providence from Colombia in 1980 and overstayed a tourist visa. Her legal status wouldn't allow her to drive a car, get medical care, or work at any job outside the service industry. Fearing deportation, she kept a low profile by caring for an elderly couple at a private residence in Providence.

"The American dream stays in dreams," Vega says of the time before the passing of the 1986 amnesty. "I think this is part of the problem.... What else can Latinos do if we're only allowed to clean bathrooms?"

Today, Vega still looks after the same couple. But through the amnesty, she also became a citizen, brought her three daughters to this country, and found a career in journalism, a field that she feels passionate about. "The day I was granted the amnesty, my soul came back to my body.... I was going to fight for what I wanted, and that's how it was."

Her daughters - also US citizens - study law and medicine, and the oldest works as a talent manager for a Miami hotel.

"I'm not a millionaire, but I have a Social Security number and ... I was able to get a federal loan for my daughter's college when I needed to," Vega says. As a result of her efforts, Vega pays taxes and hopes the skills her daughters learn in college will help them contribute to American society as well.

Vega's aspirations go beyond translating. On the weekends, she practices using editing software at the channel and watches every camera move closely. One day, she says, she will be on the other side of the camera as a television news producer. Marvin Andrade / Los Angeles

Out of civil war, into the University of Southern California

DOJ_NMG_0091062

Marvin Andrade was 10 when he waved goodbye to his mother and young sisters through the rear window of a taxicab. At the time, "life wasn't worth much," he says.

Mr. Andrade's father - a grocery store owner - had received death threats from both sides in the Salvadoran civil war. While the armed forces suspected him of helping the guerrilla movement, the guerrilla fighters wanted him dead for refusing to provide them with supplies. In the middle of the night, and with only the clothes on their backs, father and son fled the conflict that killed more than 70,000 Salvadorans in the 1980s.

During a month-long journey in 1980, father and son traveled thousands of miles through Central America and Mexico to reach the banks of the Rio Grande across from El Paso, Texas. But as Marvin crossed the river on the shoulders of another man traveling with them, he could only think of "the land of Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck" that he had seen on TV. On the other side, sitting in a pickup bed on his way to Los Angeles, someone gave him a can of Coca-Coca. He had only seen bottles at home, and he clung to this soda can for a long time. It was his first memory of life in the United States.

Growing up undocumented in Los Angeles, Andrade remembers long hours spent standing on street corners with his father while they waited to be picked up for construction or gardening jobs. School was no easier, he says. He was mocked because of his accent and often called a "wetback."

But Andrade sought education as the way to battle the violence, poverty, and discrimination that rattled his early life.

On a high school field trip to the University of Southern California, he asked one of his counselors what his chances were of getting into such a place. "You're aiming too high," the counselor told him.

Those words stuck in his mind. But instead of discouraging him, they gave him resolve. He filled his days with activities to achieve that goal, volunteering at the nonprofit Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. And since he could not afford tuition or receive financial aid, he took night classes at East Los Angeles Community College in 1987.

A year earlier, when the amnesty passed, Andrade had applied to only one school: The University of Southern California. Andrade was accepted in 1988 and eventually received a degree from USC in international politics.

Today, Andrade helps immigrant children integrate into American society. As the education director for the Central American Resource Center, Andrade oversees more than 70 elementary and middle school students who come to the center for after-school tutoring in English, math, and art.

"The things I was told growing up had an effect on me," says Andrade. "It made me be the guy that wants to spur change, and it's the reason why I'm here."

As he enters a classroom, paper kites with Mexican, Salvadoran, and American flags hang over a group of students who are finishing math and reading assignments for tomorrow's class.

"The same dream I had of going to college," says Andrade, "is now shared by many students who by merit could go to the best schools, but can't do so because they're undocumented."

He calls for urgent immigration reform and disagrees with the negative image that the '86 immigration law gathered.

"The word 'amnesty' gives the connotation of a pardon," he says. "My view is that it's not a crime to look for the betterment of your family. [Illegal immigrants] risk their lives to work here. And through taxes, they contribute more than what they receive."

He's thankful for the law that opened the door to education and citizenship for him. "The amnesty allowed me to meet my wife, graduate from one of the best universities in the world, and own a house, which is part of the American dream."

Today, more than 25 members of his family, including his mom and two sisters, have joined him in Los Angeles. All benefited from the amnesty law.

Some months ago - and 20 years after the violent conflict that drove him from his land - Andrade went back to El Salvador; this time as an international peace observer and US citizen. Jose Ortiz / Los Angeles

The profound impact of 'this gift'

Jose Ortiz turned roadblocks into opportunities. Mr. Ortiz came to Los Angeles in 1981 at age 12 to escape the Salvadoran civil war. He enrolled in school and, with time, rose to the top of his high school class. Set on a career in architecture, he was offered a full scholarship to college. But without his green card, his dream was put on hold.

DOJ_NMG_0091063

Twenty-six years later, Ortiz - now a citizen - continues to redefine himself: as a dental assistant, massage therapist, and entrepreneur. "When the amnesty came ... it opened my horizons. I was legal, and I had more options," he says in his native Spanish.

His determination carried him through difficult times. Disappointed that he was denied access to college, he immediately enrolled in X-ray technician courses that didn't require him to produce any citizenship documents. When his green card came through as a result of the '86 amnesty, he enrolled in courses sponsored by University of California, Los Angeles, and became a registered dental assistant. And because of the physical therapy that he received after an injury at work, he began a new career as a massage therapist.

Recently, he set up a financial firm that teaches Latinos how to manage their finances, from balancing a checkbook to investing in stocks. "My dream is to start a company that shows Salvadorans how to save and manage their remittances," he says, referring to the more than $2 billion sent each year by Salvadorans living abroad to family members at home. Foreign remittances are El Salvador's No. 1 source of income.

Ortiz also hopes to bring his parents here to live with him. "The amnesty," he says, "has had a profound impact not only on me but on many people who received this gift." But ultimately, "it comes down to you to make [this dream] a reality." Laureana Santana / Providence, R.I.

Reunited with her family, but struggling

Five giggling children, ages 1 through 10, run circles around Laureana Santana. They bump into one another while using every inch in the living room of Ms. Santana's small brick home in Providence's oldest housing project. There's a playground across the street, but they are not allowed to go outside - not since a 12-year-old boy was shot and killed two years ago while playing with friends nearby. "I don't want to take risks," she says.

Santana looks after as many as nine immigrant children throughout the day while their mothers work in factories around town. She obtained a family day-care certificate from the state six years ago.

In 1985, without a job and no prospects for one, she became desperate. So Santana floated on a raft from the Dominican Republic to Puerto Rico, leaving behind her three young children and hoping to find a better life for herself and her family.

"The first years were difficult," she says. To help support her children, she plowed fields and grew yucca and peanuts. "I was away from my children and every penny I made working in the fields I would send back to them."

In 1986, she benefited from a section in the bill that supported agricultural workers who had resided in any United States territory for more than 90 days prior to May 1986. Three years later, she left Puerto Rico for Providence, R.I. When she became a US citizen in 1989, the doors opened for other family members.

In 1995, she was able to bring her children to this country. Two years ago, her mother was able to come and live with her as well.

"The amnesty let me reunite with my children, and today, we're all together," she says.

Even when she is struggling to make ends meet, she believes that today's immigrants should be given the same opportunities that she received 20 years ago.

"If they close doors on them," she says, "if they refuse to rent them an apartment or allow them to work, they're just putting immigrants on the spot, rounding them up and pushing them to do bad things in order to survive and provide for their families."

Now in her late 50s, Santana says that taking care of so many children can be exhausting, but it is also rewarding.

"It's such an experience to have left my kids at such a young age and now to take care of so many," she says. "There are times when I say: 'Lord, give me wings so I can fly away.' But when they leave, I miss them, and this house feels empty."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION

Bush Hails Verdict As Milestone For Iraq (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091064

President Bush celebrated Saddam Hussein's death sentence as a victory for "Iraq's young democracy" and U.S. security, highlighting Sunday's verdict in the last hours of an election campaign in which Republicans are suffering from public discontent with the Iraq war.

White House spokesman Tony Snow decried as "absolutely crazy" any notion that the end to Saddam's nine-month trial was timed to produce positive news on the divisive, unpopular war two days before Americans vote. The United States has always denied direct involvement in the trial, though suspicions persisted.

Snow didn't entirely set politics aside, asserting that U.S. voters "ought to be heartened" by the verdict and its broader implications about the progress the administration insists is evident in Iraq.

"This is getting the Iraqis to stand up on their own," Snow said. "You can't have civil society without rule of law."

Bush painted Saddam's conviction and sentence as vindication of the sacrifices made by American soldiers in Iraq. More than 2,800 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

"They've sacrificed for the security of the United States," said the president, who spoke to reporters for two minutes in Texas before flying to campaign appearances on behalf of newly in-peril Republicans in Nebraska and Kansas. "Without their courage and skill, today's verdict would not have happened."

With the verdict a chance to recall Saddam's December 2003 capture by U.S. troops in a hole in the ground — still one of the high points of the war for Bush — he repeated these points later during campaign visits to two of America's reddest states.

"Today we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq," Bush said in western Nebraska, where he was trying to boost GOP state Sen. Adrian Smith in a tightened race against Democrat Scott Kleeb. Delivered in solid Bush Country, in an arena awash in red clothing, the president's Iraq lines earned the most sustained cheering of his speech.

"My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision and the world is better off for it," he said to raucous applause.

An Iraqi court convicted Saddam earlier Sunday and sentenced him to die by hanging for ordering the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shiites from the city of Dujail in 1982. Six subordinates were also found guilty of crimes against humanity, which came after what Saddam said was an assassination attempt against him.

Shiites rejoiced at the death sentence for the former dictator who terrorized their population. But Saddam's fellow Sunnis paraded through his hometown in protest. With sectarian violence already pushing Iraq to the brink of civil war, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush is confident U.S. forces and Iraqi soldiers were prepared to contain any spike in bloodshed.

Democrats — hoping for large gains that could put them in control of the House and possibly the Senate — moved quickly to both applaud the sentence and repeat their campaign-trail argument that Bush's leadership on Iraq has been a failure.

"The scope of that failure is not lessened by the results of Saddam's trial," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., poised to become House speaker if Democrats wrest the majority from the GOP.

A history of Election Day disappointments and a constantly shifting pre-election landscape appeared to have Democrats a bit jittery. New York Sen. Charles Schumer, in charge of Democratic campaign efforts in the Senate, said, "I don't think (Saddam's) conviction makes much of a difference in this election, even though it's a very good thing that happened."

Other Republicans backed Bush's contention of the verdict as evidence of success in Iraq. "The United States and the world are safer because Saddam Hussein sits on death row, not in a palace in Baghdad plotting to harm millions of innocent Americans and Iraqis," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.

But at least one Republican said the news must be viewed in the context of the difficult situation in Iraq.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a step forward because it was a result of a legal system in operation, not a dictator in operation, so that's the good news," Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said on CNN's "Late Edition." "But when you look at the institutions of government in Iraq, they're all under siege. ... We just need a strategy to provide better security to get this right."

Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come," the president said.

He emphasized that Saddam was extended rights of due process and appeal "that he denied the Iraqi people."

DOJ_NMG_0091065

"Iraq has a lot of work ahead as it builds its society that delivers equal justice and protects all its citizens," Bush said. "Yet history will record today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

Campaigning Bush Seizes On Saddam Verdict (AFP-Y)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, November 6, 2006

US President George W. Bush seized on Saddam Hussein's death sentence to defend the Iraq war as US elections shaped by the unpopular conflict headed to a hard-fought finish.

"Today, we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death by the Iraqi high tribunal," Bush told cheering supporters at a rowdy Republican rally here.

"It's a major achievement for this young democracy," he said, urging the crowd to "give our thanks to the men and women of America's armed forces. Without their courage and skill, today's verdict never would have happened."

Two days before Tuesday's vote, dozens of congressional races were too close to call and two national public opinion surveys favored Democrats overall but suggested a late burst of energy among Bush's Republicans.

Bush was in Nebraska and Kansas as part of an 11th-hour political rescue mission for struggling Republican candidates facing unexpectedly strong Democratic challenges in part because of anger at the war in Iraq.

"Saddam Hussein was a threat," he said, amid signs the conflict could cost his party control of the US Congress. "My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off for it."

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed as "preposterous" any suggestion that US and Iraqi officials manipulated the timing of the sentence to help the Republicans and said it was "absolute proof" that Iraq now possessed an "independent judiciary."

Democrats hailed the sentence against Saddam but warned it would not solve the challenges US forces face in Iraq, which was plagued by a raging insurgency and escalating sectarian strife that has fed a rising US death toll.

"Justice for the Iraqi people was finally served today," but "Iraq is in the middle of a civil war and growing sectarian violence will be an even greater concern following this verdict," said Democratic party chief Howard Dean.

In a statement on his way to Nebraska, Bush acknowledged that "Iraq has a lot of work ahead" but said he would stand by the country's fledgling government, which recently has been at odds with Washington.

The Democrats needed a net 15 seats out of the total 435 in play on Tuesday to control the House. They hoped for a gain of six Senate seats out of the 33 at stake that would give them the edge in the 100-member upper chamber.

A Democratic victory would dramatically reshape the political landscape for Bush's final two years in office and the 2008 election to choose his successor.

While expert forecasts of a Democratic victory in at least one and possibly both chambers have heartened the opposition party, two new national polls showed their once double-digit advantage sharply narrowed in recent weeks.

The Washington Post and ABC television poll showed likely voters favoring Democrats to Republicans by a 51 percent to 45 percent edge, with a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points. In an October 22 survey, the Democrats had led 55-41.

And a poll by the non-partisan Pew Research Center that specializes in public opinion found a 47-43 lead for Democrats among likely voters, down from 50-39 two weeks ago. The margin of error was three percentage points.

The US president has been fiercely attacking Democrats, accusing them of plotting to raise taxes and charging that they cannot be trusted to manage Iraq or the war on terrorism he launched after the September 11, 2001 attacks.

The Washington Post/ABC poll still had bleak news for Bush, with his approval rating at a dismal 40 percent and almost twice as many registered voters saying they would cast their ballot as an anti-Bush gesture rather than a show of support.

Control of Congress would provide the Democrats with a powerful tool for controlling the political agenda over the next two years and launching a series of public investigations into Iraq and other Bush policies.

But the White House has strongly signalled that it will not change course in Iraq, with Vice President Dick Cheney saying in a recent interview that "it doesn't matter" that most of the US public has turned against the war.

DOJ_NMG_0091066

Washington pundit Charlie Cook forecast "a very strong Democratic wave" on election day. Analysts gave the party a strong shot to win the House but said the Senate hinged on a few key races in states such as Virginia and Missouri.

Voters in 36 states also are casting votes for governor Tuesday. Democrats hold significant leads in five of nine open seats: Ohio, Arkansas, Colorado, New York and Massachusetts, and are favored to displace Republicans in Maryland, Arkansas, and Minnesota.

Hussein Sentence Could Heighten Rifts In Iraq (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

The death sentence given to former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein for crimes against humanity could deepen Iraq's sectarian rifts and inflame the anti-American insurgency.

In a Baghdad courthouse, Mr. Hussein, in his customary black suit, remained seated as the judge read the verdict finding him guilty of ordering the killings of 148 Shiite-Arab civilians as retribution for a botched 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

"I will listen to the judgment, but I will not stand up," Mr. Hussein told the judge. Mr. Hussein reacted to the death sentence with the traditional Islamic incantation of "God is greater," and then disparaged the Iraqi judges for allegedly doing Washington's bidding: "You are the servants of the colonizers."

With violence on the streets of Baghdad at its highest level in years, the verdict is unlikely to alter the pattern of the sectarian conflict or attacks against U.S. troops, but it will provide another divisive issue for a country struggling to hold itself together.

In the Iraqi capital, reaction to the verdict was mixed. In several Baghdad neighborhoods, many Shiite Muslims, who form the majority of Iraq's population and who were persecuted by Mr. Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime, broke into celebratory gunfire and honked car horns. "All the people who were tortured and killed by Saddam are happy in their graves today," said Jawad Kadham, a 35-year-old Shiite construction worker.

But many in the country's Sunni Muslim minority, embittered at the current Shiite-led government and the American occupation, said the widely expected death sentence wasn't fair and the real crimes lie in the inability of the current rulers of Iraq to stop murders and bombings on the streets. "The people who tried Saddam are worse than Saddam; it's all about revenge," said Salim Mahmoud, a 40-year-old Sunni engineer.

Such conflicting reactions to Mr. Hussein's death sentence reflect the sectarian gulf widening between Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites, 3½ years since the U.S.-led invasion. The Sunni-led insurgency, driven in part by secular supporters of the old regime, also drew in Sunni religious extremists eager to wage holy war against the Americans. Using radical Sunni ideology, these extremist groups decreed Iraq's Shiites to be apostates and sanctioned their killing. The resulting bombing attacks and murders of Shiite civilians led to the rise of Shiite militias who in turn began to target regular Sunnis for reprisals. The sectarian conflict continues, while the U.S.-backed and Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki appears unable to stem the violence.

Mr. Maliki, who spent years in exile as a member of a prominent Shiite religious party opposed to Mr. Hussein, hailed the verdict and appealed to the insurgents to stop fighting. "This is the disgraceful end to the person who brought ordeals, pain and reckless wars to this country," the prime minister said in a televised speech. "I say to all deluded remnants of the previous regime: The period of Saddam and his party is gone."

In Mr. Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, some residents marched in protest, vowing to avenge the former Iraqi leader.

In a sign of how embittered the Sunnis are at Iraq's current leadership, Saleh al-Mutlaq, another Sunni politician, warned that the verdict could lead to more sectarian attacks for which the Shiite government will bear responsibility.

The verdict marks the end of a trial that lasted a year and became familiar to most Iraqis because the proceedings were televised. With U.S. congressional elections taking place this week, many Iraqis suspect the Bush administration somehow influenced the timing of the sentence to benefit the Republican party. White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the idea as "preposterous" Sunday. President Bush said in a statement Sunday that "history will record today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

DOJ_NMG_0091067

Under Iraqi law, the death sentence is subject to an automatic appeal. If the appellate chamber upholds it, the sentence must be carried out within 30 days. Alongside Mr. Hussein, two other defendants were sentenced to death: Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and former intelligence chief; and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court.

Bush Applauds Hussein Verdict (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

GRAND ISLAND, Neb., Nov. 5 -- President Bush and politicians from both parties hailed the conviction of Saddam Hussein on Sunday but disagreed on its larger meaning as campaign strategists tried to gauge the political impact just 48 hours before hard-fought midterm elections.

Speaking in the shadow of Air Force One on a Texas tarmac and at later campaign events, Bush called the verdict a "landmark event" in Iraq's transition to democracy, and aides hoped it would be seen as vindication of his decision to go to war. Democrats were quick to agree that justice had been done for a vicious tyrant but argued it would not fix what they see as the debacle in Iraq.

The timing of the verdict, which had been scheduled weeks ago, stirred anxiety among Democrats who worried it could be a "November surprise" that would persuade Republicans to turn out, much as the release of an Osama bin Laden tape just before the 2004 election was credited with helping to put Bush over the top. Some voiced suspicions that the Bush administration had orchestrated the court schedule to influence the vote, a contention the White House rejected.

Some key strategists in both parties, however, said they doubted the verdict would make much difference. In a campaign that has been dominated by debate over the Iraq war, it provided a rare day of good news for Bush at a key moment, they said, but most voters had already made up their minds about how they view the situation there.

"It makes the environment incrementally better but only incrementally," said Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist close to the White House. "It reminds everybody of what a bad guy Saddam was. It reminds everybody of why we were there in the first place. I don't know that it drives any votes at this point. I wish it did, but it doesn't."

Hussein "was a brutal, evil dictator" who is "getting the punishment that he deserves," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who runs the Senate Democratic campaign arm, said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." But, he added, "I don't think his conviction makes much of a difference in this election, even though it's a very good thing that it happened."

Hussein has been a regular feature of Bush's stump speech for weeks as the president tells audiences that he made the right decision in removing the Iraqi leader from power and argues that the world is better off. By the time the verdict was announced in a Baghdad court, aides traveling with Bush on the campaign trail were ready with talking points. White House press secretary Tony Snow was booked on television programs starting at 7 a.m., and his office sent e-mails touting other reactions.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," Bush told reporters before leaving Texas for campaign stops here and in Topeka, Kan. "It's a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government."

Although he did not predict whether it would help the reconciliation process in Iraq, Bush portrayed the trial as a chance to expunge Hussein's legacy. "The man who once struck fear in the hearts of Iraqis had to listen to free Iraqis recount the acts of torture and murder that he ordered against their families and against them," he said. "Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come."

He then introduced the verdict into his campaign speech later in the day, using similar language. When he announced the verdict at a boisterous rally here in a hall filled with flags, cornhusks and hay bales, the crowd cheered.

Other Republicans, who have been on the defensive over the war as U.S. troop casualties spiked to a two-year high, quickly jumped on the bandwagon. "This verdict is a victory for justice and a victory for the Iraqi people and all freedom-loving people in the Middle East," said House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio). His whip, Roy Blunt (Mo.), said the world is "safer because Saddam Hussein sits on death row, not in a palace in Baghdad plotting to harm millions of innocent Americans and Iraqis."

DOJ_NMG_0091068

Democrats praised the verdict while still bashing Bush. "Tragically, I believe today's verdict does not change the fact that the administration's policy in Iraq has been the most incompetent execution of American foreign policy in my lifetime," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.). Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said "the Iraqis have traded a dictator for chaos. Neither option is acceptable, especially when it is our troops who are caught in the middle."

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called the court's decision "a great verdict" and said Hussein "is a war criminal and he's getting what he deserves." But, Dean said, the war remains a mistake. "This was a miscalculation by people who didn't understand what they were getting into. And if they'd listened to Colin Powell and the rest of the military, they wouldn't have gotten into it."

Democratic leaders avoided publicly accusing the Bush administration of orchestrating the verdict's timing but privately some raised questions, and liberal Internet blogs have been full of angry discussion about it. The Iraqi court originally planned to render a verdict in October but delayed it until two days before the election, prompting a defense lawyer for Hussein to write a letter accusing Bush of manipulating the proceedings for campaign purposes.

Snow dismissed the suggestion as "preposterous" and absurd. "Are you smoking rope?" he replied when a reporter asked about timing manipulation aboard Air Force One on Saturday. "Are you telling me that in Iraq, that they're sitting around -- I'm sorry, that the Iraqi judicial system is coming up with an October surprise?" Corrected on the date, he expressed incredulity, "A November surprise. Man, that's -- wow."

Bush Trumpets Hussein Verdict To Rally Support (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 5 — President Bush on Sunday seized on the conviction of Saddam Hussein as a milestone in Iraq, seeking to rally Republican voters with the issue of national security as some polls suggested that his party might be making gains in the final hours of the campaign.

The White House said the timing of the announcement, two days before Election Day, had nothing to do with American politics and had been dictated by the Iraqi court. But Mr. Bush moved quickly to put it to use in what has been his central strategic imperative over the past week, trying to rouse Republican voters to turn out.

“Today we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death by the Iraqi High Tribunal,” Mr. Bush said to roars of approval in a hockey auditorium packed with supporters in Grand Island, Neb. “Saddam Hussein’s trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people’s efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.”

The announcement out of Baghdad came as polls suggested some gains for Republicans. A Pew Research Center Survey released on Sunday found that the number of likely voters who said they would vote for the Democrats was now 47 percent compared with 43 percent who said they would vote for Republicans. Two weeks ago, Democrats had an edge of 50 to 39. A Washington Post-ABC News poll found a similar tightening.

These kinds of polls, about the so-called generic ballot, measure national trends and do not necessarily provide an accurate measure of what is happening in individual House and Senate races. Andrew Kohut, the president of the Pew Center, said the poll nonetheless found that Republicans were becoming more enthusiastic as Election Day approached, a sign that the party was making progress in addressing one of its main problems this year: a dispirited base.

With at least 20 House races and 3 Senate races virtually tied in polls over the past week, Republican officials have looked to the huge voter turnout operation the party has developed over the past six years as its last-stand defense to prevent Democrats from making big gains on Tuesday.

A series of Mason-Dixon polls published on Sunday suggested a tightening in two Senate races, Rhode Island and Maryland, that Democrats had been confident of winning.

Republicans over the past week have spent heavily in Maryland on behalf of Michael Steele, the Republican candidate seeking to fill the seat being vacated by Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat. In Rhode Island, Senator Lincoln Chafee, the Republican, has spent heavily and banked on his family’s long history in the state’s politics to help him survive in a heavily Democratic state.

DOJ_NMG_0091069

Ken Mehlman, the Republican chairman, said polls showed that Republicans and conservatives "were coming home," which he said "is what happens when voters focus on the choice before them."

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democrat leading his party's effort to win control of the House, said, "It's inevitable that there would be some tightening in the end."

Still, Mr. Emanuel, who has been careful this campaign to avoid the public expressions of optimism voiced by other Democrats, added, "This is making me nervous."

Across the country, Democrats also hailed the verdict in Baghdad but argued that it would make no difference in delivering stability to Iraq and would have little bearing on Tuesday's vote.

"I think it's a great verdict — I mean, Saddam Hussein is a war criminal and he's getting what he deserves," Howard Dean, the Democratic national chairman, said on "This Week" on ABC. "But I don't think it has any impact on the safety of America."

Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has become the face of his party's opposition to the war in Iraq, said the verdict was the right one but predicted it would not make a difference in this campaign. What would matter more, Mr. Murtha said, were editorials in military papers being published Monday calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"When The Army Times, The Navy Times, The Marine Corps Times, they have all said that we're not supporting the troops, that they're losing confidence with the administration, that's what's important," Mr. Murtha said, campaigning in Croydon, Pa., outside Philadelphia, for Patrick Murphy, a Democrat seeking to unseat Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick.

The fact that Mr. Bush was spending this last Sunday before Election Day in two of the most Republican states in the nation was testimony to how bleak a year this has been for the Republican Party and the president. And in Florida, the home state of his brother, Mr. Bush received what appeared to be another reminder of his political unpopularity when Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor, backed out of a planned appearance with Mr. Bush in Pensacola on Monday.

Mr. Crist said that he needed to spend the day in more competitive parts of the state and that he was not joining the list of other Republican candidates who had snubbed Mr. Bush this year.

The White House, however, said this week that the president was heading to Florida specifically to help Mr. Crist, who, according to Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, invited Mr. Bush in the first place.

But an official with Mr. Crist's campaign, who would not talk for attribution, said that Mr. Crist had never confirmed the appearance.

On the final Sunday of the election cycle, the leaders of the four Congressional campaign committees took their seats around the table of "Meet the Press" on NBC, appearing together for the first time in the midterm contest — and promptly diving into a sharp exchange over the war in Iraq.

"To pull out, to withdraw from this war, is losing, there's no question about it," said Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "The Democrats appear to be content with losing."

Mr. Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, turned sharply toward Mrs. Dole, his face lined with outrage.

"You should take that back, Senator," he said. But Mrs. Dole kept speaking over him, creating a minute of partisan cacophony on the television set.

"I will not sit idly by with an accusation that Democrats are content with losing," Mr. Emanuel said.

Mr. Bush was unambiguous in hailing the conviction of Mr. Hussein as welcome news from a country where good reports have been in short supply this election season. That said, there have frequently been developments in Iraq over the past two years that Mr. Bush has proclaimed as turning points, only to see them followed by renewed violence and further deterioration.

And while these announcements of Iraqi milestones have at times produced a lift for Mr. Bush in the polls, the gains have tended to be fleeting.

Still, just before an election that is this close, Republicans suggested that the events of Sunday could be politically helpful.

A senior Republican Party official, who insisted on anonymity to speak about the political implications of the announcement, said it would invigorate Republican voters distressed about Iraq but would not have much effect beyond that. And

DOJ_NMG_0091070

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading the Democratic effort to win back the Senate, said, "People are worried about the future of Iraq, not the past."

Senior aides to Mr. Bush scoffed at suggestions that the announcement of the verdict had somehow been orchestrated by the White House.

"Are you smoking rope?" Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said Saturday in anticipation of the verdict. "Are you telling me that in Iraq, that they're sitting around — I'm sorry, that the Iraqi judicial system is coming up with an October surprise?"

White House officials were clearly prepared for the news, posing Mr. Bush before Air Force One to make a celebratory announcement as he left Waco, Tex., and inserting remarks about it into his speeches. On Sunday morning, Mr. Snow made a round of the talk shows to praise the development, echoed throughout the day by Republican surrogates and candidates.

Representative J. D. Hayworth, a Republican in a close race in Arizona's Fifth Congressional District, used a previously scheduled early morning appearance on the Fox News Channel show "Fox and Friends" to declare the Hussein sentence "a victory for the Iraqi people." Mr. Hayworth said it offered Americans heading to the polls "a chance to take stock" of the war's dividends.

From California to Missouri to Connecticut, candidates put up their final advertisements.

In Pennsylvania, Karen Santorum, Senator Rick Santorum's wife, speaks directly into the camera in a 60-second advertisement, looking almost mournful as she says that she has found attacks on her family for living in Virginia hurtful, explaining that they moved there to be closer to Mr. Santorum when he is working.

Saddam Ordered To Hang For '82 Massacre (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- An Iraqi court yesterday sentenced Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, convicting the former dictator and six subordinates in the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail in 1982.

Shi'ites and Kurds, who had been tormented and killed by the tens of thousands under Saddam's iron rule, erupted in celebration -- but braced for a potential backlash from the Sunni community that some fear could push the country into all-out civil war.

Saddam trembled and shouted "God is great" when Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman declared the former leader guilty and sentenced him to hang.

